SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

THIS I BELIEVE

by

HAYWOOD N. HILL, M.D.

I AM A SOUTHERNER. I was bred in the South where my forefathers were slave holders and Confederate soldiers. I was born and raised in Southern towns with their rigid racial patterns and their typical Southern prejudice. I was away from the South for a few years, but I returned to live in the South by choice and intend to remain here for the rest of my life. I love the South and its people.

I like to have two black arms in my kitchen and two black legs pushing my lawn mower, to help take the drudgery out of living for myself and my family, and I like having them at a very minimum of cost to me.

I like choosing my own friends and associates, and I like eating in pleasant places with well bred people of my own race, class, and status.

A message given before an adult church school class at Trinity Presbyterian Church, Atlanta, on January 1, 1961. Dr. Hill is teacher of the class and an elder of the church.

I like to worship in a church which is composed of my friends and equals where I will be among my own group, racially, socially, and intellectually.

I like for my children to go to school with their own kind and with other children of their own racial, social, and intellectual level. I like for them to be shielded against poverty, ignorance, dirt, and disease.

I like to practice medicine among intelligent, cooperative people who understand what I am trying to do for them, who are friends as well as patients, and who pay their bills.

I like to live in a neighborhood composed of people of my own group who have pleasant, well kept homes, and where there is no conflict or strife.

I do not want my daughter to marry a Negro.

I like the racial status quo. I am a Southerner.

But, I am also a Christian. As a Christian I must believe that God created all men and that all men are equal in the sight of God. I must believe that all men are my brothers and are children of God, and that I am my brother's keeper. I must believe that Jesus meant what He said when He commanded me to love my neighbor as myself and when He commanded me to do unto others as I would have them do unto me. I must believe that the church is God's house and that it does not belong to me, to the congregation of Trinity Presbyterian Church, or to the Southern Presbyterian Church. I must believe in the fellowship of all believers.

I am also a scientist and have devoted my life to the pursuit of objective truth. Therefore, I must know that while there are individual differences among people that there is no such thing as racial inferiority. I must know that within every group there are individuals with different potentialities, and that I cannot arbitrarily classify anyone on the basis of his race or color. I must know that poverty and ignorance and isolation, call it segregation if you will, breed feelings of inferiority, frustration, resentment, and despair and that these feelings in turn lead to misery, to immorality, and to crime which, in turn, not only depress the people and the communities involved but the community as a whole and the whole country.

Therefore, as a Christian and as a scientist I am obligated to act on the basis of what I know and what I believe and not on the basis of what I like. I must live by conviction and by conscience rather than by preference and by prejudice.

I must, therefore, regard every man, rich or poor, black or white, as a child of God and as a person, not as some kind of subhuman being or animal or even as an inferior. I must try to see to it that every individual gets equal rights under the law and in politics. This applies particularly to the right of equal justice in the courts and to the right of the exercise of political privilege; that is, the right to vote. If I fear the effects of bloc voting and voting from ignorance, then I must try to see to it that every man is educated to the point where he votes intelligently.

I am obligated to pay a living wage to every man who works for me and to do my best to see that others do the same. I must accord to every man the right to rise to the limit of his abilities in any job or profession, and I must make every attempt to see that no man is blocked because of his race or his social status. If any individual of any race rises to a position equal to mine, then I must accord to him the same privileges that I have and welcome him as an equal.

I must see to it that everyone has an opportunity for an education as good as my own children have. If this means, as the social scientists, the courts, and the Negroes themselves believe, that that education must be the same education as my children have, then I must accept it and encourage it.

I must try to see to it that no man be humiliated and rejected because of his color. If this means that the Negro eats where I eat, sits next to me in the theatre, or rides next to me in public transportation, then I am obligated to accept it.

I must see to it that every man has an opportunity for a decent home and decent surroundings, and if this means that he will live in my neighborhood or in the house next to mine, then that is the way it must be.

If a Negro wants to worship in my church or join my church, then I am obligated to see to it that he is not only accepted but welcomed into that church, even if it be Trinity Presbyterian Church. I must not be led by false pride to try to judge his motives for coming into that church, and I must welcome him on the same basis that I would welcome any other individual.

I must try to overlook the selfish politicians who use the Negro for their own ends; the Communist agitators who delight in stirring up racial strife; the noisy, aggressive Negro who abuses his privileges and who makes life unpleasant for me; and even the Negroes who exploit their own race. I must ignore such irrelevant questions as which race settled this country, which race pays the most taxes, etc., and remember the basic principles on which I am trying to act and in which I believe.

I must not only accept the efforts of the Negro to achieve his legitimate aspirations, but I must try to help him achieve them, and I believe that the church must do the same if it is a truly Christian church. I must do this, even though it goes against my deepest prejudices and even though it threatens my superior and isolated position in the community and even though it entails the risk of intermarriage.

Basically, the problem is not one of what I like but of what I know to be right. I must not let my wishes determine my attitude toward my associates, my school, my church, or even my own family, but if I am true to the principles which I profess, then I must act according to those principles. This, I believe.

HOTEL GRANTED CURB ON ACTION OF PICKET LINE

Unions Accused of Threats, Violence—Mass Picketing at Patten Is Forbidden

SUPPLIES TO GO THROUGH

Chancellor Peabody Howard yesterday granted a limited injunction to the management of the strike-bound Hotel Patten, limiting the strikers to two pickets at each entrance of the hotel, enjoining mass picketing and interference with the delivery of supplies to the hotel.

The injunction was granted after a three-hour hearing in chancery court yesterday in which Dan Byrd Jr., attorney for the hotel, charged that numerous acts of violence had been committed on the picket line and that the striking unions had forfeited their rights to peaceful picketing.

Shows Brick in Court

Byrd charged that someone threw a brick through a window of the coffee shop at the hotel and he had the brick in court as an exhibit. He said the brick had been carefully examined by a fingerprint expert in an effort to find out who had thrown the brick, but that no fingerprints were left on it. Byrd also charged that employes who were not on strike had been threatened with physical violence and that a truck driver who was delivering supplies to the hotel had been told that if he attempted to deliver the supplies his head would be "bashed in."

Attorney H. G. B. King, who represented the five unions named as defendants in the bill, replied that there was no proof that these threats and acts of violence had been committed by members of the union or by the union's representatives who were named individually as defendants.

"If these charges are true," commented Chancellor Howard, "it is certainly not conducive to the welfare of the community. The court has very little patience with violence. The Supreme Court has declared how far labor may go in strikes and picketing. Labor unions have been recognized as speaking for the welfare of the laboring men, but if they should go beyond that realm, they are just as much out of line as anyone else."

Howard Cites Letter

King had objected that there was no evidence connecting the five representatives with the strike. Chancellor Howard, however, cited a letter read into the record by Byrd in which these men notified the hotel management that they represented the hotel's employes and wished to negotiate a contract.

"It would be folly to say that these men were not involved in that strike," commented the chancellor.

Concerning the brick-throwing episode, Chancellor Howard asserted, "I don't know who is responsible for throwing that brick, but if labor is not responsible, they are certainly getting a black eye for it."

The five unions named as defendants in the lawsuit were as follows: The Hotel and Restaurant Employes International Alliance and Bartenders International League of America, William Earl Immon, representative; Culinary Workers Local 574, Carl J. Monway, representative; the International Brotherhood of Firemen, Oilers, Powerhouse Employes, Operators and Maintenance, J. C. Leffew, representative; International Laundry Workers Union, James T. Odom, representative; International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, J. H. Dunn, representative. In addition 15 individual pickets were named as defendants, but service was not obtained on them.

Granting of the limited injunction was preceded by a series of legal maneuverings in which King introduced pleas in abatement and demurrers in which King contended that labor organizations could not be sued in court under their adopted names unless they were incorporated. He argued that such suits must be filed against several persons as representatives of a class constituting a union.

The chancellor overruled all these legal moves and ordered the case tried on the bill and answer. The attorney for the hotel insisted that the strikers had forfeited their rights to peaceful picketing and that they should be enjoined from any kind of picketing. The chancellor, however, held they had a right to picket the hotel so long as the pickets were not in such numbers as to interfere with ingress and egress to the building.

In addition to allowing the union two pickets at each entrance, the chancellor allowed the union one picket at each entrance to the alley behind the hotel.

The chancellor specifically enjoined the strikers from interfering with the delivery of supplies to the hotel, but when Byrd also asked for an injunction to enjoin the strikers from interfering with the delivery of merchandise to the liquor store in the hotel, the chancellor refused on the ground that the liquor store was not operated by the hotel and was not a party to the suit.

The injunction petition alleged that cab drivers for the Yellow Cab Company were refusing to drive patrons of the hotel from the railroad stations to the hotel and Byrd also asked for an injunction against these cab drivers. Chancellor Howard refused this and declared the court had no authority to grant such an injunction.

AFL Pamphlet Favors Negroes

A new pamphlet entitled "Pie in the Sky," with a large question mark, and termed "a challenge to the Negro worker," has just been issued by the Southern Policy Committee of the American Federation of Labor in an effort to counteract propaganda that the Negro is not wanted in A. F. of L. unions.

The A. F. of L. at the present has over 650,000 dues-paying Negro members, the pamphlet says, "the largest and best paid Negro membership in any labor organization in the world"

These Negro members "know the policy of the A. F. of L. to be of fine purpose and great accomplishments on behalf of Negro wage earners," it states, and adds:

"The cheap peddling of propaganda that the A. F. of L. discriminates against Negro workers is a false and lying campaign to deceive the unorganized Negro workers, and is an injury and set-back to that worker."

Prepared mainly by Negro members of the policy committee, the pamphlet says:

"We invite you to join our ranks of the over 7,000,000 paid-up A. F. of L. members, and offer you—not pie in the sky—but a hard fight shoulder to shoulder with all workers of whatever race or creed to improve the common lot of all."

Textile Union Hints Strikes in South

Leaders Reported Impatient at Slow Progress in Negotiations With Mills

By MARK TEMPLE

Officials of the Textile Workers Union of America, CIO, impatient with the slow progress being made in new wage negotiations with Southern mill operators, have thrown out a hint that things had better speed up "or else."

The Southern mills with very few exceptions have thus far resisted TWUA efforts to duplicate a general 10-cent hourly increase won from Northern firms, and Kenneth Douty, director of the union in Georgia, said Monday that only two cases have been referred for arbitration.

Under some of the existing contracts, Mr. Douty said, arbitration is called for when agreement cannot be reached, but in cases where there is no provision for arbitration other steps may be taken. These steps, he inferred, would include the filing of strike notices under the Smith-Connally Act, although he expressed the personal belief that the situation can be adjusted without resorting to strike.

Mr. Douty has the full backing of his boss, Emil Rieve, who is general president of the TWUA. Mr. Rieve for several days has been warning of possible direct action by the union. Mr. Rieve also says that arbitration will be invoked in all Southern contracts which contain provisions for this step, and other concerns will be asked to enter into arbitration voluntarily.

But if resistance continues and arbitration is refused, the TWUA president warned, strike votes will be taken and notices filed under the Smith-Connally Act in all recalcitrant mills.

"What happens after that is strictly the responsibility of the mill owners," Mr. Rieve was quoted as saying in the current issue of Textile Labor.

"The situation is not of our asking. Our demands are moderate, and we have proved most eloquently that where employers are reasonable, as they were in Northern cotton, woolen and worsted and synthetic yarns, collective bargaining with TWUA can resolve almost any difficulty."

Mr. Rieve charged Southern cotton manufacturers with "stalling" and said they are trying to re-establish the old North-South wage differential, virtually eliminated by TWUA in 1945.

Bills Ask Change In Quo Warranto Protection Law

Thompson supporters headed by Representatives Gowen, of Glynn; Sabados, of Dougherty, and Harrison, of Jenkins, introduced a bill in the House Monday designed to remove Governor Talmadge's protection from quo warranto proceedings.

The bill would repeal an act which holds that the governor cannot be ordered by the courts to show cause why he holds office. The measure was referred to the state of the republic committee.

Senator Millican introduced a similar bill to repeal the act that protects the governor from quo warranto proceedings to test his title to office. The original act provided that every state official except the governor should be subject to quo warranto proceedings.

Right to Work Bill Approved By Committee

Senate Group Favors Measure, 6 to 2, After Lengthy Debate.

After a two-hour heated debate before an audience of several hundred persons—predominantly union men—the Senate Labor Committee last night approved 6 to 2 a bill to penalize persons for violating the 1945 "freedom to work" act.

The bill, introduced by Sen. E. J. Butler, Forrest City, drew several hundred persons to the Hotel Marion ballroom for the committee hearing.

It provides fines ranging from $100 to $5,000 for anyone interfering with either union or non-union labor's right to work. The original measure was passed in 1945 and Senator Butler describes the bill as merely putting "teeth" in the law.

John L. Daggett, Marianna, general counsel and executive director of the Arkansas Free Enterprise Association, spoke better than a half hour in favor of the bill, while three representatives of organized labor, dividing up an hour's allotted time, spoke against it. They were: G. L. Grant, Ft. Smith, representative of the United Mine Workers; J. R. Wilson, El Dorado, chairman of a Railway Brotherhoods Joint Legislative Committee, and Tom Gentry, Little Rock city attorney.

Loudspeaker Brings Debate.

At the beginning of the hearing, there was a brief exchange between Committee Chairman John Mosby, Lepanto, and an unidentified union member in the rear of the room, over permitting the speakers to use the microphone for the addresses.

Chairman Mosby explained that the committee had set up its policy and intended to follow it. After Mr. Daggett had been speaking for several minutes, Sen. Jerry Screeton, a member of the committee and one of those voting for adoption of the bill, asked the chairman to change his mind.

Senator Mosby then put the question to a quite vote among the committee and Senator Screeton won. Mr. Daggett was then asked to come to the microphone and the room rang with applause of the union men.

It was the second time in less than a week in which Senators Mosby and Screeton have differed on the committee policies, although seeing eye to eye on legislation before it.

In his address Mr. Daggett described the measure as a mandate of the people and fair to both labor and management since "it would prohibit an employer from denying a job to anyone because of membership in, or resignation from, a labor union—or because of refusal to join one."

He said the question was simply that the "public policy of the state of Arkansas should be that each and every citizen within her boundaries be free to seek employment when, where, if and how they pleased, or whether or not under the basic and constitutional law the public policy of this state should be that as a condition of employment any free, white, black, yellow—any citizen of the state of Arkansas should be required to pay tribute in the form of money for the privilege of employment in a free America and under a free state constitution.

"Opposes Closed Shop".

Mr. Daggett said the issue was one of the most controversial at this time and "I am prepared to argue or debate the closed shop theory with any human being from 30 minutes to 30 days. I can find no defense for it in a free country."

The arguments of the union representatives were similar in the respect that they all charged the bill was an infringement against labor and an effort to prevent a closed shop.

Mr. Grant said the purpose of the "freedom to work" law was to enslave workers and enrich the employers."

"But neither it nor this bill would ever stand up in court. In fact the Arkansas Supreme Court has ruled that labor has a right to bargain collectively and strike collectively."

He charged that this act is a step back toward peonage, and added that the law would be taken to the court within 30 days.

Mr. Wilson said that if the Free Enterprise Inc., got by with this bill it would have four or five more in the next session.

Gentry, identifying himself as a champion of the underdog, described how labor had made its advance in the past half century.

Political Freedom At Stake

[illegible] Congress begins work on labor legislation, it is clear [illegible] primary duty must be the elimination of two of the worst existing abuses—the forcing of a man to pay tribute to a union before he can work, whether he desires the union's services or not; and the power of unions to levy a tax on their members for political and legislative purposes.

The case of C. B. DeMille versus the American Federation of Radio Artists, which is now making its way through the courts, exemplifies both these abuses.

The facts of the case are that Mr. DeMille was engaged in presenting a national radio program. Subsequent to the commencement of this program, AFRA had organized a closed shop in the profession, and Mr. DeMille joined the union because otherwise he would not have been permitted to work on the air. In 1944, the Board of Directors of AFRA assessed each member one dollar to finance a campaign in opposition to an anti-closed-shop proposition on the California ballot. Mr. DeMille favored the proposition and refused to pay the assessment. AFRA then expelled him, thus making it impossible for him to continue his radio work.

Mr. DeMille went to court. The Superior Court of Los Angeles County and, subsequently, the District Court of Appeal of California, held in favor of AFRA.

If higher courts agree with the lower courts in their interpretation of the questions of law involved, Congress must provide redress. What would happen to an industry if its management levied an assessment on the wages of workers to finance a political campaign for or against some measure? That is precisely what AFRA has done. And what would happen to an industry if a worker who refused to pay the assessment was discharged and blacklisted in his trade? Again, that is what AFRA has done. Here is dictatorship destroying political freedom.

Virginia's Anti-Strike Law

Aimed at Public Utility Tieups, It Avoids Forced Arbitration, but Holds Penalties for Each Side

By Raymond P. Brandt

Chief Washington Correspondent, St. Louis Post Dispatch.

As a result of two threatened strikes in essential public utilities within six months, the Commonwealth of Virginia has on its statute books today a law forbidding work stoppages in water, light, gas, electric power, transportation and communication industries within the State.

Under the new law, which became effective January 28, the Governor is empowered to seize and operate any utility in which a labor dispute threatens "substantially to impair the safety or health of the citizens of Virginia."

Before such seizure, the Governor may try to bring about agreement between the utility management and its workers. If either side notifies the Governor that further negotiations would be fruitless, it is the Governor's duty to request both parties to submit their differences to arbitration. If this request is formally rejected, the party deciding to engage in a lockout or strike must fix a date for the work stoppage, which shall be not less than five weeks from the date of the notice. If any agreement is not reached during those five weeks, the State takes over the operation of the utility, while the disputants continue their negotiations. Compulsory arbitration is avoided.

Both sides would be penalized by the governmental operation. Fifteen per cent of the utility's net revenues during seizure would be used by the State to reimburse itself for the operation and the training and hiring of replacements for workers who refuse to work for the State; employes would receive the same pay during State operation as they received prior to the seizure, thus eliminating retroactive increases that might be attained by normal collective bargaining.

"Involuntary Servitude" Charged.

The law was overwhelmingly approved by the General Assembly last month. The House vote was 93 to 6, the Senate, 37 to 1. Organized labor bitterly opposed it, arguing that it was unconstitutional because it interfered with the right of contract and permitted involuntary servitude for at least five

"If the utility says that it is unable to pay a suggested wage, or to put into effect a proposed practice the Commission can determine whether these matters meet the requirement of reasonableness and if so, whether the corporation can adopt them without confiscating its property and prejudicing the investment in its assets. If these latter matters are feared, the tribunal has authority to increase rates to a point which will permit the utility to pay a just remuneration to its employes, render an adequate service to the public and obtain a reasonable return upon its investment. * * *

"A corporation proposing to embark or continue in the utility business will have notice of its obligations; for those now employed or may hereafter work for such a company will do so with the realization that they are in effect working for the public, and as the policeman and the fireman must surrender certain personal prerogatives as a price for public employment, so they too must subordinate some of the personal privileges which they might enjoy in private employment, as the price of entering or continuing in this public employment, being assured at all times that there is open to them an impartial public tribunal to which they can resort for the vindication of any fundamental right or the redress of any grievance of any unfair practice or treatment."

A Belief in Private Enterprise.

The majority report, signed by six councilors, rejected the Corporation Commission argument with these words:

"The setting of wage rates and the determining of working conditions are complicated matters and any body or person charged with setting same would consume a great deal of time. In addition, the pressure on such a body to set higher wages would be tremendous as would the pressure to keep them the same or perhaps to lower them. Also it was thought that since the period of State operation would be brief it would not be possible to hear the parties and decide the matter. Furthermore, the same pay during State operation as they received prior to the seizure, thus eliminating retroactive increases that might be attained by normal collective bargaining.

"Involuntary Servitude" Charged.

The law was overwhelmingly approved by the General Assembly last month. The House vote was 93 to 6, the Senate, 37 to 1. Organized labor bitterly opposed it, arguing that it was unconstitutional because it interfered with the right of contract and permitted involuntary servitude for at least five weeks.

The history of the law goes back to March when the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (AFL), threatened a strike against the Virginia Electric & Power Co. Gov. William M. Tuck made national news when he invoked an ancient colonial militia law to "draft" the workers. The strike was averted at the last minute, but Tuck started to find more modern authority for future action. In October, VEPCO management refused to abide by a National Labor Relations Board order certifying the IBEW as the bargaining representative for the foremen. The union successfully threatened a strike to force the company to accept the board's certification.

Two threats in one year were enough for Gov. Tuck, who thereupon requested the Virginia Advisory Legislative Council, composed of nine legislators, to report on two bills, one banning closed-shop contracts, the other designed to prevent public utility strikes until the State could seize and operate the utility. Both bills became law.

Of the nine councilors, eight favored public utility antistrike legislation, although they did not agree on details. One thought the Virginia Assembly should wait to see what Congress would do about labor relations.

Protection From a Minority.

The majority report said that the dominant thought of the proposed legislation was that "the public at large has the right to be protected from the acts of the minority insofar as the minority is not enslaved or their rights and liberties otherwise encroached upon. The rights and duties of the minority are coextensive with those of the majority."

"The theory of this bill is that the parties are encouraged to get together on their differences and the State will only step in when they fail to do so. The Council considered compulsory arbitration and enforcement of awards but these run into several difficulties, some Constitutional and others practical. Of course, purely voluntary arbitration is desirable and should be encouraged.

"It is believed that the period of State operation will be relatively short since the utility will have lost control of its property and the employes cannot obtain their demands until the management of the utility is again placed in charge of operation." One councilor agreed with six others on the need for a law, but thought the State Corporation Commission should be empowered to decide "what is a legitimate wage and what are proper methods of work and reasonable work-loads for the individual employe."

This, in a sense, would be compulsory arbitration and its advocate said: Commission argument with these words:

"The setting of wage rates and the determining of working conditions are complicated matters and any body or person charged with setting same would consume a great deal of time. In addition, the pressure on such a body to set higher wages would be tremendous as would the pressure to keep them the same or perhaps to lower them. Also it was thought that since the period of State operation would be brief it would not be possible to hear the parties and decide the matter. Furthermore, if a body such as the State Corporation Commission granted wage increases it would have to allow higher rates to the utility which might induce either the utility or labor to bring on State operation. Finally, the Council believes in private enterprise and has in mind the lessons taught in the recent war by activities of the Federal government in fixing wages."

The law, as enacted, prohibits any person or groups of persons from interfering with the State's operation, or encouraging such interference. This includes establishment of a picket line "near or adjacent" to any work conducted in the governmental operation.

The law also provides that when the representatives of the utility management shall notify the Governor in writing that the utility can and will resume normal operations, the Governor, after an investigation, shall restore the properties and facilities to the utility. Should the Governor refuse to do so within ten days, the utility is authorized to sue in any general chancery court in Richmond for such restoration.

Any person found guilty of violating this law can be fined not less than $10 and not more than $1,000 and may be imprisoned for not more than 12 months. Any utility or any union convicted of violating the law may be penalized up to $10,000 a day for each day of violation.

Tests of Law Under Way.

Three tests of the law are under way, according to Jack Kilpatrick, political writer for the Richmond News Leader, who writes:

"The most important of these lies in the negotiations now in progress between the IBEW and VEPCO on two separate contracts, one for 1850 production and maintenance men, the other for 180 foremen. The union filed with the Governor, February 4, formal notification of its request for contract changes. The other tests in prospect come from the Lynchburg Gas Corp., where the union-company contract has expired, and from Bristol, where a labor dispute has arisen in a motor freight company. While no official ruling has been made by the courts or the Attorney General, it is not generally believed that the law applies to the freight carrier in Bristol. While it is engaged in 'transportation,' as mentioned in the law, it is not regarded as operating in 'a vital public interest,' nor would a strike expose the citizens to 'dangers, peril, calamities or catastrophies' as mentioned in the law."

The IBEW's formal notification of requests for contract changes indicates that despite opposition to the legislation when it was proposed, organized labor will abide by its provisions and not strike—which is the objective of the law—for the desired changes.

Violence in Local Strikes

The serious wounding of a Negro employe of the Southern Crate and Veneer Company serves to emphasize that we have serious labor difficulties in our midst.

Workers at this plant and at a nearby tile factory have been on strike for some time. Not all of the employes struck, and there have been efforts to get both plants back in operation on a full-scale basis.

This has resulted in the usual situation where picketing employes have attempted to persuade others from going to their jobs.

Although there had been other incidents, relatively minor in nature, Wednesday night's assault, if indeed it is proved that the workman was shot by a striker who resented his loyalty to his employer, should have a sobering effect on all participants.

It is our belief that pickets have a perfect right to operate in the vicinity of a plant against which they have a real or imaginary grievance. But we think mass picketing, where force is used to prevent people who wish to do so from going to their work, is undemocratic and un-American.

The Telegraph hopes that the local officers who are assigned to the shooting case will work it out in all details and that every man who had anything to do with the incident will be brought to justice.

We know nothing about the leadership of the local strike, but it is common knowledge (among others who have said so was former Senator Robert M. LaFollette, a great friend of labor, in a recent magazine article) that the union involved is one of the principal nesting places for Communists who have bored into the CIO. This knowledge should serve as a flag of caution.

Meanwhile, we believe that the great majority of Macon people, including most responsible elements in the labor movement, back the action of the local law enforcement officers in doing everything they can to protect a citizen's right to go freely to and from his place of employment.

Sentiment goes even further, in our opinion, and demands that those who resort to violence be prosecuted for violating the law.

RALEIGH, Feb. 19.—(AP)—Amid contrasting tempers of boos and cheers, the House committee on manufacturing and labor today heard proponents and opponents of a bill to outlaw the closed shop in North Carolina, in what observers called "one of the rowdiest legislative committee hearings on record."

The "boos" and sneers came after testimony by the Rev. F. T. Rose of Brevard on behalf of the bill, and were stopped only by constant pounding of the gavel by Representative R. L. Harris of Person, chairman of the committee.

Harris said: "If we have any more of that, the meeting will adjourn. Make up your minds; this committee will accord each side the right to speak."

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

He said, "There is nothing more fundamental to every citizen than the right to happiness and the right to work when he sees fit," adding that "Our forefathers came to America to start a new life of liberty and freedom and fought to defend those rights."

Scott said he had the highest admiration for labor unions. "I realize that they have advanced, and have been the chief agent in obtaining higher wages and better working conditions for workers—but a closed shop is against all our principles of freedom."

Henry Benoit, a laundry and drycleaning operator from Charlotte, and chairman of the legislative committee for the laundry and drycleaning business in North Carolina, said the bill "would protect every individual's right to work." He added that the closed shop "is a denial of our rights laid out in the Constitution."

Andrew Joyner, Greensboro lawyer, said the closed shop is a threat to freedom of industry, and introduced a string of laborers, who told of their experiences with labor unions, and urged that the committee pass the bill.

of Brevard on behalf of the bill, and were stopped only by constant pounding of the gavel by Representative R. L. Harris of Person, chairman of the committee.

Harris said: "If we have any more of that, the meeting will adjourn. Make up your minds; this committee will accord each side the right to speak."

Rose said, "I come to you in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ to speak for this anticlosed shop bill. I am a conscientious objector to being forced to join something undemocratic and un-Christian."

He shouted that "Never in the 11 years that I have been a child of God nor in the three years I have been a preacher, have I been forcd to sign on a dotted line for labor dictators."

DANIELS APPLAUDED

Loud applause, ringing in the gallaries, came later when Josephus Daniels, editor and publisher of The Raleigh News and Observer, spoke against the bill, saying: "I am an employer who has operated under the closed shop for many years with nothing but good results.

"Any man who thinks he can regulate labor unions, just as soon push back the ocean," Daniels said, adding "it cannot be done."

He said the bill was "conceived in secrecy and came from an association that wants to destroy labor unions—not from dissatisfied unions themselves."

"The proposed bill would throw a firebrand into every industry in this State. North Carolina has been comparatively free from strikes, and nearly always, disagreements have been settled peacefully through collective bargaining.

"If you gentlemen pass this bill, you will have destroyed the right of men to collective bargaining . . . You will have stabbed labor in the back," Daniels concluded.

NO ACTION TAKEN.

Sixteen proponents and 14 opponents spoke at the hearing, which was held in the hall of the House and attended by around 600 people. The hearing lasted over two hours.

The committee took no action today.

The bill, introduced by three young war veterans—Representatives Leroy Scott of Beaufort, Clarence Hathaway of Gates and Charles B. Martin of Martin—would prohibit contracts or combinations which require membership in labor unions, organizations or associations as a condition of employment or continuation of employment.

It also provides that a person would not be required by an employer to refrain from joining or remaining in a union. By appropriate action in courts of the State, a person denied employment or continuation of employment for any such reasons would be entitled to recover from his employer such damages as were sustained by reason of such denial or deprivation.

LEADS OPPOSITION

Opposition leader was C. A. Fink of Salisbury, president of the N. C. Federation of Labor.

Dr. Frank P. Graham, president of the Greater University of North Carolina and a former member of the War Labor board, also opposed the bill, saying: "We must not use our powers of government to forbid the freedoms of contract and collective bargaining."

He said "as part of our great tradition of freedom, I would hate to see the people of this State denied the right to bargaining which is the pride of industrial enterprise in America."

Capus Waynick of Raleigh told the committee that "for this general assembly to enact this bill and go on record as unfriendly to unions, which have raised the weekly pay of workers from $13 to several times that amount, would be an attack upon the principle of organization itself."

R. R. Lawrence, a representative of the Textile Workers Union of America, said "passage and application of this bill would create more chaos than we have witnessed in our lifetime. The Communist party thrives on this thing." He added that the bill is more than an anti-closed shop bill. "It is anti-maintenance of membership, anti-checkall, and anti-a lot of other things."

SIMS' REMARK.

After J. H. Jackson of Greensboro, a representative of the Federation of Shopcrafts, spoke, telling of his son's war services; Representative Frank Sims of Mecklenburg rose and said:

"I came to this hearing to hear an intelligent presentation of this bill. I did not come to hear irrevelant remarks about somebody's son."

Again Chairman Harris pounded the gavel, ruled Sims' observation out of order, and the committee proceeded to hear these other opponents of the bill:

J. E. Bumberger, chairman of the legislative committee of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; the Rev. Ben Moore, representing High Point-Thomasville furniture and textile workers; James Tucker, Durham Negro, and representive of a tobacco workers union; Hugh Thompson, Negro lawyer of Durham; and E. B. Jeffress, part-owner of The Greensboro Daily News, who represented the Typographical union of Greensboro.

CIO Affected Little By Bill, Leader Says

Has No Closed Shop in State Nor Compulsory Check-Off, Gillman Claims

Charles H. Gillman, state director of the CIO, gave recognition Friday to statements of some legislators that pending antilabor legislation is aimed principally at his organization, but added that "the truth is" that CIO would be affected but little if any.

"We have not one closed shop in this state," Mr. Gillman said, "and we have but one union shop. We have no union contracts which make it compulsory that a person be a member of the CIO in order to obtain or hold a job."

The CIO leader said also that his union has no contracts in Georgia calling for the compulsory check-off of union dues, a feature which one of the pending bills is aiming at, and added that economic progress cannot be prevented by restrictive legislation "and the CIO is concerned primarily with economic progress."

Advancement of the welfare of the laboring people and the small farmer is the chief concern of the CIO, Mr. Gillman said. The corporation farmers and industrialists, he declared, "have shown that they are fully capable of taking care of themselves."

Mr. Gillman referred to the Southern organizing campaign of CIO and said employers and others who are fighting that program are largely responsible for the introduction of the antilabor legislation in this state.

"Their plan was retaliation, but in their eagerness to hurt the CIO they failed to take the trouble to find out if the CIO was going to be affected by their legislation," he said.

Minimum Wages

"Many of the sponsors of this antiunion legislation, it will be noted, are employers, or represent employers, who pay their employes the very minimum wages allowed by law—40 cents per hour. And wages of $16 per week won't bring very much prosperity to any community."

"And it is worth noting here," he said, "that one of the chief sponsors of the antilabor legislation helped block a move to bring to his community an industry that pays high wages.

"Could it be that those who fight labor wish to keep Georgia poor on the theory that it is easy to politically control those who are economically insecure? There is considerable evidence that this may be true."

Closed Shop Ban Carries, 157 to 28, in Georgia House

Atlanta Constitution

By M. L. ST. JOHN

By the overwhelming count of 157 to 28 the House of Representatives Tuesday voted to outlaw closed shops in Georgia. It also passed, 146 to 16, a measure banning mass picketing.

The House measures are identical with bills passed unanimously last week by the Senate. The House bills will be sent to the Senate, where approval is anticipated earlier than House action on the Senate bill, which is now before an unfriendly House Industrial Relations Committee.

The anti-mass picketing bill was approved by the House without debate, after an all-day argument over the closed shop.

Before approving the anti-closed shop bill, the House shouted down a substitute offered by Reps. Stafford Brooke and William Britton, of Whitfield County, which would "give all Georgians the right to work and the right to make contracts to work." It also defeated amendments to exempt from provisions of the bill Whitfield and Spalding Counties.

In the final speech for the bill, Rep. Frank Twitty, of Mitchell County, said Georgia laborers are not fighting this bill. He said the bill is being fought by union officials, who don't want to see their political slush fund ended.

Rep. Cicero Kendrick, of Fulton County, Editor of the Journal of Labor, lashed the bill as "born in Texas and designed to crush the buying power of the masses of poor workers for the benefit of the greedy, wealthy few." He said it was sponsored by the National Association of Manufacturers and that it will lead to rags, starvation and hatred.

Rep. Herbert Skinner, of Chatham County, President of the Savannah Federation of Trades, opposed the bills. He declared they would drag down the union members' standard of living, rather than pull up the standard of non-union members.

Skinner praised labor's part in the war, stating American labor's production record helped win the war. Declaring there was no conflict between labor and veterans, Skinner said laborers worked long hours in temporary housing setups to get guns and ammunition and planes to their own relatives on the battlefronts. He said that the Christian American Organization in Texas is misleading the Farm Bureau into fighting labor.

A member of a labor union, Rep. S. N. Cox, Sr., from Decatur County, indorsed the anti-closed shop bill. He cited instances during the war in which labor organizers abused their power.

Cox said a New Jersey contractor came to Bainbridge to build an air base. He couldn't find union labor there, so he hired 350 Georgia farmers as carpenters. Employer and employees were happy, but a union organizer from Dothan, Ala., came in and declared the farmers must pay $50 to join a union or get out, Cox continued. The firm, under contract to use union labor anywhere it went, was subjected to a big fine. It cancelled its Bainbridge project rather than pay it, Cox said.

Cox said he holds a card in the Electricians' Union, and still believes in organization, but he feels the unions are going too far when they tell a man he can't work unless he joins a union.

Rep. Adie Durden, of Dougherty, said he didn't think Georgia labor has done anything to deserve punitive legislation. He supported the anti-closed shop bill, however, because he did not consider it punitive.

Fighting the bill was Rep. M. G. Hicks, of Floyd County, who said the only reason wage standards in Georgia have been raised is because labor has been able to bargain collectively. He observed that the only States passing anti-closed shop laws are Southern States, and asked "When is the South going to quit fighting the Civil War?"

Rep. George Ramsey, of Stephens County, supporting the bill, said servicemen were disgusted to read of strikes at home while they fought in enemy territory. He recalled that his pay as a captain was not as great as the mess boy received on a ship manned by Merchant Seamen.

Rep. Robert Addleton, of Spalding County, said the bill was aimed directly at the textile mill workers in Georgia. He saw chaos for Georgia if labor unions should retaliate for passage of this bill. Rep. Stafford Brooke, of Whitfield, said passage of the bill would take away from the boys and girls of Georgia the benefits of better wages unions have brought to his County.

Shortages of materials today are due to labor strikes, Rep. Henry Ellis, of Coffee County, observed.

Rep. Harris, of Person, Chairman of the Manufacturing and Labor Committee which approved the bill and Rep. Scott of Beaufort, one of the bill's introducers. The measure now goes to the Senate where the State Labor leaders plan to carry on their opposition.

Teachers' Pay Increase In Appropriations Bill

The State Senate Appropriations Committee moved to guarantee Georgia teachers and bus drivers a continuation of their 50 percent salary increase Tuesday when it transferred allotments for this purpose from the contingency section to the regular portion of the General Assembly's pending appropriations bill.

This change, made in executive session, increases the regular appropriations bill to some $94,000,000. It leaves approximately $22,000,000 in the contingency section.

The contingency section provides for expanded State services if revenue is raised.

Action on the teachers' allotment was taken by the Committee as it continued a series of sessions on the appropriations measure. Another meeting will be held this afternoon to continue this work.

Before going into executive session, the Committee heard talks by Roy V. Harris, former House Speaker, of Augusta, and James S. Peters, of Manchester, Chairman of the State Democratic Executive Committee. Both are powerful lieutenants of Gov. Herman Talmadge.

Harris explained he spoke for himself and not for Talmadge. However, he repeated a contention of Talmadge the appropriations bill should be passed by the Senate as rapidly as possible.

The former House Speaker admitted the possibility no new revenue measures may be enacted by the General Assembly.

If this possibility occurs, Harris continued, an extra session of the Legislature might be necessary. He urged passage of the appropriations bill in order to clear legislative decks of any routine work so the few remaining weeks may be devoted to consideration of ways and means to finance these new services.

Harris also said it will be impossible to raise funds for every item in the contingency section of the appropriations bill. He urged the consideration of "first things first."

He warned against too hurried consideration of a $2,000,000 fund to increase the pay of school bus drivers, pointing out that heretofore the State has contributed no money toward the payment of these drivers. Harris suggested close study of a formula for paying these drivers.

The $2,000,000 sum was included in the amount transferred by the Committee from the contingent to the regular appropriations proposal.

Peters urged the passage of the appropriations measure, and in contradiction to Harris, said he believed Georgia could raise all funds required in the bill.

Both Harris and Peters, however, took a dim view of the $5,000,000 provided as an annual expenditure for new buildings for the University System. This item is in the contingency section. Both men indicated this should come last.

Merchant Seamen.

Rep. Robert Addleton, of Spalding County, said the bill was aimed directly at the textile mill workers in Georgia. He saw chaos for Georgia if labor unions should retaliate for passage of this bill. Rep. Stafford Brooke, of Whitfield, said passage of the bill would take away from the boys and girls of Georgia the benefits of better wages unions have brought to his County.

Shortages of materials today are due to labor strikes, Rep. Henry Ellis, of Coffee County, observed.

Oppose Soft Drink Tax

Opposition to a proposed soft drink tax was heard by the House Ways and Means Committee Tuesday, and action was delayed until a further public hearing next Monday.

Bottlers and soda fount operators appeared in opposition of a measure which would impose a $1 per gallon wholesale tax and a retail tax of one cent for each drink selling at 10 cents or less.

The Committee voted to bring out a bill taxing airplane gasoline for a second reading, and then recommit it for a public hearing in committee. The bill would impose a tax of four cents per gallon on all gasoline sold in Georgia for aviation use. This is less than the six cents a gallon tax on gasoline sold to motorists. The difference would be to care for Georgia-purchased gasoline which would be used in inter-state commerce by major airlines.

The Committee favored passage of a measure to give State delinquent tax collectors more power. It also favored a bill that would place a three-year limitation on the time the State Income Tax Division can inspect books to determine whether errors have been made in tax returns.

North Carolina House Votes to Ban Closed Shop

RALEIGH, N. C., Feb. 25—(INS)—A bill to ban the closed shop was passed by the North Carolina House Tuesday by an overwhelming voice vote after nearly four hours of debate. An attempt by Rep. Hayes to submit the proposal to a referendum of the people was voted down.

Leading the fight against the bill were Reps. Uzzell of Rowan, Royster, of Vance, and Hayes. Speaking for the measure were Rep. Harris, of Person, Chairman of the Manufacturing and Labor Committee which approved the bill and Rep. Scott of Beaufort, one of the bill's introducers. The measure now goes to the Senate where the State Labor leaders plan to carry on their opposition.

No Racketeers Wanted

North Carolina, which was fully enlisted to end Fascism and Nazism in the World War, is equally resolved that those festering creeds shall not be replaced by Communism. The dictation by a greedy proletariat is as objectionable as dictation by the totalitarians. Neither can grow on Tar Heel soil.

There are two dangerous forces seeking domination in this country. One is that class of employers who take their tip from Tom Girdler, the steel magnate, who hates unions and says before he would have any dealings with them he would go to "digging potatoes." The other is incarnated in John L. Lewis, whose rule-or-ruin policy would destroy real democracy and collective bargaining in peace. He desires "collective bludgeoning." Both are alien to North Carolina thought and action.

Discussing the anti-labor bill, miscalled "anti-open shop" bill, that has to run the gauntlet of Senate consideration, Oscar Coffin, professor of journalism at the University of North Carolina and former editor of The Raleigh Times, in an article in The Greensboro News makes an unanswerable argument against the enactment of the proposed legislation "to put labor in its place." He recalls that he voted to increase the compensation of legislators "with the belief that they should be accepted as laborers worthy of their hire." He regretted defeat of the proposal, but now says: "I am wondering if a Legislature which would pass an anti-closed shop bill rates a raise in increment," and adds:

unanswerable argument against the enactment of the proposed legislation "to put labor in its place." He recalls that he voted to increase the compensation of legislators "with the belief that they should be accepted as laborers worthy of their hire." He regretted defeat of the proposal, but now says: "I am wondering if a Legislature which would pass an anti-closed shop bill rates a raise in increment," and adds:

Indeed, I wish I thought 10 per cent of those members of the House so gallantly brushing angels aside to pin back the ears of labor had ever read a union contract.

They speak of a desire to make labor responsible. To this I cheerfully, even fervently, assent; and that's why I wish some of the members of the Senate who are so avidly awaiting the opportunity to help rush the House bill through on its readings could be induced to sit down and take a look at what the Greensboro local of the International Typographical Union and the Greensboro News Company signed when they entered into their current working agreement.

Then, if they think such an agreement should be outlawed, we'll shut up for the time being and let them proceed in the ranks of the punitive expedition led by the National Association of Manufacturers.

And speaking of closed shops, if something must be done about them, why not devote a bit of attention to that closed shop operated by the growers of flue-cured tobacco in these parts? Or for that matter to the closed shop of the North Carolina Bar, Inc.? Who can exercise his right to plant an acre of tobacco without the consent of the tobacco closed-shoppers? Who may represent a client in court without having first submitted to the check-off contrived by the legal profession?

I am not more tender of labor racketeers than of any other sort of public enemies, but deliverance therefrom does not lie in denying the right of a labor union to set up on its own premises the same sort of ground rules enforced by scores of other organizations of Americans who are still subject to the law of the land.

Too, some of those so determined to avoid the Charybdis of Communism might do well first to ascertain if they are clear of the Scylla of Fascism.

The bill to which Mr. Coffin refers has already passed the House. It is an alien importation of the National Association of Manufacturers. The effect of its passage by the Senate would be to replace ill will for for the good will which has almost uniformly prevailed in labor-management relations in North Carolina.

Cannot Win the South

Authorities of the C. I. O. announce that they will organize for political action in wards, precincts, townships, counties. They will organize from the bottom upward.

To do that is their right. No one will hinder them.

If in South Carolina, in Southern states, they shall undertake this, they will oppose what is still called the "Democratic" party. It might lead to conversion of Southern states into two party states.

The Southern Democrats in the congress of the United States are reported every day as working with the Republicans in pressing bills which "labor" leaders denounce as aimed to destroy organized labor.

Separate organization for political action of white and colored laborers in the South manifestly would be hopeless. It would be for the C. I. O. to throw up the sponge at the start.

The white wage earners in the Carolinas and Georgia, of whom the very great maority are textile employes, will not join a party of white and negro composition. The cotton mill people know that to cooperate politically with negroes would soon or late—and that right soon—open the doors of the spinning and weaving rooms to negroes and the cottages in the villages to negro dwellers.

Management of cotton mills does not wish negroes in the mills. That is certain.

Were negroes admitted to them management would have a new and immense supply of labor. In the South are millions of negroes who could spin and weave.

If the white textile workers should combine with the C. I. O. in political action, they would thereby invite competition of negroes and consequent lowering of their wages.

If, as C. I. O. politicians seem to believe and say, management is selfish and avaricious, they would play into the hands of management by leading and assisting negroes to break into the Southern cotton mill industry.

Whether or not there ought to be race division in the South's industry, the division is. It will stay.

A C. I. O. party will not win in the South. The politicians now in office know the side on which their bread is buttered.

Wage Differentials

Macon News
Apr. 24, 1947

It is worthy of special note that the new wage contract between the United Steelworkers and the U. S. Steel Corporation provides for a reduction of the Southern pay differential.

This differential ought to be wholly abolished. It is something, however, that a great corporation in a basic industry has consented to reduce it, because reduction is a first step toward doing away with it altogether.

We doubt that there is much difference between the cost of living in the South and other sections of the country. But conceding that there is, we have never been able to understand the assumption that industry, and not the Southern worker, should have the benefit of the difference.

Business does not measure its profits by the cost of living, and attempt to hold down its gains to a bare subsistence level. It tries to make all it can, availing itself of every legitimate advantage—in some cases, not concerning itself too scrupulously over the question of legitimacy.

The same measure should be applied to labor. It should be accorded the benefit of every advantage it possesses to increase its own earnings. If Southern labor can live more cheaply than Northern labor, it is entitled to the benefit of that advantage. We can perceive no reason why that fact should be used to swell the profits of industry and depress the profits of labor.

Strangely enough, the South itself has done a good deal to advance the view that Southern wages should be low. Individuals, trade bodies and civic organizations in the South have held out as an inducement to outside capital to invest in this section the fact that Southern labor is cheap.

These unthinking citizens have been aided and abetted in this endeavor by Southern industrialists who have wanted, for their own selfish purposes, to keep wages on a low level.

Labor in the South is cheap and a good many Southerners have done all they can to keep it so. They boast about it, cite it as a great advantage and oppose the unionization of labor for the reason that the unions want to raise wages.

It is a mistaken notion that cheap labor is an index of prosperity. The reverse is true. The more money the workers have, the more they spend. Keeping them poor retards the general prosperity. Poverty of a part of the population never helps the upper crust; it tends to reduce everybody to its own level.

There is no excuse for a Southern wage differential. And the sooner everybody in this section realizes that fact and begins to holler about it, the better it will be for the entire South. It ought to be a Southern slogan that labor in the South is worth exactly as much as the same labor anywhere else.

LOOKING AHEAD

BY LEN DE CAUX

IT CAME as a surprise to most radio listeners to learn how painfully sensitive an NBC vice president can be.

Millions of radios were made to observe a period of silent tribute to the wounded dignity of the radio moguls, when comedians Allen, Hope and Skelton attempted to twit them.

It was a lesson to the common herd to show more respect to corporation executives and the way they make their living. After all, something should be sacred in this frivolous world!

WE OF the common herd tend to be rather brazen about our wages. We don't even blush when every detail about them, down to the last half-cent, is spread all over the papers.

So, perhaps we don't appreciate the delicacy of feeling of the captain of industry who tries to keep such vulgar details a secret—even from the income tax people at times.

OF COURSE, once a year the government is so lacking in refinement as to expose the salaries of industrial big-shots—and we can think we know how many hundred thousands our bigger bosses make.

But there's where we get fooled. For salaries are only so much cheese to the corporation upper-crust.

Concealed in corporation reports are all sorts of perquisites that go with their jobs (fringe issues, if you please), such as bonuses, options for stock purchase, pensions, profit-sharing, etc.

And what they get from their directorships of other companies, and from their many investments, is none of our business, they think.

As each company reports its earnings for the first quarter, its directors are so embarrassed they almost hate to mention them.

(During the war, total corporate profits after taxes rose to a record annual average of 9½ billions. But in 1946, they jumped to $12 billions, and this year they are coming in at the annual rate of $17 billions.)

SO WHAT'S all the embarrassment about, we of the common herd may wonder.

If a corporation is embarrassed because its profits are so high, it can easily reduce them by increasing the wages of its employes and lowering the prices of its products.

But that is just what the corporations don't want to do. In fact, the chief source of their embarrassment is that folks may draw this rather obvious conclusion.

One of the business sheets explains that the present enormous profits are embarrassing because they show up "price profiteering" and give the unions new arguments for wage increases.

IT SEEMS big business wants everybody to share its embarrassment—in different ways.

While it's embarrassed with too much money, it wants the workers to be embarrassed with too little, and the general consuming public to be embarrassed by too high prices.

(Retail prices of consumers' goods, rents and services advanced by about 2% between mid-February and mid-March to an all-time high, according to the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics).

CIO OPENS UNITY TALKS ON MAY 1

DISCUSSIONS on unified action and the possibility of eventual merger between CIO and AFL will be undertaken Thursday, May 1, by five-man committees representing each of the two organizations.

In the latest interchange of correspondence between the heads of the two labor groups, Murray explained that a meeting on April 24—as proposed earlier last week by AFL Pres. Green—was impossible because a number of CIO representatives were engaged "in important wage scale negotiations."

Murray suggested the Statler Hotel in Washington or some suitable place as a site for the discussions.

The AFL's invitation was an outgrowth of a letter sent on Dec. 6, 1946 by Murray to Green, Pres. A. F. Whitney of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen and Pres. Thomas C. Cashen of the Railway Labor Executives Assn.

In that letter, Murray pointed to the fact that a "deliberate and monstrous movement" is under way to cripple the American labor movement. He called for unified action by the various labor groups as "imperative and of vital importance" to halt the anti-labor drive in Congress.

The AFL replied in the latter part of January with a suggestion that only a discussion of complete merger would be feasible. In a second letter, on Feb. 18, Murray sounded a warning that no "words or cliches" should prevail.

Murray and Presidents Albert J. Fitzgerald, electrical workers; Walter Reuther, auto; Emil Rieve, textile; and Jacob Potofsky, clothing.

The AFL committee consists of Green, Sec.-Treas. George Meany, and Presidents John Lewis of the miners, William Hutcheson of the carpenters, and Dan Tobin of the teamsters.

HOUSING BILL FACES FIGHT

THE Taft-Wagner-Ellender long-range housing bill faces a hard battle in the Senate and even stiffer opposition in the House.

Approved last week by a 7-6 vote of the Senate Banking Committee, the bill (S. 866) has been placed on the Senate calendar to follow the anti-labor legislation and other pending matters.

Sen. Taft (R., O.), a sponsor of the bill, has been attacked by the real estate lobby as a "socialist" for his endorsement of the proposals, which public housing experts call the only possible method of getting construction of homes for low-income families.

The bill squeaked through committee. The deciding vote, from Sen. Maybank (D., S. C.), came in the form of a proxy phoned in from Annapolis, Md. Others supporting the measure were two Republicans—Tobey (R., N. H.) and Flander (R., Vt.); plus five Democrats — Maybank, Taylor (Ida.), Wagner (N. Y.), Sparkman (Ala.) and Fulbright, (Ark).

CRUCIAL WEEK IN SENATE

THIS is the crucial week for organized labor in the U. S. Senate. On top the agenda is the Taft Bill to curb labor's freedom.

The bill (S. 1126) is scheduled for considerable debate, with a vote expected in the first part of May.

From every indication, the bill will pass the Senate. The question will be the size of the liberal opposition to the Taft-Ball proposals to hamstring unions. A maximum of 33 votes will be needed to uphold a veto if Pres. Truman refuses to sign the measure.

The Hartley bill (HR 3020), an even stronger bill than the Senate version, has already passed the House. If and when the Taft bill is approved by the Senate, a joint conference committee of the House and Senate will work out a compromise measure. Once that joint effort is approved in House and Senate, the bill will go to the White House—probably about the middle of May.

PARLIAMENTARY fireworks on the Senate bill, approved 11-2 by the Labor Committee, opened april 23 with an oratorical display by Sen. Robert Taft (R. Ohio).

"It is not an anti-labor bill," Taft declared, with a fine disregard for the facts.

Continuing his fiction - like speech, the Ohio Senator said: "It is not a bill inspired by a desire to wreak vengeance on anyone because of what he may have done. It simply proposes to deal with the causes of labor trouble and the injustices and inequalities of the present law."

BUT a Senate Labor Committee three-man minority flatly contradicted the conservative Ohio would-be Presidential candidate.

In a joint statement Senators Pepper, Murray and Thomas (Utah) attacked the fundamental basis of the Taft anti-union proposals.

"In the name of 'fairness,' many of them would give more to those who have, and less to those who have not," the Senators declared. "In the name of 'equality' they would increase maldistribution of wealth; masquerading as protesters against monopoly, they would weaken the remaining barrier to concentration of industrial power."

While some of the very worst of the provisions were removed from the Taft bill in the Senate, it still is a disastrous measure, far worse for workers than the Case Bill which Pres. Truman vetoed a year ago.

Taft, preparing to write in a group of toughening amendments on the Senate floor, announced he had won the support of two reactionary Southern Democrats —Byrd (Va.) and George (Ga.)— to support amendments giving injunction powers to employers and placing greater restrictions on union welfare funds.

Meanwhile Sen. Joseph Ball (R. Minn.) will probably seek support for an amendment to outlaw industry-wide bargaining —one of the principal sections removed from the bill in committee.

Other reactionaries will also try to make the Taft bill a close facsimile of the House-approved Hartley proposal.

Soap Profits Doubled

Profits of the Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Co. in 1946 have almost doubled those of the previous year.

Pres. E. H. Little, in his annual report to stockholders, said the company's net income in 1946 was $14,443,835 or $7.14 a common share, compared with $7,036,054, or $3.34 a share for 1945. The company made its record profits despite a continuing scarcity of the principal raw materials for soap.

But there's where we get fooled. For salaries are only so much cheese to the corporation uppercrust.

Concealed in corporation reports are all sorts of perquisites that go with their jobs (fringe issues, if you please), such as bonuses, options for stock purchase, pensions, profit-sharing, etc.

And what they get from their directorships of other companies, and from their many investments, is none of our business, they think.

THE ABOVE may help to explain the embarrassment which big businessmen are reported to be suffering at the present time.

Maybe you and I wouldn't be embarrassed if a few cool millions of dollars were suddenly deposited in our savings accounts.

But that's just because we don't have the sensitivity and delicacy of those born and bred to bear the embarrassment of riches with blushing and retiring dignity.

much money, it wants the workers to be embarrassed with too little, and the general consuming public to be embarrassed by too high prices.

(Retail prices of consumers' goods, rents and services advanced by about 2% between mid-February and mid-March to an all-time high, according to the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics).

IN FACT, big business seems rather to enjoy the general embarrassment, and the thrill of teetering on the edge of another depression.

It gets annoyed at any proposals for raising wages and lowering prices. It prefers to accumulate more and more unsold goods in its warehouses, rather than to sell them at prices people can pay.

And it's pushing a compliant Congress into destroying the labor movement, the one force capable of relieving all this embarrassment.

Maybe this will explain why radio comedians are cut off the air at the first faint crack about corporation big-shots. There's so much more they might crack wise about!

to the fact that a deliberate and monstrous movement" is under way to cripple the American labor movement. He called for unified action by the various labor groups as "imperative and of vital importance" to halt the anti-labor drive in Congress.

The AFL replied in the latter part of January with a suggestion that only a discussion of complete merger would be feasible. In a second letter, on Feb. 18, Murray sounded a warning that no "words or cliches" should prevent labor from making immediate action against legislative dangers.

SEVERAL weeks later, in early March, Murray said that the CIO united action committee awaits word from the AFL as to the date and place for an early meeting.

"It is inconceivable that once we meet we would not, in the face of the stark, pressing danger confronting American labor, determine upon immediate protective measures in addition to engaging in a discussion for the achievement of organic unity," Murray wrote.

The bill squeaked through committee. The deciding vote, from Sen. Maybank (D., S. C.), came in the form of a proxy phoned in from Annapolis, Md. Others supporting the measure were two Republicans—Tobey (R., N. H.) and Flander (R., Vt.); plus five Democrats — Maybank, Taylor (Ida.), Wagner (N. Y.), Sparkman (Ala.) and Fulbright, (Ark).

N. C. VICTORY

TWO labor-endorsed alderman candidates, one of them the first Negro to gain such a post since 1900, were nominated this week at Winston-Salem, N. C., in the city Democratic primary.

The election shook this monopoly-ridden city to its political roots and provided a nationally significant triumph for the newly-formed United Labor Committee of Forsyth County.

The ULC, composed of CIO, AFL and independent union representatives, formally endorsed the Rev. Kenneth Williams, progressive Negro minister, and two other aldermanic candidates.

Williams, running in a predominantly working-class ward, defeated five opponents. His vote almost equalled the total combined votes of the other candidates.

Nomination in the Democratic primary here is virtually equivalent to election.

Also nominated with labor support was Alderman Candidate Fred C. Denny.

Savings Drop; Truman Warns of Crash

HIGH prices have contributed to a 42 per cent drop in savings from $35 billion in 1945 to $19 billion in 1946, the Dept. of Commerce announced this week.

The announcement was followed by a statement from Pres. Truman, speaking to business, that prices must be brought down.

Declaring that "profits in the aggregate are breaking all records," Truman said:

"There is one sure formula for bringing on a recession or a depression. That is to maintain excessively high prices. Buying stops; production drops, unemployment sets in; prices collapse; profits vanish; businessmen fail."

Truman criticized by indirection the Natl. Assn. of Manufacturers, which predicted that when price controls were removed, prices would drop.

"This has not taken place," the President declared. "On the contrary, prices rose sharply after may try to have it written into controls were taken off and they have continued to rise."

THE latest government reports show that prices reached a new record as of March 15, climbing 2 per cent in a month. The Bureau of Labor Statistics said prices then were more than 58 per cent above those of August 1939.

Despite wide publicity given the current "Newburyport plan" for cutting prices, Pres. Earl Bunting of the Natl. Assn. of Manufacturers openly predicted that prices will rise even higher. He claimed that despite hugh profits, business could not absorb wage increases.

But new facts this week came to light to support CIO's general contention that price increases have far outstripped amounts necessary to offset wage increases.

A detailed analysis of the cost of making a shirt was submitted by CIO Textile Workers Washington representative John Edelman to Sen. R. A. Taft, who was urged to investigate who gains most from inflated prices.

The survey, made by Textile Research Director Solomon Barkin, showed that "the total labor cost of making sufficient unfinished fabric for a man's ordinary white shirt increased 6½c between 1939 and 1947, while the retail selling price of this shirt went up from $1.65 to $3.95."

In urging Taft to extend the study to other fields, Edelman wrote:

"If Congress assists the citizens in really getting at the facts about what makes prices high, it may be possible to finally nail the lie that labor is responsible for increased costs.

"Moreover, it may be possible to develop sufficient popular understanding of what is at stake here to enable Congress to take the needed steps to correct a highly dangerous inflationary situation, which, if not checked, will obviously bring a real depression in its wake."

NO NIGHTMARE BUT REALITY

IF YOU lie awake at night sometimes, worrying about what would happen if you lost your job, if your wages were cut, if you were shifted to a lower-paying job or bumped down the seniority list, if an unfriendly boss were free to vent all his spite on you, if your work were speeded up still more, etc., etc.—then you are liable to have dreams that will give you a rough idea of what can happen to American workers under the Hartley-Taft legislation.

Union organization is our chief protection against such evils. It has raised wages, shortened working hours and checked undue speed-up.

It has established seniority and grievance procedure to protect workers against unfair discriminations. It has won paid vacations and countless other benefits. It has given workers some independence, security and democracy.

All these rights and benefits will be endangered, if the legislation now before Congress is enacted. For its cold-blooded aim is to weaken, if not completely destroy, the unions which have secured them.

THERE IS hardly any form of union activity that is not attacked by the Hartley and Taft bills.

They would make strong national unions impossible, by breaking them up into weak and isolated company units forbidden to cooperate against the under-cutting of wages.

They would restore open-shop conditions by outlawing arrangements to protect the union against the introduction of non-union labor.

They would give employers every possible excuse to refuse to bargain, would interfere with the workers' rights to choose their representatives and run their unions as they wish, and would promote company unionism.

They would effectively destroy the right to strike and picket—the workers' weapon of last resort, without which they have little bargaining power.

And these are but a few of the things this anti-labor legislation would do to destroy practically all union protections and leave workers at the mercy of wage-cutting, open-shop employers.

DEMOCRACY IN ACTION

"THIS IS a demonstration of what can be accomplished through free collective bargaining in a democratic society," said CIO Pres. Philip Murray of the agreement just won by the United Steelworkers with the U.S. Steel Corporation.

The agreement, which was won without a strike, raises wage standards substantially and secures many other improved conditions for the steelworkers. It also benefits the whole country by increasing mass purchasing power, preserving the workers' democratic rights and assuring continued industrial peace.

And the same can be said for the similar agreements similarly won in recent weeks by the CIO electrical, auto, rubber, packinghouse, textile, glass, oil and paper workers, and by many other CIO unions.

Yet this type of free and peaceful collective bargaining, with all the benefits that flow from it, is now threatened by the labor-baiters who are trying to enact laws to cripple unions and destroy collective bargaining.

"Under legislation now proposed in Congress," Murray said, "this achievement would have been obstructed, the improvement of the conditions and solution of the problems of the steelworkers would have been prevented, and our organiaztion would have been thwarted and crippled in the exercise of its legitimate functions."

CIO Helps Farmers Win A Strike

Farmers around Ottumwa, Iowa, took some lessons from the CIO Packinghouse Workers and won a strike earlier this month, against four major dairies.

The farmers, members of the Ottumwa Milk Producers Cooperative, rebelled when the dairies tried to force them to take the entire burden of a 1c reduction in the retail price of milk by lowering the amount the farmers received from $4.10 to $3.65 a hundred pounds.

To show their appreciation for the help they received from the union, the farmers ran a quarter-page ad which said in part:

"We're glad we found out that the CIO is interested in the farmers' problems. We're glad the CIO helped us win. We've been told a lot of things about labor unions that we now find aren't true. We're glad we had a chance to meet representatives of the trade unions."

Dalton Firemen, Police Give Up Union Cards

DALTON, Ga., May 2.—All members of the Dalton Police and Fire departments surrendered their union cards Thursday in compliance with a Civil Service Commission ruling forbidding membership in a labor organzation.

The 17 polcemen and six firemen were given until midnight last night to sign statements that they were not members of "any organization or union established for the purpose of affecting relationships between employers and employes."

The affidavits were filed with City Clerk Guy Keister, and attested that the officers were no longer affiliated with the Federation of United Public Workers (CIO).

The union organized the Police and Fire departments last June.

Five members of the Police department stand fully cleared of any suspicion of dereliction of duty in connection with an alleged disturbance on the night of April 18 at the offices of the Dalton Telephone Co. here.

The policemen were cleared by the Dalton Civic Service Commission which said no formal charges had been brought against the men at any time, although the Mayor and City Council, on April 21, had recommended their suspension pending investigation.

R. F. Hamilton, chairman of the CSC, said rumors of their misconduct in connection with the strike of union telephone employes now in progress here, upon investigation had "proved wholly without foundation."

The commission, moreover, elevated Acting Chief of Police Jack Hayes, who was among those cleared, to the full position of chief. The others cleared were Lieutenants Bill Britton and George Weaver, Patrolman Homer Williams and Radio Operator Martin Henderson.

In a Non-lynching Area

On the front pages of newspapers the other day was a picture of a gang of women and men pulling and hauling and battering a commercial employe of the telephone company in a city of civilized Ohio. The man was in danger of maiming if not of worse until the police intervened and rescued him. The attack on him was by a band of persons, or organized mob, and he might have been killed. If he had been killed no one would have said that he was "lynched", as the outrages were perpetrated outside of the regions where lynchings occur.

Negro Rights Voted by Union

Special to the New York Times and The Atlanta Journal

CINCINNATI, May 15.—The Brotherhood of Railroad and Steamship Clerks of the American Federation of Labor have broken with a constitutional provision since the founding of the union in 1899 by granting to Negroes the full rights of membership.

It was not, however, a clear-cut or voluntary departure from practice. International officers made it clear that the move was being taken under duress, notably in the case of New York State, where the union faced abolition unless full rights without regard to race were extended to all qualified members. Actually the delegates were assured, segregation would continue in the South and in every case the established local would have the right to decide whether to admit Negroes or to set up Negro locals for members of the colored race.

"We are not trying to set up social equality; we are trying to establish economic equality," George M. Harrison, grand president told the delegates.

A number of delegates from Southern states bitterly opposed the move. In the end, however, the opposition wilted and the vote appeared to be about 1,000 to 50 in favor of the change.

Kill 5½-Day Order, AFL Asks Thompson

Federation Meet Also Approves Move Toward Merit System for State Patrol

By MARK TEMPLE, Journal Staff Writer

SAVANNAH, Ga., May 23.—Having adopted a resolution barring members from any subversive organization from holding office in its organization, the Georgia Federation of Labor, in annual convention here Thursday went on record as asking Gov. M. E. Thompson to rescind his order instituting a five-and-a-half-day work week at the State Capitol.

The convention also approved a resolution asking that the State Highway Patrol be placed on "a strictly merit basis" which, its sponsors said, should free the patrol from "political manipulations."

Another approved resolution calls for continuation of civilian operating control at the Conley ordnance depot near Atlanta.

Friday the federation was to hear an address by State Rep. Meyer Goldberg, of Newnan, listen to annual reports and elect a slate of officers. As there was no open opposition to the present leadership, it was regarded as a foregone conclusion that Charles B. Gramlin, and Henry W. Chandler, secretary, would be re-elected. Some changes were expected in the vice presidential ranks in the Savannah and Macon districts, but other officers were expected to be retained in the elections, set for Friday afternoon. If re-elected, Mr. Gramlin will enter his twelfth term as president, while Mr. Chandler, who is also president of the Atlanta Federation of Trades, will begin his fifth term as state treasurer.

Eight Districts

The state is divided into eight districts, with a vice-president from each. Present holders of those posts are: Atlanta district, J. A. Harper; Macon, E. P. Scott; Columbus, Howard Anthony; Brunswick, L. W. Bennett; Savannah, W. M. Tanner; Augusta, W. W. Holley; Rome, H. A. McDonald; and Waycross, M. H. Reed.

Resolutions Downed

The convention has already approved numerous resolutions and voted one down which would have set up three additional vice-presidents at large.

The latter resolution was introduced by Henry B. Smith, of Atlanta, member of the hod carriers and common laborers' union. Mr. Smith said the federation now represents about 200,000 working men and women in Georgia, "and by this time next year will represent 250,000." He said he felt the new vice-presidents at large were required to insure collection of per capita taxes and to visit the various locals.

Mr. Smith's position was supported by Vice-President Howard Anthony, of Columbus, and opposed by H. E. James, of Atlanta, Secretary Chandler, and W. E. Buckner, also of Atlanta. Mr. Chandler said that with the present limit of per capita tax it was "utterly impractical" to put three new men on the road. "We would be bankrupt in three months if we do business that way," he said.

A report by the finance committee showed the Federation to be in good financial position, however, with a bank balance at the end of the fiscal year of $4,286.23. Total receipts for the year were $26,582.92, of which $13,251.05 came from per capita tax collection. Disbursements were $21,972.19.

THE NEW LABOR LAW

Union Security Hit Under Taft-Hartley Act

This is the second of six stories explaining major points in the new labor law.

By MAX HALL

WASHINGTON, June 24—(AP)—The new labor law cuts heavily into five types of union security, including the closed shop.

Union security is the special arrangement, through contract with a boss, which a union uses to protect itself and keep up its membership.

Here are the five types—with the number of workers now covered by each—and what the new law does to them:

1. Closed shop (about 3,357,000). Forbidden.
2. Automatic checkoff of union dues (about 3,000,000). Forbidden.
3. Preferential hiring (about 2,079,000). Most lawyers think this is forbidden, too.
4. Union shop (about 4,094,000). Permitted under certain conditions.
5. Maintenance of membership (about 3,695,000). Permitted under certain conditions.

Government experts say a total of about 11,500,000 workers now are covered by contracts involving one or more of the five types of union security.

All five were permitted under the previous big labor law, the Wagner Act, passed in 1935. The new law makes big changes in that Act.

Here are the five in more detail:

1. Closed shop. (Union and boss agree all employees must be union members. The boss hires only union members. He fires any who quit or are expelled.)

Closed shop contracts which existed June 23, when the Taft-Hartley labor bill became the new labor law, can continue until they expire.

For 60 days after June 23, it is all right to sign or renew a closed shop contract for one year, but no longer.

Once those 60 days after June 23 are up, the law forbids making a new closed shop contract or renewing an old one.

2. Automatic checkoff of union dues. (The boss deducts union dues from members' pay for the union, whether or not the individual member consents.)

The new law now forbids this—under maximum penalty of a $10,000 fine and a year in jail—unless an employee requests in writing this be done.

Starting June 23, when the bill became the new law, no more automatic checkoff contracts can be made.

Contracts in effect June 23 can continue until they expire but in no case beyond July 1, 1948.

3. Preferential hiring. (The boss agrees that when he hires a new worker he'll take a union member, if one is available.)

Many lawyers think the law forbids preferential hiring since it discriminates against non-union workers, just as the closed shop does. Example:

Seamen's hiring halls, through which unions themselves furnish seamen to ships, seem to be forbidden by the new law.

4. Union shop. (The boss hires anyone he wants but fires him if he doesn't join the union within a certain time or quits after joining.)

The new law permits a union shop contract under certain conditions. Example:

A majority of all the workers covered by a contract—not just a majority of those voting—must vote for a union shop, or there can't be one.

(The voting is conducted by the National Labor Relations Board, the government agency which administers the law.)

Once there's a union contract, the boss can't fire a worker for not belonging to the union—if he's been denied membership on equal terms with others or has been denied it for any reason except nonpayment of dues or initiation fees.

This is intended to protect the jobs of people who are discriminated against by unions for racial, political or other reasons.

The new restrictions on the union shop don't apply to existing contracts unless they are renewed.

In the 60 days after June 23 union shop contracts can be signed for one year.

But there's a clause in the law giving union members power to ask the National Labor Relations Board for a vote to knock out the union shop.

5. Maintenance of membership. (No one has to join the union but the boss agrees to fire anyone who loses his membership after joining or after a certain date.)

As in the case of the union shop, under the new law, maintenance of membership contracts are permitted only if a majority of the employes vote for it.

FEDERATION VOTES TO ALLOW NEGRO ON LABOR BOARD

By Associated Press.

Dallas, July 4.—Negro members of the Texas State Federation of Labor will be represented on the executive board by one of their own race, as a result of a vote at the federation's forty-ninth convention here Thursday.

The resolution, which calls for a twelfth vice-president to be chosen from the negro race, was introduced early in the session and passed by a slight majority.

One delegate recalled that, for all the flood of abuse and ridicule heaped throughout these four days on the Taft-Hartley bill, the convention had in no place gone on record as disapproving it, and a resolution to that effect was hastily offered and unanimously passed.

Resolutions passed urged repeal of the sales and poll taxes, a thorough investigation of the veterans' training program, under the G. I. bill of rights, and the placing of an organized labor representative in all metropolitan state employment offices.

Officers elected Thursday were: Executive secretary, Harry W. Acreman and Vice-President Roy Jones of Abilene, Paul Thomas of Amarillo and O. S. Howe of Galveston.

Wallace C. Reilly, Dallas, A. F. of L. labor leader, said Thursday that the Dallas Central Labor Council probably will institute a political action group similar to the one in Houston.

George A. Wilson, executive secretary of the Houston Central Labor Council, explained the Houston political organization to delegates to the annual convention of the Texas State Federation of Labor.

One of the main objectives of the forum, Wilson said, is to see that A. F. of L. members pay poll taxes.

CIO 'Southern Drive' Cited At Race Relations Institute

By VIRGINIA BIVIN

In answer to a question regarding the CIO "Southern drive," a CIO official commented here yesterday that the racial issue is always injected by those opposed to the labor union's organization of a local, whether it be workers, employers or other groups.

The official, Paul R. Christopher, state director, CIO Organizing Committee, Knoxville, declared that, when the CIO goes into areas where unions have not formerly been organized, Ku Klux Klan chapters are established. The discussion was a part of the fourth annual Fisk University Institute of Race Relations, which will continue through next Friday.

It has been particularly pointed out in previous institute discussions that the CIO does not sanction segregation, regardless of local customs to the contrary, and it has been underscored that members must place adherence to the labor union's policy first. CIO officials have described the CIO as a "democratic" organization which guarantees equal benefits to all members.

Moreover, it has been emphasized that the CIO is not merely concerned with matters of wages and working hours but with all areas of living. Labor has moved into "the arena of politics" to put in men whose interests are directed toward "the general welfare of all people," Willard Townsend, member of the executive committee, CIO, and international president, United Transport Service Employes of America, declared in a discussion yesterday. He further said that labor has just become cognizant of the fact that many of its problems resulted from "the so-called two-party system" being what he termed "a one-party system" run by "certain vested interests."

After their talks, Townsend and George L. P. Weaver, director of the national CIO Committee to Abolish Discrimination, were charged by a New York City Councilman with using the institute "as a platform for the vicious Red baiting campaign which reactionary big business is using against labor."

In a telegram read by Dr. Charles S. Johnson, president of Fisk and director of the institute, last night, New York City Councilman Benjamin J. Davis accused Weaver and Townsend of "lies and slanders against the Communist Party."

Weaver had previously voiced an objection to Communism on grounds that "its members are first of all Communists and not trade unionists . . . Communists built up their strength on equal rights for Negroes and later attempted to sabotage equality for Negroes in the union." Discussing labor and international affairs, Townsend had spoken of "the plague of intrigue that Communists have injected into democratic and free labor unions of the world."

Dr. Johnson this morning sent the following telegram in reply to Davis:

"No political parties represented in Institute. Weaver and Townsend gone. Planned program discussing education, religion and national security. No place on program for political debate. Your telegram has been read to Institute members."

In an address last night entitled "An Affirmative Radicalism," Kermit Eby, directors, department of education and research, CIO, declaring himself a "primitive Communist," not afraid of the term Communism, said, "I believe literally all men are brothers." Defending Russia and Russian people against being described as hidden by iron curtains, he indicated the press "creates" a curtain.

Other speakers yesterday included Frayser T. Lane, civic director Chicago Urban League; Neill A. McLean, director, Bricks Rural Life School; Ambrose Caliver, specialist in Negro Education, U. S. Office of Education, Federal Security Agency, Washington, D. C.

Addresses scheduled this morning were "Cooperative Community Life—A Basis for Race Relations in Rural Communities," by McLean and "What Do We Really Believe?" by the Rev. Peyton R. Williams, rector of Christ Church, Episcopal. Group discussions were also to be held.

The Rev. Herbert L. B. Wilkins, minister, First Baptist Church, Eighth Avenue, North, will speak on "The Christian Church and Race Relations" at 5 p. m. Sunday in Fisk chapel. The public is invited.

American Labor Today . . by the Editors

THE A. F. of L.-C. I. O. merger was scheduled to take place at a moment of unique importance to American labor. The decade drawing to a close—the decade of the cold-war years—witnessed great changes in the relation of the labor movement to the society of which it is a part. This was the decade in which most Americans, including many labor leaders, lived in anxious anticipation of the "bust" which did not come. During the decade, American industry experienced a phenomenal increase both in capacity and actual production. The decade that began with the explosion of a bomb over Hiroshima ends with atomic energy producing electricity. Automation, urgent social reality today, was an unknown term in 1945. Goals which seemed utopian a decade ago have been achieved, and are today accepted as ordinary. Henry Wallace's talk of 60,000,000 jobs can no longer be dismissed as "globaloney."

In this extraordinary decade, the economy of the South has been transformed. When Operation Dixie was projected, few people in or out of the labor movement were talking about integrated schools. The period, too, has witnessed the rise of a strong national civil-rights movement. Since 1945 revolution has swept China. India has achieved its independence. Africa now stirs to new currents of revolt. "A revolution of rising expectations" has engulfed the so-called underdeveloped areas. A U. N. has come into being in which colonial powers are hard-pressed to hold their own against a new anti-colonial bloc. Nearly ten years of cold war finds Europe reconstructed, the Middle East struggling to enter the modern world, Israel in being, and the U. S. S. R. and U. S. A. engaged in a global competition in peaceful coexistence. But as the decade ends, the possibility of a third world war fought with nuclear weapons still casts a long shadow across the world.

How has American labor fared during this decade? Has it kept abreast of the major changes? Numerically it has held its own; but its achievements, to point up the fallacy in Mr. Stevenson's phrase, have been both moderate and mediocre. During this decade the role of American labor in relation to government has been reversed. By the time of Roosevelt's death, labor had come to rely heavily on government to safeguard its gains, run interference for its organizational drives, and ward off its enemies. The decade about to tend witnessed the adoption of the Taft-Hartley Act which if not the "slave-labor act" labor orators described, has successfully "contained" labor. The National Labor Relations Board, to which labor once turned for help, is now avoided as a dangerous hazard. "Right-to-work" laws, outlawing the closed shop, are to be found in many states. Laws limiting labor's political activities have appeared in such strong labor states as Wisconsin and Michigan. Ugly nativistic anti-labor movements have been spawned in a dozen states. In nearly every state legislature, as in Congress, labor has been on the defensive. At national level, social progress has been nearly at a standstill for ten years. As might be expected, the political influence of labor has declined. The decline began with the death of Roosevelt; it became precipitous with the advent of Eisenhower. The conclusion must be, therefore, that labor has not only failed to lead or even keep abreast of the vanguard; it has, in a relative sense, lost ground in the last ten years organizationally and politically, if not economically.

THE problem posed by labor's relation to the Eisenhower Administration reflects, to a large degree, basic changes which have taken place in the industrial structure. Today the differences between medium-sized and "giant" business are so great that the giant corporations must be regarded as different structures not merely in degree but in kind. As Peter Shore pointed out recently in the New Statesman and Nation (October 8, 1955), "these super companies are not simply a kind of magnified projection of smaller capitalist institutions, but a new form of capitalist organization." Their ability to control prices and profits as well as the absence of risk, the separation of ownership from control, and their almost complete independence of the capital market put them in a class apart. Corporations that began by manufacturing rubber today market many consumer items, such as synthetic yarns, textile products, plastics, and chemicals. The giant corporations have plants scattered across the country, often with different skills, occupations, work environments, and problems. "The management fraternity," as Saul Barkin has pointed out ("Labor and Nation," 1953) "has grown large in the last fifteen years." Management is today highly specialized in relation both to program and policy. But the American labor movement itself has not changed commensurably. To a large extent, the initiative in collecting bargaining has passed from labor to management. It is also important to note that, as Mr. Barkin points out, "the full challenge of the new era is being thrown up at a time when other and opposing interests are in the political saddle."

Politically, American labor is backward even by comparison with its nearest neighbors. As labor delegates met in New York to end the nineteen-year-old split in the American labor movement, delegates of the 200,000-member Ontario Provincial Federation of Labor, meeting in Toronto, came within a single vote of endorsing the Canadian Commonwealth Federation. Delegates speaking in behalf of the resolution pointed out that as long as labor is politically inactive it would have "to plead for change. Those in Queen's Park are not our friends. We want to go to the front door and not the back. . . . Year after year we pass resolutions that get nowhere. Meanwhile some say the C. C. F. has become a Fabian party. But why? Because we have allowed it to fall into the hands of lawyers and teachers. . . . Right now the politicians in Queen's Park are laughing at us. We will never get anywhere by begging."

It is not enough to say, in extenuation of American labor, that the general temper of the time has been adverse. Unfortunately labor has contributed to the socially-regressive atmosphere of the cold-war years. The "right to organize" does not stand by itself. Individual citizens, by the same token, have the right to assemble for political action, to petition for a redress of grievances, and to organize political parties. With notable and brilliant exceptions, American labor has not fought, these last ten years, for others' liberties.

All this is not to imply that American labor is impotent or reactionary. Its strength is great but it is only a pittance of what it might be, and will be. We do not agree with those who insist on comparing American labor with, say, labor in Great Britain or France. The American labor movement has special characteristics and problems, as well as a special history and setting. American labor, we are told, is orientated toward middle-class status; it is lacking in class consciousness. True perhaps. But the findings of the Wayne University study, "Labor in Detroit," force one to note some qualifications. Labor, according to this study, is "overwhelmingly orientated toward the Democratic Party." Even those workers who have moved into middle-class neighborhoods still voted Democratic in 1952 and 1954, and in much the same proportions as labor in the working-class districts. Not only do workers trust the voting recommendations of labor organizations much more than those of other groups, but they are correspondingly distrustful of recommendations made by business and the press. Stevenson captured 75 per cent of Detroit's labor vote in 1952. The key labor issues of the recent past—the Square D strike in Detroit, Perfect Circle in Indiana, the strikes in the South—indicate that the militancy of labor is far from dead.

What has happened in the last ten or fifteen years is that management has taken the initiative in collective bargaining by simply recognizing, accepting, and increasingly relying upon unions. When labor is organizing, the initiative belongs to it; when the drives to organize abate, management recaptures the initiative. Today industry is vitally dependent on labor; it simply could not function, at its present efficiency, without unions. Therefore to regain the initiative labor must enlarge its social, economic, and political objectives. The advantage is still with labor. The last session of Congress witnessed the operation, if on a limited scale, of the first farmer-labor coalition in years. Labor can, if it will, spearhead the fight for a civil-rights program. It can, if it will, transform American politics. On the local, state, and federal level, labor needs to win the support of farmers, self-employed business men and professional groups, youth, the minorities, the independents, and the eggheads.

THIS SPECIAL issue was projected in consultation with a representative group of American labor spokesmen. These consultants urged us not to build the issue around such themes as the achievements of labor or the issues confronting labor. On the contrary, without exception, they urged us to take a critical look at American labor at this important moment in its history. Labor is not buttered up in the pages that follow. We have aimed at achieving the maximum candor. To this end, we asked the contributors not to sign their articles. All of them are actively identified with the labor movement as editors, research and educational directors, or business agents, and they come from both C. I. O. and A. F. of L. unions.

We liked the idea of taking a candid look at American labor in part because it stands in need of self-appraisal and self-criticism which such an issue might stimulate. The Nation has earned the privilege, we feel, of viewing labor with friendly candor and objectivity. During 1955 The Nation has run nineteen articles devoted to strikes, attacks against labor, and similar concerns. The reporting covered every major strike of the year; it dealt with textile workers, longshoremen, teamsters, apple pickers, hotel workers, white-collar workers, electrical and auto workers, sugar-refinery workers, and employees in the entertainment industry. We take satisfaction in this record. Sharing as we do the misgivings of some of the contributors in this issue about the immediate future for labor, and recognizing with them the problems implicit in the merger, we are nevertheless confident that the conventions of the last week represent a turning point in American labor, the beginning of the end of the organizational, or New Deal, phase in its history.

How Strong Is American Labor?

TO MEASURE the strength of the American labor movement today, a quick backward glance is necessary. Organized labor has registered significant numerical gains since 1933, the year the New Deal began. Even more important, during this period its membership increased more rapidly than the country's total civilian labor force. Thus organized labor has been growing steadily in proportionate as well as in absolute numbers and potentially, at least, represents an increasingly important political and economic factor on the American scene.

A chart drawn from an article, The Growth of American Unions, written by Irving Bernstein and published in The American Economic Review for June, 1954, throws light on the statistical side of labor's growth:

Year	Union Membership	Membership as Percent of Civilian Labor Force
1920	5,047,800	12.0%
1930	3,392,800	6.8
1933	2,973,000	5.4
1937	6,334,300	11.7
1945	12,724,700	23.6
1953	17,010,033	26.8

The principal factors which affected these figures were as follows:

The year 1920 marked the peak of post-World War I prosperity. Unemployment was at a minimum, but living costs were soaring. Together these elements provided a strong stimulant to union growth. In that year industrial unionism made impressive if temporary gains.

Beginning with the 1921 depression, union membership began to decline. While for the most part the decade was a prosperous one, the dominant craft-unionism of the A. F. of L. was impotent before the growing power of mass-production industry and the inroads of "technological unemployment"—the forerunner of today's "automation."

The year 1933 marked the low point of the Great Depression and the low point in union membership since 1920. While the year marked the nominal start of the New Deal, Roosevelt's legislative program did not go into high gear until 1934, when the N. R. A. went into operation. The effect on union membership was immediate; the year showed an increase of 600,000 over 1933.

By 1937 union membership, as a percentage of the total civilian labor force in the country, had almost recovered the position it had held seventeen years earlier—around 12 per cent. It should be recalled that 1937 was the year in which the Supreme Court validated the Wagner Labor Relations Act; it also marked the peak of labor's organizing drive in steel, packing, auto, rubber, radio, and other industries which had theretofore stood as citadels of anti-unionism.

By war's end in 1945, labor had doubled both its membership and its percentage of the civilian labor force as compared to 1937. Almost two-thirds of the gains came after the United States entered the war. The war years were characterized by a tight labor market, the virtual elimination of collective bargaining on wages (the War Labor Board having taken over the job of wage setting under the "Little Steel formula"), and the voluntary shelving by most unions of the strike weapon. Many seasoned unionists, baptized in the labor battles of the '30s, felt that the non-striking millions who flocked into unions during this period were "too soft"—more often a liability than an asset to labor.

While 1953 showed membership continuing to grow, it is important to note that, in comparison with the spectacular jump achieved between 1937-1945, the eight-year interval 1946-1953 showed a marked decline in rate of increase, especially in terms of percentage of total labor force. Indeed, during the three years of the period—1948-1950—there was a virtual standstill in membership and an actual loss in percentage of the labor force covered. This slowdown can be ascribed in part to the 1949 recession, but perhaps in greater measure to the Taft-Hartley Act which became effective in 1947. Membership picked up again with the advent of the Korean war in 1951, the consequent "boom" partially offsetting the adverse effects of Taft-Hartley.

To project our figures beyond the table, it is probable that 1954, with its slight recession, was a year of no gain for labor. And 1955 can have brought the unions no more than a moderate gain of perhaps a million new members.

A FEW comments are in order regarding column 3 of the table (union membership in terms of percentage of the total civilian labor force). As defined by the Bureau of the Census, the country's labor force includes millions not "organizable" into labor unions, such as the self-employed, at least 5,000,000 farmers, and a huge number of persons in salaried managerial capacities. Therefore the unions have done a somewhat better job in organizing than is reflected in column 3 of the table, which is based on official census figures. Even so, on the assumption that the country's "organizables" number about 37,000,000 (a conservative estimate), present total union membership of about 18,000,000 indicates that labor has not yet reached the half-way mark in organizing. It is this fact, combined with the deceleration in growth which has marked the last two years, which provided the incentive for the current merger of the C. I. O. and A. F. of L.

Since there are many small unions and a few big ones—for instance, the Railroad Brotherhoods, the United Mine Workers, and the United Electrical Workers—outside the two federations, the merger is likely to start out with about 16,000,000 members. Apparently the A. F. of L. will bring to it about twice as many members as the C. I. O.

But statistics do not tell the whole story of union strength. Militancy, general morale, and the factor of public support are also important. In the New Deal days, when union membership was much smaller than it is today, organized labor nevertheless managed to win battle after legislative battle with management, both at Congressional and state level. In those days management generally, and Big Business in particular, were unsure of themselves as a result of the 1929 crash. Breadlines and foreclosed farms won public support for collective bargaining; both the urban middle class and the country's agricultural population looked upon unions with sympathy. But in the last decade, despite the numerical growth of the labor movement, the legislative victories have been going to management as attested by the number of federal and state anti-union laws passed.

Partly this turn may be ascribed to the securer position in which management now finds itself, due to its own slick public-relations program and as a byproduct of the cold-war psychology. Many of management's former critics and large sections of the middle class have now turned against organized labor, which has been pictured as a threat to national security and the national welfare. This propaganda has had its effect on union members themselves, many of whom have drifted into middle-class attitudes; their leaders and organizations no longer hold their loyalty as they once did.

Seems out of place

The Red smear has been an important anti-union weapon.

If management has profited from the cold-war psychology, it has also profited by shrewd tactics of its own designed to divide the worker from his union. Many companies seem to shower their workers with "kindness," offering small wage increases and fringe benefits in such a way as to make it appear that it is management's generosity, not union militancy, which is responsible for this manna from heaven. All this is designed to persuade the worker that he is receiving little or no benefit from his union dues, that his union leaders are just "pork choppers" looking for a fast buck rather than for the welfare of the rank and file. Leaders themselves sometimes succumb; an increasing number of them lately seem to have become company spokesmen, quick to accept management's plea of "low profits" in contract negotiations and joining forces with industry in legislative battles whose only outcome can be to injure other sections of labor. Is it really far-sighted of union leadership, for instance, to stand shoulder-to-shoulder with management in urging prohibitive tariffs against the products of "cheap foreign labor"?

THE tendency of companies to give away a little in order to avoid showdown battles with the unions serves another purpose. All veteran labor leaders know that the only tough, militant local is one which has had to stand up under conflicts. These labor battles are not always won by the union, but when they are, the spirit engendered is likely to last.

Added to management manipulations are certain economic pressures which tend to weaken the fibre of American unionism. The factory worker is often so much in hock for his car, house mortgage, and television set that the break in his income involved in strike action comes to him not as an inconvenience but as a seeming catastrophe. Union treasuries, in turn, are called on more and more frequently, in case of a strike, to furnish not only food and rent but also instalment payments to the strikers. Union leaders are well aware that a striker who has had his car repossessed has suffered a real blow to his morale. But how many union treasuries can afford this kind of strain?

Partymiller in York Gazette and Daily

Union targets, as usual

What can unions do to counteract the varied elements which seem to be draining away the lifeblood from the American labor movement? Primarily the job is an educational one. The mass media of communications, manipulated so astutely by management, are also open to labor—though perhaps in smaller measure. These media should be used to impart the facts of economic life to the individual worker—the nature of this country's basically Big Business economy and his own place in it. Few workers recognize the slicker kinds of management propaganda, nor are they in a position to evaluate the economic motives which underlie many political trends. There are alert unions which go into such matters, but even here the educational campaign fails to reach labor's grass roots—the local, the shop, the departmental meeting. This must be done—through discussions and such visual aids as movies and charts—if the educational job being done by management is to be exposed and effectively countered.

Labor unions have failed woefully to uncover the economic motive behind our heavy military expenditures. Workers in defense and allied industries see only that millions of jobs have been created to turn out atomic weapons, planes, tanks, warships, and guns. Some union leaders see the acute dangers of this cold-war boom, but most of them are apparently resigned to do nothing on the ground that it would be "utopian" to expect the Eisenhower Administration to build schools and housing instead of guns. And the truth is that most labor leaders today accept without question the argument that we need to spend thirty billion dollars annually on armaments in order to prevent war.

Beyond the armament question is the central issue of our time: war or peace. How many union leaders have taken a public stand on the problem? And where they have spoken, what has been their position? Does George Meany's dismissal of "peaceful coexistence" as a Communist trap truly represent labor? And in the imminent C. I. O.-A. F. of L. merger, will it be Mr. Meany's philosophy that prevails, or will the merger safeguard union autonomy sufficiently so as to guarantee that there will be a real examination, by labor's rank and file, of the economics of the cold war?

These questions pose a profound challenge to the current crop of labor leaders. And there are others—the question of discrimination, for instance. Year after year the international unions approve lofty resolutions against discrimination at their annual conventions. Occasionally the resolutions are embodied in union contracts. But until these noble professions of faith are put into execution on a day-in, day-out basis within the unions themselves, the much-publicized program for organizing the South will never make much headway, nor will numerous Northern locals acquire the unity they badly need.

The job of awakening labor to its enormous potential strength is difficult, but by no means unsurmountable. Despite the cold war, the divisive tactics used by management, and the powerful economic pressures which work against militant unionism, there is clear evidence that the worker will fight when the enemy is unmasked. At the Kohler plant in Wisconsin and the Perfect Circle plant in New Castle, Indiana, the U. A. W. has been showing stubborn strength in prolonged strikes. A similar situation exists at the Godchaux Sugar Refining Company near New Orleans and the Colonial Provision Company in Boston, where the United Packinghouse Workers are out. Then there is the bitter conflict for recognition waged by the Hotel and Restaurant Workers in Miami. Where it becomes clear that management is out to kill the union, the workers respond.

It is permissible to hope that the bulk of the American labor movement, about to find a new home under a single roof, will unite in making a reevaluation of the meaning of recent events on the picket line—and, as at New Castle, on the firing line. In practice, this may mean chiefly some soul-searching on the part of union leadership. For there is evidence that, despite everything, the rank and file of American unions is still "sound"—and in many places is ahead of its leadership.

The Merger: Credits and Debits

WHEN the A. F. of L. and C. I. O. consumated their well-advertised merger last week, it also marked the twentieth month of the C. I. O. strike at Kohler. The pickets in front of the plant are filled with buoyant hopes—and gaping questions. Does "unity" mean that all A. F. of L. teamsters will no longer make deliveries in or out of Kohler? Does it mean that A. F. of L. longshoremen will refuse to unload clay for the struck plant, or that A. F. of L. plumbers will refuse to install the company's products? For the Kohler pickets such unity would spell decisive victory, and if this were the substance of the A. F. of L.-C. I. O. wedding it would evoke unlimited enthusiasm down at the grass roots.

At the moment, however, such unity is merely distant vision. What has taken place is simply a "merger"—or, in the picturesque term made famous by John L. Lewis, an "agglomeration." Put in another way, this is the lowest form of unity possible; in fact, only the first small step. For effective labor unity—the kind that the Kohler pickets pray for—there would have to be at least three additional steps:

1. Unification of rival groups, such as the A. F. of L. electrical workers with C. I. O.'s I. U. E.; A. F. of L. retail clerks with C. I. O. retail and wholesale workers, the two A. F. of L. paper unions with the one in the C. I. O., the airplane division of the C. I. O. auto workers with the airplane division of the A. F. of L. machinists, and many others.

2. A no-raiding pact signed by all the affiliates, and a clear definition of jurisdiction.

3. An agreement for mutual help between all international unions, particularly as regards respecting each other's picket lines and joint efforts to organize the unorganized.

Take these three steps and you have real labor unity. You also have a veritable revolution that would change the character not only of American labor but of American society as well. It would assure organized labor of twenty to thirty million more employees in the retail, white collar, chemical, and agricultural field, as well as in that citadel of the open shop, the South. It would assure a considerable raising of living standards, and a new political importance for labor.

George Meany

But at the moment these are all consummations devoutly to be wished. Rival international unions, under the merger agreement, are "urged" to unite but not required to do so. Very few show any enthusiasm for the prospect. For many years anyway they will remain warring and divided. It is certain, for instance, that the rival electrical unions will not merge. Neither will the rival retail unions. C. I. O. packinghouse and A. F. of L. butcher workmen continue talks and blow hot and cold alternately, but the chances of fusion are more negative than positive. The rival chemical, seamen, and other international unions are all in the same category—reluctant brides or bridegrooms.

Each union presents unity formulas which would clip its rival's wings. The A. F. of L. retail clerks have suggested to the C. I. O. retail and wholesale workers that it would be willing to merge with the retail unions in the C. I. O. group. But the latter has bakeries, candy factories, soup factories, warehouses, and what not, along with retail employees. It would not only have to leave behind scores of local unions, but would actually have to divide and atomize many others. C. I. O. packinghouse workers and A. F. of L. butchers are evidently agreed that there will be a separate department for retail butchers and another for packinghouse workers. But how much autonomy shall be given the packinghouse group which will be dominated by C. I. O. forces? The C. I. O. packinghouse union is organizing in a wide variety of fields, including sugar, agriculture, candy factories. What happens to these forces in a possible merger? How do you reconcile the differing attitudes to intraunion democracy or racial discrimination? C. I. O. packinghouse workers have done an excellent job in race relations; they are almost fanatic on the subject. The A. F. of L. group, on the other hand, has some jimcrow locals in it.

Such are the problems of unification. They disturb power structures built up over decades. Leaders of the international unions are what C. Wright Mills has called the "new men of power." Few of them are willing to trade their status of big fish in a little pond for smaller fish in a bigger pond. The merger at federation level is relatively simple because fewer power structures are involved. Perhaps that is what made merger possible. Hitherto the rival groups tried to patch the whole house of labor together before agreeing to unite. Today they have decided on a more modest handiwork; they have dug the ground for the basement—no more—and will wait for the house itself to fall into place over a period of years. The A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. are, after all, essentially lobbying forces, mere servicing bodies, not real seats of power. They coordinate legislative action, do some research and education, handle relations with foreign unions, organize political action of a rudimentary sort. But they have no power over individual union members and play no role in the central activity of labor, collective bargaining. They can only "advise" international unions; they can not instruct. On the other hand, the leaders of internationals by and large have "life and death" say over local unions and the rank and file. They can expel lower officials, veto or call strikes, conduct bargaining sessions, withdraw charters. Each international is autonomous; in today's labor structure it, rather than the A. F. of L. or C. I. O as such, is the power center. So long, therefore, as the rival internationals do not unite, there can be no effective unity.

THAT the rivalry will continue is evident from the fate of the no-raiding pact. Signed last year, the pact provided for arbitration of all jurisdictional disputes between rival unions. But it becomes effective for each international only when it signs the agreement. So far about two out of every three internationals have done so, but the most important union in either federation, the A. F. of L. teamsters, has refused to sign. For all practical purposes this torpedoes the pact. Teamster President Beck and the new power behind the scenes, Jimmy Hoffa, are forging into a dozen fields. They are in fact building a counter-center to the new merged center, making alliances on an ad hoc and individual basis. For instance, they have agreements for common organization programs with the A. F. of L. butcher workmen in the food-processing fields, and with the A. F. of L. machinists in the auto-repair and related areas. In these instances the Teamsters scrupulously respect the agreed-upon jurisdictional lines. On the other hand, Teamster unions have on more than one occasion raided the A. F. of L. retail clerks, whom they consider "enemies." What this bodes for the future is hard to say. The new merged federation plans organization efforts in many virgin fields. The Teamsters claim jurisdiction over warehousing and many other activities which are bound to create problems so long as there is no machinery for resolving disputes.

There is, finally, the ideological obstacle to true unity—the lack of labor solidarity. For most of the old-line unionists, solidarity is a dead letter. They help or support other unions only when they are allied or friendly with their leaderships. The Teamsters respect picket lines on some occasions, deliberately walk through on others. The same is true of the building-trade unions and many others. Here is perhaps the most serious defect of the whole labor movement. It affects intraunion democracy, idealism, and in fact labor's whole structure and outlook. It is a symptom of the dictatorship and centralization in so many unions which make possible the perversion of the principle of labor unity by the opportunism of leadership alliance. In political action particularly, the failure to practice the principle of labor solidarity, and the democracy on which it must be based, is fatal. Yet the A. F. of L.-C. I. O. merger does not even touch on this problem; it obviously could not.

We have here an insight into the mechanics and reasons for merger. If the participants had insisted on true labor unity—on the reshuffling of power structures, on changing ideological outlooks—there would have been no merger. The merger takes place precisely because it is the most rudimentary form of unity possible, the lowest and least effective form. This is not a criticism; the merger, even in its present form, is a step forward. Perhaps this first step will lead to others until true unity is achieved. On the other hand, the merger can lead to more centralization and a dilution of labor militancy. The Executive Council of the merged A. F. of L.-C. I. O. will have twenty-nine members: President George Meany, Secretary-Treasurer William Schnitzler, and twenty-seven vice-presidents, seventeen chosen from present A. F. of L. ranks and ten from the C. I. O. In effect this group will dominate the whole federation, because it will represent the largest and most powerful unions. Small unions are afraid that they will be swallowed; that the biennial conventions (they are annual now) will be mere rubber stamps in the hands of the big unions.

On the Agenda

In some areas the prospects are for great improvement. There is no doubt that the new federation will fight more vigorously against racial discrimination. Research and education will play a greater role than hitherto. The same is true in the legislative field: the merged bodies will have more "clout" with Congress and state legislatures. This in fact is the greatest virtue of the merger, and fits in with the role of the two federations as primarily lobbying bodies. In the sphere of organization there may also be some progress, but only if the jurisdictional lines and conflicts are ironed out.

But in other areas the prospects are bleak indeed. It looks now as if Jay Lovestone and Irving Brown of the A. F. of L. will dominate the international-relations scene in preference to the more level-headed and liberal Victor Reuther. Politically the trend is undoubtedly to the Right. This was made evident by events long before the merger was to take place. At the C. I. O. convention last year Walter Reuther quietly interred the Labor Party plank which had for years been approved by his own United Auto Workers. A second signpost was the failure of the C. I. O. executive board, led by Reuther, to take a position on the Formosa question at the time when Quemoy and Matsu seemed to be sparks that might lead to war. Emil Mazey, secretary-treasurer of Reuther's own union and a board member, proposed a militant resolution on this score and pleaded vainly with Reuther to do something. George Meany of the A. F. of L. has a position on this subject close to that of Chiang Kai-shek; Reuther was obviously mindful of this and refused to inject an irritant into the future merger. The chances are that the C. I. O.—and the coterie of ex- and neo-Socialists who are its thinkers and leaders—will continue to defer to the more rabid anti-communism that prevails in the A. F. of L.

This would be an important setback for labor. The C. I. O. often took an independent political line. In Guatemala, for instance, it refused to give Castillo Armas a blank check. No doubt Reuther and his associates hope to influence the merged federation's policy and bring it closer to their own. But as of this moment it seems that the push will be the other way.

THE merger, then, must be looked at from various angles and in different lights. It lays the groundwork for a better day for American labor. But it also presents many pitfalls and dangers which it would be foolish to overlook.

The intriguing question is: why was the merger projected at all? Many writers have indicated that the reason lies in the wave of anti-labor legislation—Taft-Hartley, "right to work" laws, and the like.

Undoubtedly here was justification enough, but for the real motivating factor we must look elsewhere. The reason for the merger, and at the same time its tragedy, is that the C. I. O. is in the process of disintegration.

The C. I. O. is uniting at the lowest point of its bargaining power. When the first attempt at unity was made back in 1937, C.I.O. was riding high. From a mere 900,000 members when it left the A. F. of L. in 1937, it had mushroomed to 3,700,000. It was then larger than the parent federation. It had an inside track to Roosevelt's White House; it had captured the imagination of many millions of unorganized; it was staffed with hundreds of idealistic young radicals who were willing to walk picket lines and who knew how to bring out the latent militancy of American labor.

Today the C. I. O., according to its own over-estimated figure, is only five million strong. Its elan is gone. Since the first flush of the 1935-1940 period, it has had no sensational organizational successes. It has grown with the economy, but hardly more. The young radicals of yesterday are middle-aged pork choppers today, far removed from the Socialists, Trotskyists, Wobblies, Stalinists, and Lovestoneites with whom they consorted in the thirties. And they no longer work around the clock or dream the dream that inspired them in that long ago when America was digging itself out of the enervating depression. The C. I. O. is not identical with the A. F. of L.: it has no racketeer problem; it has more democratic aspects than the old A. F. of L. international unions such as the Carpenters or Teamsters. But it lacks verve and vigor. Since the big organizing drive in auto, steel, rubber, oil, and packing it has muffed the ball in the South and in a dozen other fields. Politically and organizationally it has blended closer to the mentality and make-up of the older federation. Even the wages of its organizers and top officials have slowly inched themselves up toward the $30,000, $50,000 and $70,000 standards of the older elite. The eleven Communist-controlled unions were expelled in 1949, and the C. I. O. has been asserting its allegiance to the free-enterprise system with fervor nearly equal to that of the A. F. of L.

Thus the gaps between the two federations, which in 1935 appeared unbridgeable, have now been bridged. Industrial unionism, political action, organization of the unorganized—these pillars of C. I. O. policy no longer make the difference between the groups. The A. F. of L. too has its industrial unions. The A. F. of L. is today in national politics as a prop to the Democratic Party. And neither A. F. of L. nor C. I. O. has scored any real successes for more than a decade in organizing the unorganized. The groundwork for unity has been there for at least ten years. Only the power drives of a few men kept the movements apart; since the war the only real question has been: who will get posts, who will keep the power when and if merger comes about?

Now the C. I. O. is "returning to the house of labor." For the long run Walter Reuther has great hopes and daring plans; but at this historical juncture he is being married at the point of a shotgun in the hand of David McDonald, the conservative president of the C. I. O. Steelworkers. McDonald's enmity for the irrepressible redhead is painful to behold. At a Jewish Labor Committee dinner some time ago McDonald spent the major portion of his speech berating Reuther and his "socialism." Ever since Reuther became C. I. O. president following Phil Murray's death, this schism with McDonald has threatened to blow the organization sky high. Finally, when McDonald threatened to take his union into the A. F. of L., Reuther had no other course but to step up the pace for merger. The C. I. O. is being brought into the A. F. of L. structure as a kind of industrial-union department on terms similar to those discussed in 1937, but with its flag at half-mast.

The C. I. O. weakness was evident throughout the preliminary fencing for position. The A. F. of L. takes the two top positions with President Meany and Secretary-Treasurer Schnitzler; it dominates the Executive Council, the Executive Committee, and the General Policy Board composed of all international union presidents. The argument over the merger name is indicative of the whole process. The C. I. O. people wanted a blended name which would advertise merger—something like American Congress of Labor. But A. F. of L. leaders refused to yield; the best they would agree to was to tack on the words "and Congress of Industrial Organizations" as a rider to "American Federation of Labor." Everywhere the welcome mat for the C. I. O. is more like a funeral shroud. Throughout the country the C. I. O. is being relegated to second-class citizenship. Naturally in cities like Detroit, where C. I. O. strength is overwhelming, this will be impossible; but the trend is there. The schism between Reuther and McDonald, subordinated for the moment, plagues the C. I. O. even in this transition period. Many A. F. of L. officials have cemented alliances with Steelworker leaders in the hopes of freezing out the auto-worker group.

PRESUMABLY Reuther feels that these are inevitable blows in the shakedown period, that he must give considerable ground—and wait. Reuther will have charge of organizing the unorganized. His auto workers have already pledged $1 per member, $1,250,000, to start the job rolling if others will also respond, and with the prestige that comes from bringing in new forces—provided he can do it—Reuther hopes again to make the same kind of spectacular climb that catapulted him first to the head of the Auto Workers and then the C. I. O. itself. Enormously confident, Reuther permits no one to "turn his left end." He knows how to talk radical even when his actions are not so radical; and how to respond to the pressures of the workers. Yielding ground to Meany is for him only an episode in a future regroupment of labor around himself.

During the "waiting period" there will be a realignment. It is already in the making. McDonald's Steelworkers will undoubtedly gravitate toward a more conservative axis, probably with Dave Beck's Teamsters. On the other hand, such unions as David Dubinsky's Ladies Garment Workers and Al Hayes's Machinists, both now in the A. F. of L., may become part of Reuther's C. I. O. department.

What happens after these realignments? Will Reuther's position become stronger, or will there be a new split? Is it possible that a realignment will extend beyond all the present participants? In the thirties the reshuffling of labor's leadership brought together the Center, Lewis, Hillman et al, and the Left, Socialists, Stalinists, etc. The extent of the present realignments will depend in the final analysis on the objective situation. If we are in for an inflationary spiral and prosperity, then organization efforts will be much simpler and wage prospects brighter. If we are in for "leveling" and unemployment, the prospects are reversed. The question of war and peace will also cast its long shadow over the inner workings of the labor movement.

The merger is merely an episode in a bigger saga. Though welcome, it is hardly more than a step; certainly not a goal in itself. The important thing is what happens after merger.

Organizing the Unorganized

WHEN John W. Livingston, director of organizing for the merging A. F. of L.-C. I. O., surveys his job he will be looking beyond heavy industry, public utilities, and transportation. These, already fairly well organized, compose the bulk of the 16,000,000 members to whom President George Meany will be pointing with pride. Livingston, the husky auto worker from the Ozarks, will be concerned rather with the 45,000,000 wage-earners outside the union fold. They include most women workers, most white-collar employees, and most of the men and women, white and Negro, employed in the South. If within the next ten years he could double the membership of the A. F. of L.-C. I. O., his name would go down in labor history alongside that of John L. Lewis.

The car you now drive, the house you live in, the meat and bread you eat—these are all pretty likely to be union-made. Likewise the electrical gadgets you live by, your means of getting hither and yon, the structures you work in, the things you read are produced, chances are, by hands that hold a union card. It's not nearly so likely that the clothes you wear (unless you insist on the union label) will be union-made. Most of the food you eat, most of the personal services you receive, the host of small and inexpensive things —these are, by and large, without benefit of union protection to their makers, processors, and handlers.

The statistics which face Livingston in his organizing drive do not give the whole picture. For instance, Chicago. This cradle of American labor is less unionized, factory-wise, than Richmond, Virginia, or Birmingham, Alabama. Enormous segments of heavy industry, particularly in oil and chemicals, remain untouched by orthodox unionism. In certain industries where both A. F. of L. and C. I. O. have competing unions, as in meat packing, textiles, and chemicals, internecine strife has taken a heavy toll. But the key to Chicago's poor showing is the small factory. In this metropolitan area there are no fewer than 14,000 factories employing one million workers, and most of them have fewer than a thousand employees. Here unionism runs into cost factors and the law of diminishing returns. A union administrator will tell you that it costs only about twice as much to furnish union services in a plant with 1,000 members as in one with a hundred. The temptation here is to organize not the workers but the employers into associations to be more easily policed by association-wide contracts. Small factories are a major union problem almost everywhere; in the aggregate they may well account for 10,000,000 unorganized workers.

Another roadblock to unionism is the white-collar employee. The factory worker tends to be output minded and to tie this in with severely regimented wage scales, seniority and working rules. The office workers in the big industrial plants look with no little envy on the status production workers have attained; whether unions can modify their rigid notions to fit the white collar, while the white collar abandons some of his notions of superiority, will determine union success in this most promising of all the big unconquered sectors.

Women are a problem, too. Or rather, union men are the problem in their attitude toward organizing women. The traditional male idea has been that the husband, as family breadwinner, should earn enough to support his family. Unions helped mightily to get the children out of the factories, and some of them thought woman's place, too, was in the home. However desirable this old American dream may have been, the facts of life negate it. Women constitute one-third of the labor force; one-third of women over fourteen are at work. The new A. F. of L.-C. I. O. director of organization may know better than to try to stretch women on unionism's procrustean bed. Since he'll likely be too male-conscious to see the problem (not a single woman has ever been elected to the executive board of either labor federation), perhaps there should be a woman codirector of organization. That might rectify the present situation where men are averaging $3,469 in yearly earnings against $1,252 for women, who are actually 13 per cent worse off, wagewise, than they were thirteen years ago. The catch phrase, so dear to both Republican and Democratic vote-catchers, that labor never had it so good, certainly doesn't apply to women.

WHATEVER his other problems, Director Livingston is not going to be bothered much by the size of his organizing budget. The new federation starts with a built-in annual deficit of between three and four million dollars. This stems from the facts of merger. Governed by sacrosanct rules of tenure and seniority, the merged federation will enjoy no economies but rather a two-headed bureaucracy in which every officeholder is assured of his job.

The lack of money doesn't mean too much. There were hardly pennies available back in the 1930's when steel, auto, electrical, and machine workers organized themselves. Sending scads of paid organizers into virgin territory usually doesn't pay off. The paid organizers are apt to limit their efforts to getting signatures on application cards; that indeed is the criterion of success in many a union headquarters. It is assumed that there is some magic in the word "union" and that this deus ex machina will do the job somehow by remote control. Wherever workers have been genuinely organized into unions, they have accepted the union as a vehicle which they must pull to success by their own efforts. It is true that there are many unions organized by bureaucratic methods, but they can better be described as workingmen's business organizations which come to life once a year when the contract expires. Unionism as a way of life, which is the biggest asset Director Livingston has in doubling the A. F. of L.-C. I. O. membership in the next decade, is a lot bigger than most union officials care to admit; in fact there is a certain tendency to lean over backwards and insist that the immediate pork chop is the sole goal of labor. A certain type of university intellectual who dabbles in labor matters fiercely loves this concept of business unionism, perhaps because it is supposed to be anti-Marxist, but few average citizens love it. It is a bit too materialistic to enlist widespread admiration among those not directly involved.

Business unionism will offer certain obstacles to Director Livingston's program. As these unions achieve a certain limited success, and their officials acquire financial and social status in rather sumptuous headquarters, bureaucratism becomes a factor. So long as the dues continue to roll in, these cumbersome machines tend to rely on their own momentum to survive. While every union covets more per capita, the imagination and drive needed for organizing become dulled and the machines become involved in contemplating their own internal problems. Unable to cope with the challenge within their own industries, they look only with vague interest toward ambitious programs for organizing women, white collars, or the South. The typical union official today is an administrator, not an organizer. The situation was highlighted when the United Auto Workers offered to toss $1,250,000 into a general organizing kitty if other unions would also chip in. The idea lies vegetating in the files and it will be interesting to see how much luck Director Livingston has in resurrecting it.

An exception must be noted. The Teamsters, an extremely self-centered and businesslike union, has garnered a rich harvest of small factories, warehouses, and processing plants. Almost any unorganized plant that a truck may enter to deliver or take away goods is subject to Teamsters' interest; so widespread has become its jurisdiction that it parallels in structure and scope the great British Transport and General Workers Union. While the Teamsters organize on a strictly self-centered basis which may afford little help to A. F. of L.-C. I. O.'s general campaigns, the success they have attained in aggressive organizing shows the possibilities lying around unrealized.

Another encouraging factor with which Director Livingston is well acquainted is the proletarianizing of the supervisory and technical staffs in heavy industry. In oil refineries, for example, there is now one supervisor for every five or six hourly workers. These, along with the technicians and professionals in the factories, are tending to become "the masses" and inclined to like the kind of protection that unionism affords.

THIS GENERATION has seen two upsurges of organization, the first growing out of the desperation of the Great Depression, the second out of World War II. In the first, workers organized themselves. In the second, the unions did the job through labor-board ballots with a powerful assist from the government which needed to have war workers mobilized for more effective direction.

The current era differs from both. It can hardly be said that the unorganized show desperation today, particularly in the North. Many of them bask in the shade of the union umbrella without having to pay dues. Perhaps as many workers enjoy the wage benefits of unionism outside the unions as inside—they are the free riders. Then there are the millions of capitalism's captives, the indentured servants of instalment purchases. They feel they can't afford to risk strikes for the union because the sheriff might haul away the cherished TV, the beloved new car, or the housewife's proud badge of freedom, her machines for washing and cleaning. Not in their ranks of course are the appalling number even in the North who earn less than $1 an hour, but still are an influential minority among the unorganized.

Employers, too, have their umbrella, the Cadillac Cabinet in Washington, basically hostile to unionism. Lothair Teetor, former Assistant Secretary of Commerce whose Perfect Circle firm in Indiana believes in shooting it out with the United Auto Workers, hastily abandoned his Washington post not, perhaps, because his hostility to the union was repudiated but because this display of pre-Rooseveltian anti-unionism was embarrassing. The Secretary of the Interior, whose struck Oregon firm depends more on starvation than bullets to beat down the union, rides more easily in the Cabinet. Under Eisenhower, the National Labor Relations Board has become a coolly hostile force from which unions can expect no favors. Insofar as possible, they bypass the very board which was set up originally to protect their right to organize. If a minor depression should set in, the unions, under the present Administration, might well find themselves entrenched in a war of self-preservation rather than in seeking more millions to organize.

Director Livingston then must face the intrinsic differences of this period, which contrasts with the 1930's and with the war years. There is an undeniable passivity among many unorganized workers and a growing intransigence among hard-boiled employers. These are high hurdles.

Any serious proposal to add millions to the labor movement must take into account the South, where industry is burgeoning, wages are low, and security generally non-existent. The emancipation of Southern labor is the key not only to the creation of a truly national labor movement but to the refreshment of American political life. A South brought up to national wage standards, liberated from industrial-plantation feudalists, and freed from bondage to the race issue would give a new turn to the national life. This long overdue emancipation can be labor's greatest gift both to the South and to the country at large. It will be achieved when Southern workers find the union key. They are ready, they are good joiners, and when they have pledged their word they are loyal to it (a mighty asset on the picket line). Here especially the spiritual values that labor can express find a ready response. Southern workers are tired of being second-class industrial citizens, of being told that sunshine is a good substitute for adequate pay and the self-respect that unions bring. Nor will the chains of instalment-buying bind them; they have little to lose and much to win in a fight.

The textile baronies along the Atlantic Piedmont differ as sharply from the industrialized Birmingham region as does oil-rich Texas and the Southwest from either. There is no unified "South." Alongside the peonized sugar workers of Louisiana are unionized oil workers on the Gulf Coast who have wiped out the North-South wage differential. The Birmingham steel workers have just erased the wage differential; the meat packers are narrowing the margin. Along the bayous and in the piney woods giant new plants are mushrooming, most of them built by Northern corporations accustomed to dealing with unions up North. Any Southern organizer will tell you that a new plant is twice as easy (or half as difficult) to line up as an older one.

Nevertheless repeated "Southern drives" have petered out. A good bit of the blame must be placed at labor's door because of its hesitant attitude toward Negroes. A firm stand has been diluted out of concern for the prejudices of the white worker; as a result neither white nor Negro is organized.

There is no disguising the stubbornness of racial prejudice; on the other hand it has been magnified out of all perspective by the racist press and agitators. It is becoming increasingly clear to Southern workers that discrimination is holding back both races. All the way from Richmond to Corpus Christi union leaders can give concrete examples of success in fighting discrimination. The Negro, as an ally, can decide the issue of unionism in the South; if he is left uninterested, he can defeat unionism by his mere passivity. When the A. F. of L.-C. I. O. brings its fight for economic and political equality out of the clouds of convention oratory and pious resolutions into a genuine fighting program, the next drive in the South will need neither millions of dollars nor thousands of paid organizers. To paraphrase Marx, the emancipation of the Southern workers will be achieved by the Southern workers themselves, once Negroes are assured a position in the labor movement fully equal to their white brothers.

THE MAIN reason organized labor has made little progress in recent years can be found in "public opinion." Director Livingston will find this public opinion the all-important factor in his organizing plans. Not the public opinion so readily manufactured by the mass media controlled by the business elements, but rather that of the grapevine, of word-of-mouth that spreads among unorganized workers as they eye unionism as it is. In this, the spiritual factors far outweigh the material, odd as that may seem. The name of John L. Lewis was magic to millions in the 1930's because at last one of their own stood up, fought back, and won against the titans of his time. That exhilaration of spirit was worth more than millions in the treasury. The image of Organized Labor as the protector of the poor, the apostle of public education, the champion of better health and welfare, the watchdog against private plunder of the national resources, the advocate of world brotherhood, is the most valuable asset the A. F. of L.-C. I. O. director of organization can possibly have. That is why the business press has been so keen to show up sporadic pilfering of union-welfare funds and to front-page the mansions of a few labor leaders. If the labor movement can be reduced in public estimation to a selfish materialistic concept in which a favored class advances its own pay (and prices to the public, as the press insists) and collaborates with municipal corruptionists for special privilege, the vast majority of men and women still outside the House of Labor will remain there. If labor's political action, in practice, seems aimed at seeking favors, in advancing the interests of political shysters, in urging expanded military expenditures so that unionized war workers in plane factories and other munitions plants may be sheltered, there will be little spark of response from the unorganized. Even if their aspirations are unverbalized, they seek security, dignity, peace.

In truth there have always been the two drives within the labor movement, the one animated by the highest concern for humanity, the other rather desperately seeking to find safety for some behind barriers. Across the country from coast to coast there are thousands dedicated to the proposition that unions are the engines of democracy in an industrial society; their voices are going to be heard increasingly as the bankruptcy in imagination and drive of the business unionists continues to breed sterility. It is to them that Director Livingston will need to be looking for the organizers, largely unpaid, of the millions who should be in the unified House of Labor.

Democracy and the Labor Unions

IN THE last fifteen years, the terms "civil liberties" and "civil rights" have more and more been used to designate different kinds of liberties; "civil liberties," the broad social, political, economic, and religious rights guaranteed to all citizens under the Constitution, "civil rights" the right to be free of discriminations based on race, color, creed, or national origin. On the whole, labor's record is much better in the latter field than in the former.

Generally speaking, American labor's position on civil liberties has been ambivalent. Although no group in our society has a higher stake in civil liberties, labor has seldom organized to defend civil liberties in a systematic way. Indeed it is arguable that more efforts to defend labor's civil liberties have been formed without than within the labor movement. On the other hand, labor has had to battle all the way for the right to organize and for recognition of collective-bargaining principles, and its gains in these fields have had important civil-liberties implications. But these battles have generally been waged for specific bread-and-butter objectives, rather than to vindicate the right to organize and bargain collectively as an aspect of basic constitutional freedom. And this is so despite the fact that freedom of speech, assembly, and petition have been key issues in many organizational drives. To this day labor continues to present its case better when the issue directly involves its right to organize, as in its excellently conducted campaign against state right-to-work laws (see The Right-To-Work Laws by Eleanor G. Astor, The Nation, April 2, 1955), than when civil liberties issues of less immediate concern are at stake.

IN LARGE part because of the intensity of the initial employer opposition to unions and collective bargaining, the structure of American trade unions gave more attention to safeguarding the union from external attack or internal disruption than to the rights of individual union members. For years the courts made extremely little headway in their repeated efforts to protect local unions, and their treasuries, from the often arbitrary action of executive boards. While there has been marked improvement in this area of recent years, there is still need for a larger measure of internal democracy. Free speech is still an unrecognized principle in too many unions. In how many large American unions is a "loyal opposition" permitted to function? Opposition candidates in elections are all too rare. In many unions, the right of a minority to even limited access to the union's publication for the purpose of airing alternative views and policies is severely restricted or not recognized at all. It is not surprising, therefore, that the leadership of American labor has talked more often about labor's right to organize than about civil liberties in general. Nor is it surprising that the rank and file of many unions has exhibited marked indifference to denials of civil liberties to other groups; they just haven't known too much about civil liberties.

Also surviving in wide sections of the American labor movement is the Gompers conception of a narrow, non-political preoccupation with bread-and-butter issues. This tradition, whatever its merits at particular times, did not encourage a broad outlook on such issues as civil liberties. And, be it noted, the general public's attitude toward labor did not always encourage labor to become concerned about the denial of civil liberties to other groups.

Given these considerations, it is not surprising that wide sections of the labor movement should, like other elements in the society, have been caught up in the hysteria of the cold war. Specific factors in the postwar period encouraged this tendency. In the immediate postwar period, sections of labor had accumulated grievances which had not found open expression because of the wartime proscription of strikes. At the same time, opportunists saw a chance to utilize the traditional anti-radical climate of the labor movement to ride to power. After all, the first Smith Act prosecution had been launched in Minneapolis at the instigation of high officials of the Teamsters' union who were anxious to liquidate a Trotskyite faction that controlled its locals in that city. Opportunistic leadership elements, noting the change in the general climate of opinion, were quick to use the Communists, and radical rank-and-file elements, as scapegoats in a postwar period. Purges were conducted within particular unions and eleven left-wing unions were expelled from the C. I. O. after World War II. In point of fact, however, most unions, A. F.

of L. and C. I. O., had dealt with the Communist issue in the late 1930's and early 1940's; the cold-war atmosphere merely provided a setting within which the issue could be exploited for a variety of reasons and motivations. Nevertheless, the material which formed the basis of the expulsion of the left-wing unions of the C. I. O. was incorporated by Senator Humphrey in hearings held in 1951 which led eventually to the enactment of the Communist Control Act of 1954. This act was backed in the Senate by some of labor's staunchest friends, despite the fact that every labor group—A. F. of L., C. I. O., Railway Brotherhood, and major independent unions—had opposed the anti-labor bills, such as the Butler Bill, incorporated in the 1954 act. True, the bill was labeled a Communist Control Act, but some of its provisions have clear anti-labor implications. Witness the fact that the A. F. of L. did manage to secure the following exception:

> That any labor organization which is an affiliate in good standing of a national federation or other labor organization whose policies and activities have been directed to opposing Commnist organizations, and Communist foreign governments, or the world Communist movement, shall be presumed prima facie not to be a "Communist-infiltrated organization."

Because of these internal developments in the postwar period the labor movement was slow to react to the curtailment of civil liberties which began, in a sense, with the promulgation of President Truman's loyalty order in 1947. Implicit in the order was the idea of blacklisting, both of organizations and of individuals. States, counties, and cities began to adopt similar provisions which directly affected many unions and their members. Private organizations and institutions began to adopt the same procedures. At the same time, the House Committee on Un-American Activities, the Senate Internal Security subcommittee, and the Senate Government Operations subcommittee conducted hearings which, related to a series of Smith Act and perjury prosecutions under the Taft-Hartley Act, intensified political fears, bred panic and hysteria, and extended the blacklists. The A. F. of L. had consistently endorsed the work of the House Committee on Un-American Activities during the years when that committee was harassing certain C. I. O. unions. At this earlier period, the C. I. O. took strong positions in defense of civil liberties but these positions were asserted with lessening vigor as the cold war intensified. Many C. I. O. unions were opposed to the first—Minneapolis—Smith Act prosecution, but after 1948, when Communists took the place of Trotskyites as defendants, the attitude changed. The timing of Congressional hearings on "un-American activities" in connection with pending N. L. R. B. elections between rival union groups, and also in relation to pending collective-bargaining negotiations and internal trade-union elections, clearly indicated that elements in the labor movement were collaborating with the staffs of the committees.

Later, too, both A. F. of L. and C. I. O. unions were slow to react to army discharge cases, to such political prosecutions as the Lattimore case, and the implications of the industrial security personnel set-up, to the spread of test oaths (involving, in some areas, tenants in housing projects, as well as teachers and municipal employees), denials of passports, and to prosecutions under state sedition statutes where the constitutional issues were virtually identical with those involved in state right-to-work laws which labor bitterly opposes. Yet these measures could hardly fail to concern labor; according to Chief Justice Warren the federal government's security program now embraces 8,000,000 Americans—3,000,000 in the armed services, 2,400,000 in government employment, and almost 3,000,000 employees of defense contractors. Senator Hennings puts the total much higher, namely 20,000,000. As was pointed out recently in The Nation, provisions of the industrial security program could easily be used to make a shambles of union-security provisions in collective-bargaining agreements as well as to blacklist trade-union members.

True, some unions have opposed these developments; the U. A. W.'s action in the Radulovich case is apposite. But by and large, labor has been slow to react to these measures, it has let other groups lead, and when it has acted it has not followed up with recommendations which would lead to a growing rank-and-file awareness of the issues. Too often also it has failed to adopt measures designed to bring labor's political power to bear on Senators and Representatives who might have listened to labor, if not to civil-liberties organizations or church groups. This was the pattern of labor's reaction to McCarthy, which developed slowly, uncertainly, with more attention being devoted to resolutions denouncing McCarthy than to means by which these resolutions might be implemented (see: The Nation, Labor and McCarthy, by Bernard D. Nossiter, July 24, 1954).

THE TIDE began to turn, so far as labor was concerned, with the adoption of a strong statement on Civil Liberties and Internal Security at the C. I. O. convention on December 9, 1954, in Los Angeles. This was much the strongest and most comprehensive statement that a major labor group had adopted up to that time. Since then, too, the more direct involvement of the labor movement in witch-hunting procedures has brought about a stiffening of labor's opposition. The C. I. O. Steelworkers, for example, came to the defense of its political-action director who had been accused of being a Communist by one of the government's professional informers. Harvey O'Connor's effort to evoke the protection of the First Amendment in a contest with Senator McCarthy won widespread labor support, doubtless because of his background in the labor movement. Similar recent instances might be cited. Throughout the period of the cold war the expelled left-wing unions conducted some effective campaigns on behalf of civil liberties, a case in point being the impressive victory won by the West Coast I. L. W. U. in having the coast guard screening set-up declared unconstitutional.

Despite improvement, the labor movement continues to exhibit a remarkable sensitivity to official attitudes on certain key civil-liberties issues. The American Federation of Television and Radio Artists-A. F. of L., by a 4 to 1 vote in a national referendum, has approved a rule which provides that any member who invokes the Fifth Amendment when questioned about membership in the Communist Party may be subject to charges and, after a hearing, to possible expulsion. In this instance, a faction of the union was clearly collaborating with the Congressional committee that held the hearing and was, in effect, a party to the blacklisting of its own members. (See Unholy Alliance, AFTRA and the Blacklist, by Jay Nelson Tuck, The Nation, September 3, 1955). It should be noted, however, that there was, and is, strong opposition within the union to the position taken. On the same issue, the Representative Assembly of the Newspaper Guild in New York will ballot on December 15 and 16 on a measure to determine whether the guild should resist the firing of members who have invoked the Fifth Amendment when questioned about Communist Party membership.

Until the adoption of the civil-liberties resolution at the 1954 C. I. O. convention, cited above, the best statement on the role of labor in relation to civil liberties was that issued by the Packinghouse Workers-C. I. O. in 1953, under the caption The Road Ahead. The following quotation from this excellent statement is perhaps the best comment that could be made on labor's attitude toward civil liberties during the cold-war period:

Walt Partymiller
in York Gazette and Daily
Chip by Chip

> We are rapidly becoming a nation of cowed and frightened people—frightened and cowed not by any foreign power or enemy but by the McCarthys and Veldes. And we in the labor movement must confess that too often we have been counted not among the few with courage but among the many with fear.
> Yes, sometimes we have spoken. But not often enough, not long enough, not loud enough.
> And even when we spoke, we rarely acted.
> We, A. F. of L. and C. I. O. alike, passed resolutions condemning the activities of the House Un-American Committee and similar legislative investigating bodies. But have we taken a single concrete step in aid of any of the "unpopular" victims of these committees? Have we come to the support of Owen Lattimore in his defense against the outlandish indictment he faces? Have we been able to set aside our fears sufficiently to recognize that in his recent contempt conviction for refusing to turn his union membership lists over to a Congressional investigating committee Abram Flaxer of the United Public Workers was supporting a principle on which any trade-union leader would face jail rather than betray his trust?
> We in C. I. O. by official convention resolution viewed with alarm the conviction of certain Communist leaders not for overt acts but for what they taught. But neither our union nor, so far as we are aware, any other national union in either A. F. of L. or C. I. O. took a single concrete step by way of court briefs or otherwise to bring our views to a forum where they might produce results.
> We in the labor movement have repeatedly stated our support for the protection of the Bill of Rights. But the campaign to destroy the constitutional privilege of every individual to refuse to give testimony which may later be used against him in criminal proceedings has not vigorously been challenged by labor. This campaign pretends to accept the privilege but seeks to destroy it by promoting the false impression that those who stand on a constitutional right must be viewed as admitting guilt. College professors asserting the privilege have been fired, as if they had committed an offense. The American Association of University Professors condemned the discharge, but none from labor spoke up. Writers, artists, professional people asserting the privilege have been fired or blacklisted, as if they had committed an offense, and none from labor spoke up.
> In our own union, we allowed leaders of our own local unions to be placed under attack by the Un-American Committee in 1952 while we offered no support.

The A.F. of L. Machinist

But as labor moves into the post-McCarthy era—if indeed that era is at an end—several major incidents show that its militancy is not by any means dead and that given direct provocation, as by an employer, it is quite able to defend its own liberties. The Square D strike in Detroit, the Perfect Circle strike in Indiana, the Louisiana strike of the Packinghouse Workers, the strike of Miami hotel workers, of railway employees on the L. & N., and the strike against Southern Bell (all reported in The Nation), textile strikes in the South (Slump in Textiles, Bernard Nossiter, January 22, 1955), are proof enough that labor's militancy can be easily provoked. What the labor movement does not seem to realize yet, however, is that the institutionalized security systems, as in the industrial-security program, are far more dangerous to unions in the long run than employer union-baiting tactics.

THE AMERICAN labor movement has exhibited remarkable progress, in the last decade, in the elimination of racial discrimination. Despite a strong traditional bias in some unions, the labor movement has advanced so far in this field that, at the present time, only a few unions might be cited in opposition to anti-segregation measures.

The N. A. A. C. P. indicates that only three of the lesser A. F. of L. unions still specifically exclude Negroes by their constitutions or by-laws. Thus the grossest form of racial discrimination in the labor movement has been virtually eliminated. However, some major A. F. of L.

unions continue to exclude Negroes by what is called "tacit consent." The N.A.A.C.P. also recognizes a third and larger category of discriminating unions, namely, those which for the most part confine Negroes to "auxiliary locals." The failure of labor's Operation Dixie in the South in the early 1940's was in part due to the failure of the unions to oppose segregation in a more forthright manner. The success of the Packinghouse Workers-C. I. O. in bucking segregation practices in its Southern locals confirms this judgment. In view of the marked improvement which has taken place in labor's stand on civil rights, its organizational efforts in the South should meet with a larger measure of success.

The Packinghouse Workers racial integration program is a model of its kind. It insists on a clause in its contract which not only forbids discrimination in hiring but establishes non-segregation in all plant facilities such as locker rooms and lunchrooms—even in the South. The union has a Negro international vice-president and three of its ten districts—among them one which includes Texas, Oklahoma, and Louisiana—are headed by Negroes.

Currently the N. A. A. C. P. is engaged in a campaign which may result in major gains for fair-employment practices. Charges have been brought before the President's Committee on Government Contracts against four major oil and chemical companies and four unions, operating in Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas. The companies are Esso Standard, Cities Service Refining, Carbide and Chemical, and Lion Oil; the unions are the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Oil Workers International, International Union of Operating Engineers, and Independent Industrial Workers Association. The complaint to the committee cites the action pending in the United States Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals involving Gulf Oil and the Oil Workers International Union. What this action, in turn, involves, is nothing less than employment practices in the entire oil industry. The essence of the N. A. A. C. P.'s complaint is that the oil industry has set, and unions have acquiesced in, discriminatory hiring practices.

Individual unions have taken strong positions in support of civil-rights legislation and against the racial lawlessness that prevails in Mississippi today. The Packinghouse Workers, for example, called on Congress and the President to take these positive measures: (1) a federal investigation of the lynch murder of Emmett Louis Till and of the entire Mississippi judicial system; (2) enforcement of the Bill of Rights equally throughout the South and the North; (3) implementation of the Supreme Court's decision against segregation in the public school system; (4) passage of civil-rights laws during the next session of Congress to afford all citizens equal protection under the law and to guarantee their rights against segregation and discrimination; (5) passage of federal law outlawing the poll tax and other restrictions so that both white and Negro citizens in the South will be guaranteed the right to vote.

Recently delegates representing 300,000 unionists, meeting in a two-day session convened by the National Trade Union Committee for Racial Justice, asked a merged A. F. of L.-C. I. O. to provide in its constitution for complete and unreserved equality of membership. Speaking at this meeting, Senator Herbert Lehman said that labor unions must complete the job of putting their own house in order "and of establishing full equality of membership without discrimination or segregation. Simultaneously, the unified labor movement must throw its full strength behind the cause of justice and equality for all Americans in all of our institutions." The proposed appointment of a Commission on Civil Rights by the merging labor groups, if carried out, should give real impetus to Senator Lehman's suggestion. However, Negro leaders are worried about the effects of the merger, and their concern is clearly manifest by their attempt to get a Negro appointed to the proposed A. F. of L.-C. I. O. Executive Council.

LABOR generally seems to be taking a more progressive stand on matters of immigration policy. Traditionally the A. F. of L. favored exclusionary immigration laws and played a key role in the agitation against Orientals on the West Coast. But at recent hearings on the McCarran-Walter act spokesmen for both the C. I. O. and A. F. of L. favored changes in the quota formula and more liberal admission policies. Labor's attitude on the so-called "wetback" problem, while reflecting to some extent the traditional bias in favor of exclusionary policies, has nevertheless been accompanied by statements, such as those issued by the Texas State Federation of Labor-A. F. of L., which are a far cry from those issued by labor when the exclusionary immigration act of 1924 was adopted. Similarly, labor may be expected to take a more favorable position in defense of civil liberties. Like the country as a whole, it is beginning to move clear of the black shadow of fear and hysteria.

Labor and Political Action

ON NOVEMBER 8, 1955, American voters in a scattering of municipal and state elections provided political analysts with enough evidence to suggest two seemingly contradictory trends in so far as organized labor's role in politics was concerned. On the one hand, labor unions helped the Democrats score a series of stunning victories. Of special interest were the astonishing returns in Indiana, where New Castle, the battleground of the United Auto Workers and the Perfect Circle Corporation, threw out the incumbent Republican mayor who had been instrumental in using the National Guard to limit labor's rights in that long and bitter strike. The farm vote unquestionably helped in creating the Indiana revolt, but labor played an important role. On the other hand, in nearby Ohio, organized labor received a severe setback when it presented a strictly labor issue to the voting public, namely, a revision of the Ohio unemployment-compensation law including a clause that would make legal the payment of the modified guaranteed-annual-wage supplements negotiated by the U. A. W. with Ford and General Motors.

Contradictions such as this are typical of labor's political history in the last few decades. Does an A. F. of L.-C. I. O. merger promise labor greater consistency and effectiveness in political action? Will the 16,000,000 members of an A. F. of L.-C. I. O. be able to realize their full potential as a political force?

Politically, the trade-union movement developed along unexpected lines. As late as 1914 the A. F. of L. was "anti-political"; as an "aristocracy" of labor it moved on a narrow plane of so-called practical politics involving petty legislation—building-trades problems, the repeal of labor injunction laws, and so on. Its policy was expressed in Samuel Gompers's dictum: "Reward your friends and punish your enemies." This nonpartisanship was broken briefly in 1924 when the A. F. of L. endorsed Robert LaFollette for President. But this was a wayward fling at progressivism; even in the depths of the Great Depression the social and political outlook of the A. F. of L. remained so antiquated that it steadfastly refused to endorse a demand for national unemployment insurance.

But the events of the 1930's presented the A. F. of L. with a massive challenge. The depression-born C. I. O. was almost guaranteed to succeed precisely because its social and political outlook was in almost flat contradiction to that of the A. F. of L. With the C. I. O. was born a new and important role for labor in the political field. C. I. O.'s triumphs were in a sense a mass protest against craft unionism and the non-political character and passivity of the A. F. of L. Its freedom from racketeering, its rank-and-file democracy, its professed faith in the equality of races appealed to many workers and to large segments of the general public. It rushed into fields which the A. F. of L. had ignored, becoming immersed in politics from the very outset. The C. I. O. played an important role in the electoral victories of the New Deal.

AT THE C. I. O.'s helm in those early days was a group of radical young idealists who gave the new organization its political line and a crusading flavor. Even a cursory reading of the convention proceedings of the time conveys something of the dynamics of the movement; it appeared that at long last American labor was headed for the formation of a Labor Party. The creation of the American Labor Party of New York was, of course, just a first step.

Basking in the sunlight of the New Deal, the C. I. O. and even a reluctant A. F. of L. were embroiled in a series of legislative and political controversies in which their conscious goal was social reform. Almost lost was the realization that in the meantime organizational success and its attendant administrative problems were leading to dissipation of labor's new-found crusading spirit. Not until Doctor Win-the-War replaced the New Deal, and labor's ranks began to show increasing dissatisfaction with wartime restrictions, the wage freeze, and the evaporation of the idea of equality of sacrifice did the rank and file catch on to what was happening.

In Michigan a militant cadre of the U. A. W.-C. I. O. responded to the situation by forming the Michigan Commonwealth Federation, hoping that it would provide a beacon light for labor's political action throughout the nation. Meanwhile the American Labor Party had already gone through its first split when David Dubinsky refused to work with the Communist Party and helped to set up the Liberal Party in New York. History decreed a short life for the Michigan Commonwealth Federation; its program was vague, it was opposed by top C.I.O. officials who were determined to stick by President Roosevelt, and the country was drifting into the conservatism characteristic of a nation at war. In general, while the strains between the Democratic Party and labor leaders were visible on many issues, the alliance nevertheless managed to survive the war.

Part of this survival rested, of course, on the theory that labor must temporize until after the war. In the thinking of many labor leaders, the prospect of a postwar depression was coupled with the probability that there would be a swing to the Left, and that the time would then be ripe for the formation of some kind of national labor party. This feeling was encouraged by British Labor's success in defeating England's wartime hero, Winston Churchill. In this country speculative articles naming Walter Reuther as a possible Presidential candidate gained wide credence.

In retrospect, things turned out quite differently. Labor's postwar belligerence was almost entirely confined to economic issues. The most radical thing that the labor movement did in the postwar years was to accept Walter Reuther's "open-the-books" and the General Motors strike program. Labor's compromise victories of the period represented the end rather than the beginning of the expected "swing to the Left." If labor leaders were dissatisfied with, or in some cases had private contempt for Harry S. Truman as President, their feeling turned to unbounded admiration when the little man from Missouri fooled everybody and defeated Dewey in the 1948 election.

Truman's victory stopped the trend toward independent political action by labor dead in its tracks. Thereafter, despite many public speeches and proclamations to the contrary, Walter Reuther and the U. A. W. quietly dropped the idea of building their own political machine and decided to throw their energies into rebuilding the Democratic Party in Michigan. During 1946, 1947, and 1948 U. A. W. leaders could more easily be found at Democratic meetings than in ordinary union gatherings. In Michigan the C. I. O. had repeatedly backed losers in Detroit municipal elections, but in 1948 they found a surprising winner—Governor "Soapy" Williams. Since then Michigan politics, from labor's standpoint, have revolved around the relations of Governor Williams and Walter Reuther.

The Michigan pattern was typical of labor's shifted position throughout the nation in the 1948-1952 period. What had been an alliance of convenience between the Democratic Party and the labor movement, rationalized on the C. I. O. side as a technique for capturing the machinery and converting it to the use of a new labor party, had become a permanent marriage. The labor press ran fewer and fewer articles urging independent political action and settled down to loud praise of the Democratic Party as the party of the people.

Meanwhile the pressure of the C. I. O. had forced the A. F. of L. in 1948 to create Labor's League for Political Education. But this was never intended as a hat in the ring.

The most important test of labor's role within the Democratic Party came in 1950 when the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. went all out to defeat Senator Robert A. Taft in Ohio. The unions were so blinded by their hatred of the author of the Taft-Hartley law that they failed to look at their own candidate. Joe Ferguson was an inconsequential politician who, when asked what his foreign policy was, replied: "Beat Michigan." This witticism, at a time when all America was concerned with the cold war, hardly gave Ohio voters confidence in labor's judgment. Yet it never occurred to the union leaders that they might be licked. Nor did they realize, even after Taft's reelection, that their essentially "status quo" program for a long-dead New Deal had little glamour for vast new segments of American voters. The leaders thought that Taft's victory proved they hadn't worked hard enough, hadn't brought enough voters to the polls. It didn't dawn on them that there might be a youth vote, that 4,000,000 new voters had come on the scene in the last ten years; that there was a woman's vote, even in a union household. In fact, labor was so sure that it could win simply by ringing more doorbells that it saw Adlai Stevenson as a sure victor over Eisenhower in 1952. Even the cautious A. F. of L. abandoned its non-partisan straddle long enough to endorse its first major-party Presidential candidate.

Walter Reuther

The 1952 elections became a turning point for the labor movement on two fronts, organizational and political. After a moment of shocked realization that the New Deal was gone forever, influential labor leaders like George Meany and Walter Reuther saw the necessity of immediate labor unity. The approach to this goal in December of 1955 must be understood as a major defensive move on the part of labor. In its own way, it testifies to labor's failure in the arena of national politics. The unification of the C. I. O. and A. F. of L. under the pressure of political ineffectiveness is a marriage of diplomacy, not one of love. There are many grounds for conflict within what may soon become one union movement.

Labor has developed new political acumen. There is reason to believe that not all labor leaders would now agree with James L. McDevitt that "Any fellow who thinks we can better ourselves by staying out of politics is talking the way that the N. A. M. wants him to talk. In 1947 the membership of the A. F. of L. climbed to 7,600,000 workers, the greatest number in our history. Yet despite our strength the infamous Taft-Hartley Act was passed that year. How did this happen? That's easy. We had strength—but we didn't use it. Too many talked and too few acted. As a result we are paying through the nose in 1955 for our disinterest in the elections of 1946 and 1952." This repetition of the Taft alibi makes no sense in view of the size of the 1952 vote. The big turnout elected Eisenhower. Furthermore, various unions have since checked up on the voting attitudes of their own members; the U. A. W., to take one example, found that 25 per cent of the secondary leaders and an even greater number of the rank and file had voted for Eisenhower. Just getting out the vote is obviously not the answer.

BUT IF large parts of labor have learned what won't work, there is no clear evidence that it knows yet what will. The 1955 unification move is, we repeat, essentially a defensive tactic, dictated by the 1952 debacle. Labor still lacks faith in its own ideas, its influences, and its powers. Its spokesmen say, "We can't deliver the labor vote." They are still resigned to their role as second-class citizens in the Democratic Party. The illness of President Eisenhower, it must be admitted, has given a boost to labor's political morale. And now everyone is feeling more cheerful because of trends detected in the November 8 elections. As a result a new unified labor movement will carry on political activity at a level of intensity seldom seen in this country.

The question remains: Can labor ever reach its political goals by continuing to act as tail for the Democratic Party? Is there any evidence that the dilemmas that have perplexed labor in the last twenty years have decreased? Backed by a growing rebellion in the farm states and by the combined forces of the labor movement, the Democratic Party may very well win in 1956. But labor leaders cannot look forward to that victory with unmixed jubilation. Why should a new Democratic Congress act any better than the present one on key issues affecting the labor movement? Is Adam Clayton Powell likely to get more cooperation on F. E. P. C. than he does now? Does any labor leader seriously expect that victorious Democrats would repeal or basically amend the Taft-Hartley law? And how can the labor movement appeal to the general public when its foreign policy is no different from the Administration's?

To question still more deeply, can labor's economic program, which is essentially "guns and butter"—more defense with more social gains—stand the test of experience? In the 1952 elections labor's leaders gave unqualified support of the Democratic Party record, including Korea. This ran counter to the sentiment of a large segment of the rank and file, which yearned for peace and a new approach to world politics. The dissatisfaction helped Eisenhower and may well help the Republicans in 1956.

Can a unified labor movement be more effective in politics? More to the point, should labor be more effective in politics? In theory, a unified labor movement will set up housekeeping in well-cleaned quarters. If, as promised, corruption and racketeering are driven out of some sections of the labor movement, the American people will listen more attentively to labor's denunciation of Republican corruption and favoritism. If the discriminatory A. F. of L. unions let down their barriers, the Negro population will take more stock in the union champions of civil liberties. But not if the leaders continue to swallow the conservative and Dixiecrat tendencies in the Democratic Party. Senator Kefauver's phenomenal rise to national prominence is as much proof as anyone should need that large sectors of the American public, including union's rank and file, are tired of bossism and dictation from above. Will a united labor movement be sufficiently democratic to restore the confidence of its own members in the ideas and policies of the newly combined leadership?

And last, is labor capable of a self-appraisal and analysis candid enough to expose the reasons for its past defeats? Is it willing to educate new leaders and to suggest fresh ideas that can meet the problems confronting everybody in an epoch of world tensions and in a society that is restless, uncertain, and changing almost from day to day?

Labor and the Cold War

THE TWO great American labor federations were scheduled to unite at a time when profound changes in the international scene are everywhere compelling a reevaluation of past policies. To many observers it seems that the cold war—or at least its more freezing aspects—has come to a close. The Western monopoly of nuclear and thermonuclear weapons has been broken; now the threat of atomic annihilation is faced by all nations equally. The Afro-Asian conference at Bandung last spring symbolized the rising tide of nationalism and anti-colonialism which is flooding great areas of the world. The "spirit of Geneva" was in turn a symbol of the vast popular demand for the secure establishment of world peace.

Under these circumstances there is full agreement among A. F. of L. and C. I. O. leaders that foreign-policy matters must be given major attention by a merged organization. This would be no more than the logical continuation of a trend which has been perceptible in the labor movement for more than a decade. From isolationism in the early 1930's, labor has been swinging steadily toward internationalism and increased involvement in questions of foreign policy.

Organized labor grew immensely during World War II both in status and in numbers. The A. F. of L., recovering from the challenge of the C. I. O., emerged in the postwar period twice the size of its younger competitor and securely established as the dominant labor branch. The war years constituted a period of relative labor-management peace, with the government becoming arbiter of wages and working conditions. The intimacy between organized labor and government thus established carried into the postwar years and paved the way for labor's active support of the government's foreign policies.

General George Marshall

At the war's end the A. F. of L. wasted neither words nor time in stating its opposition to the idea of Big Three unity, a policy which it has maintained without compromise to the present day. During the A. F. of L.'s 1946 convention, the Executive Council stated:

> The U. S. S. R. and its subordinate "friendly" nations are not interested in making peace but in utilization of the peace forum as well as the occupation of conquered territory as opportunities to extend the control of the Communist Party and expand a despotism as cruel and bloody as any recorded in history.

The convention revealed the existence of a "secret" but undeniably major international labor apparatus in support of the cold war. President William Green introduced Irving Brown as the A. F. of L.'s European representative who had spent the previous eleven months making contacts with trade unionists in Western Europe. In his report to the convention, Mr. Brown leaped to the attack: "I say that the irreconcilable conflict in Europe today is the conflict between democracy and totalitarianism and it is our job . . . to lend every possible aid to . . . the free trade-union movement." Mr. Brown called for the speedy rebuilding of Germany with no reference to denazification or the elimination of cartels. In this, the A. F. of L. was ahead of official United States policy, which was then still tied to the Potsdam agreement for denazifying, decartelizing, and demilitarizing Germany.

JAY Lovestone, a former founder and head of the American Communist Party, exerted a powerful guiding influence on the postwar operations of the A. F. of L. in the foreign field. Since 1944 he has been the executive secretary of the federation's Free Trade Union Committee; he is also director of international labor relations for David Dubinsky's International Ladies Garment Workers Union. Irving Brown and other A. F. of L. agents like him are serving under the guidance of Lovestone. They have spent large amounts of money in an attempt to win over labor unions throughout the world to our side in the cold war.

Veteran labor reporter Edwin A. Lahey recently reported that "Lovestone's office in New York is a 'drop' for the world-wide system of intelligence agents who keep him up to date on affairs behind the iron curtain both in Europe and in Asia. Lovestone insists that there is no formal connection between him and the Department of State. But it can be said without qualification that the C. I. A., headed by Allen Dulles, brother of the Secretary of State, has in recent years obtained much of its primary information about international communism from Lovestone." (Washington Post, August 21.)

As for the C. I. O., its 1947 convention in Boston was the turning point. Sharp conflict arose on the question of the Marshall Plan. There was general agreement that the United States should assist needy nations; the issue was whether the aid should be given within the framework of Big Three unity via the U. N. and UNNRA, or within the framework of a "free-world" bloc aimed at containment or perhaps even liberating the Soviet bloc. In the end the "free-world" idea won unanimous approval and the C. I. O. moved to partnership with the A. F. of L. in supporting the government's cold-war policy.

Big guns were brought into play to achieve this result. Boston's Archbishop Cushing, delivering the opening address, gave not the usual benediction but a major speech. He warned the convention against "potential traitors to America and to our organizations in the labor movement," and called upon the C. I. O. for support of "such points and plans of American foreign policy as will put our resources—food, money, coal, clothing, friendship, and faith" behind the democratic nations in the "war on hunger, poverty, cold, discouragement, and fear in the war-breeding areas of the world."

Three days later, for the first time in American history, a Secretary of State, General George Marshall, appeared to address an American labor convention. Marshall spoke briefly, with dignity, discretion, and great effect. He called for wholehearted support of his plan, which had not yet been drawn up in detail by the Administration or by Congress. He warned: "We are faced with the danger of the actual disappearance of the characteristics of Western civilization on which our government and our manner of living depend." A few minutes later, the convention debated its foreign-policy plank, a resolution which so adroitly combined old and new positions of the C. I. O. that it eventually won unanimous support.

The entire labor movement was now lined up as an ally of the State Department and in support of a bipartisan policy aimed at mobilizing the "free world," under American leadership, against the Russian "threat."

There remained some highly interesting mopping-up operations, especially by the C. I. O. The controversy over the Marshall Plan became the issue on which both the C. I. O. and the British Trades Union Congress left the World Federation of Trade Unions. It was also a crucial issue, together with the related Wallace campaign of 1948, in the C. I. O.'s expulsion of eleven Left-orientated unions in 1949. In the same year the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. joined with the British T. U. C. to form the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in competition with the W. F. T. U. The State Department now moved quickly to appoint labor representatives to the staffs of various American embassies and foreign missions.

Since the end of the Korean war, public pressure for peace has mounted steadily. The implied (and kept) promise of Eisenhower to end the conflict in Korea revealed the political power of the peace issue. The trial balloon sent up to test the acceptability of American intervention to save French colonial rule in Indo-China was quickly shot down.

It is true that only three Senators finally voted against the Presidential request earlier this year for power to wage war to save the Quemoy and Matsu islands from Chinese Communist invasion. Public opposition to the request, however, was overwhelming. The New York Times correspondent James Reston reported:

> The reaction throughout the country against getting involved in a war over Matsu and Quemoy has been so strong that the President has felt he had to take it into account. . . . This anti-war sentiment also has had an influence on Republican political leaders, who are urging that the most effective appeal in the next year's Presidential campaign will be for the Republicans to go to the country as peacemakers. . . .

Last winter a Gallup poll showed that of all Americans who had an opinion on the issue, peaceful coexistence was favored by nearly 3 to 1. Great church organizations—led as usual by the courageous and principled Quakers—such as the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, the General Conference of the Methodist Church, and the World Council of Churches spoke out for their members in behalf of peaceful coexistence through negotiation.

But powerful forces in the country are opposing the trend to peace. The Republican leader in the Senate, Knowland of California, speaks for them when, in direct opposition to President Eisenhower, he charges that the Administration is appeasing world communism by accepting the "Soviet Trojan horse of coexistence."

Where, in this conflict of views, does organized labor stand? The A. F. of L., as represented by its Executive Council and President George Meany, stands with Knowland in aggressive opposition to the concept of coexistence. Speaking this year at the annual convention of the New York State A. F. of L., Mr. Meany expressed the fear that the Eisenhower Administration was substituting "massive appeasement" for its old doctrine of "massive retaliation." He urged that the United States reject "coexistence with gangsters." Again, addressing the American Legion convention last month, he assailed the "Geneva spirit" and brought the Legionnaires to their feet with an attack on the State Department for permitting "cultural exchanges" with Russia. He pledged that no trade-union delegations would visit the Soviet Union.

As early as 1952 the A. F. of L. was moving very close to open advocacy of war in the Far East. It urged official involvement of American military forces in both the Indo-China and Malayan conflicts. Early this year its Executive Council made a special plea to the West German Trade Union Federation to end its opposition to German rearmament—a plea which, incidentally, was firmly rejected by that strong anti-Communist body despite the best efforts of Messrs. Brown and Lovestone.

Nearly one-fifth of the Executive Council's report to the 1954 A. F. of L. convention directly touched foreign affairs. In it the council opposes colonialism and the United States pact with Spain, but the dominant theme of the report is the all-out crusade against the world "Communist menace" and the concept of coexistence. The report, which was unanimously approved by the convention, states that ". . . Geneva marks the culminating tragedy of all the many political, economic, and military mistakes made by the free world in the last decade." Nehru, Tito, Aneuran Bevan, and Ernest T. Wier are singled out as examples of dupes of the Soviet "peace line." The "new Soviet look," the report concludes, should lead to renewed effort by the United States to gain and hold allies in the cold war for a new offensive against the Soviet Union.

While the C. I. O.'s basic anti-Soviet orientation since 1947-48 is unquestioned, it has taken a back seat to the A. F. of L. in international operations; the crucial European field has been left exclusively to Lovestone and Brown. But there is evidence that the C. I. O. has been troubled by some of the consequences of the cold war. For example, John W. Livingston, vice president of the U. A. W., slated to be director of organizations in the merged A. F. of L.-C. I. O., reported in 1950 after a European visit:

> The Marshall Plan has been a miserable failure insofar as skilled wage-earners in Germany, Italy, and France are concerned. Huge profits of companies whose plants have been rebuilt and rehabilitated by Marshall Plan funds, and extremely low wages, have lowered worker morale to make effective and convincing Communist propaganda.

Similarly the president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers-C. I. O., Jacob Potofsky, who was scheduled to be co-chairman of the A. F. of L.-C. I. O. International Affairs Committee, said of the Marshall Plan in 1951: "Our money has been used primarily to strengthen the governments in power and the industrialists. The rich grow richer and the poor poorer."

The C. I. O. has vacillated on many foreign issues, reflecting its own doubts. When the Arbenz government was overthrown in Guatemala, the organization first expressed its antagonism to the military coup and then lapsed into discreet silence. At its convention last year it adopted a special resolution warning against the war dangers of the Knowland-China Lobby proposals concerning Formosa. A few months later, when Senators Lehman, Morse, and Langer, (all C. I. O.-endorsed) were locked in battle against the China Lobby program for the Quemoy and Matsu islands, the C. I. O. Executive Board, meeting in Washington at the time, uttered not a peep. Statements against colonialism, against deals with Fascist Spain, and Reuther's constructive and enlightened Positive Program for Peace have all lain dormant while the active and real impact of C. I. O. foreign policy has been to give approval to the cold-war policies of the State Department.

Within units of the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O., however, strong sentiment for peace and coexistence can be found. In November, 1954, the Butcher Workman, official magazine for the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen- A. F.

of L., edited by Patrick E. Gorman, said editorially:

> There are many, including the most forceful labor leader in the world today, President George Meany of the A. F. of L., who believe that coexistence with Russia is impossible. If this idea becomes the general thinking of the people of the United States then another world war is inevitable. In this era when uranium, hydrogen, and cobalt bombs are being stockpiled by the two great nations who know the secret of these monstrosities, we had better think twice before we definitely conclude that coexistence with Russia is out of the question. . . . This nation, as well as the nations of the world, must realize that the atom bomb is no longer the private property of any nation and if, as indicated herein, these monstrosities could destroy the human race, then we repeat again, it is COEXISTENCE OR NO-EXISTENCE.

The following month the publication of the Hotel and Restaurant Workers Union-A. F. of L. supported the stand of the Butcher Workman and added: "We can think of a lot of things that would be better for mankind than being blown together into a radioactive Outer Darkness, regardless of one's politics. One of them is quiet, unhurried collective bargaining, or diplomacy with everybody checking his shooting irons at the door."

Or consider the warning issued by the A. F. of L. paper, the Colorado Labor Advocate, just prior to the October foreign ministers' meeting in Geneva, that the ministers' task was "not rendered any easier by the undercurrent of distrust and cynicism." The paper expressed the hope that "Secretary of States Dulles and the United States delegation do not hearken to the voices of the all-or-nothing advocates who would just as soon provoke a world war as give in on a single point in the world game of give-and-take." And in October the annual convention of the Illinois A. F. of L., representing 900,000 workers, unanimously voted commendation to President Eisenhower for his efforts for peace at Geneva and urged continuing negotiations "on every possible level . . . in order to resolve the conflicts between East and West." This powerful A. F. of L. state body, underlining the peace issue in coming elections, urged that "labor-backed candidates for office become the best exponents of a genuine policy of peace in order to bring about the political defeat of those now in Congress and the Administration who oppose continuous negotiations to ease world tensions."

Fitzpatrick in St. Louis Post-Dispatch
Slow but Sure

The February 1 issue of Labor's Daily, published by the International Typographical Union-A. F. of L., praised Senators Lehman, Morse, and Langer for their fight against the "blank check for war" in the Quemoy-Matsu islands and warned against the dangers of "preventive" war. The May issue of Labor, the publication of the railway workers' union, also supported the Morse-Lehman-Langer position and declared that "conciliatory moves" by both the Soviet Union and Communist China had sent a "wave of hesitant hope throughout the world."

Many C. I. O. unions, too, have shown an independent attitude toward foreign policy and the cold war. In February, 1952, when the Korean war was still raging, the International Executive Board of the United Packinghouse Workers of America-C.I.O., after what it termed a "searching discussion," adopted a statement entitled The Road Ahead which set forth the following formula for peace:

> . . . A prompt armistice and an end to the fighting in Korea; a political settlement by good-faith negotiations in the Far East including recognition and admission to the U. N. of the government which now actually represents the Chinese people and with which, realistically, such a settlement must be made; settlement of world issues by international negotiation; and international armament reduction.

When the threat of war grew intense around Formosa early this year Al Hartung, president of the International Woodworkers Union-C. I. O. and a member of the C. I. O. committee working out the A. F. of L.-C. I. O. merger agreement, told a convention of his union: "I don't want your sons to fight for the rotten, corrupt leadership of Chiang Kai-shek. . . . One of our greatest mistakes was support for the kind of leadership such as Chiang Kai-shek's. We did it in Korea and now we're doing it in Formosa." And in February the C. I. O. Packinghouse Worker, in an editorial entitled Formosa Folly, blasted those who, they said, were responsible for the increasing threat of war. They charged that ". . . the Administration's policy is booby-trapped in a dozen different ways. It cannot succeed in the long run and responsible leaders had better come forward promptly with a policy based on world-wide political realities instead of wishful thinking and hysterical anti-communism."

WHEN, in 1953, Adlai Stevenson made an appeal to keep open all channels to a negotiated agreement with the Soviet Union, the Advance, organ of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers-C. I. O., editorially praised his stand and said: "No matter how we despise communism, that is no excuse to slam the door to the conference room. That door must be kept open and we must continue entering the room in a dignified pursuit of resolving peacefully the differences that exist between the democratic world and Soviet dictatorship." The Textile Workers Union-C. I. O. echoed the sentiment: "Stevenson stressed what cannot be repeated too often—our country must make it clear to the world that our goal is peace; that if we possibly can, we want to live in harmony with the Russians, not to exterminate them."

The August 1 issue of Advance reprinted in full the famous Russell-Einstein statement (signed also by seven other noted scientists) calling for a ban on war. It added a note of its own: "Today, more than ever, the quest for peace and an end to war is the one single goal of man, for today, man finally contains the means of his own complete destruction—the hydrogen bomb." Jacob Potovfsky, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, is slated to be co-chairman (with the A. F. of L.'s Matthew Woll) of the International Affairs Committee of the merged federations.

Thoughtful observers everywhere are suggesting that America's foreign policy is failing in its professed aims. The millions who are in search of peace have the right to look to the ranks of labor for support—and perhaps for leadership. Whether that challenge is met will depend on whether the drive toward peace, undeniably widespread through the rank and file of the labor movement, can break through the crust of a top-level policy which sees "containment" and "liberation" as more desirable goals than peaceful coexistence.

The Challenge of Automation

AUTOMATION, the rapidly expanding technique of replacing both skilled and unskilled workers by even more skilled and infinitely more productive machines, presents labor and the national economy with their major future problem. While automation is essentially only another phase in the advance of technology which has marked the industrial revolution since the beginning of the nineteenth century, the speed of its development and the magnitude of the labor displacement which it threatens creates apprehensions made even more vivid by memory of the technological displacements of the past.

It is not only that the hands of men are being replaced by more accurate machines, but the mind of man, hitherto an essential component of labor's skill, is being replaced by the electronic mind which does not make errors in its mental processes, and in which vacuum tubes replace man's fallible memory. The linking of the electronic mind in the form of the computer and its variations to the high-speed producing and assembling machines poses a threat similar to that of the steam loom of the early 1800's, but of such a difference in magnitude as to invite the comparison between the H-bomb and gunpowder.

The modern union knows that the only possible orderly solution of the problem created by automation lies in continuing full employment, so that men displaced by machines can find other jobs. Since World War II, the prosperous economic environment has permitted individuals, for the most part, to shift to jobs in which they were interested. However, although our labor force is at present at an all-time high, trade unions have grave misgivings about the continuance of full employment. Fundamentally, they see that while our industrial production is 41 per cent above the years 1947-49, employment has risen only 8.3 per cent. October figures showed a rise in the employed, yet unemployment as calculated by the Bureau of the Census was reported at 2,100,000. Despite the high activity, jobs in manufacturing industries in September, 1955, were 600,000 fewer than in September, 1953—80,000 below in mining and 100,000 below in transportation, public utilities, and contract construction. Obviously man-hour productivity has been rising rapidly.

Prior to World War I, man-hour productivity increased at a rate of less than 1.5 per cent per annum. It was 2.5 per cent in the inter-war era. Since 1947 it has attained a level of over 3 per cent. There is every likelihood that it will rise to 4 per cent before the end of the decade and 5 per cent thereafter. To single out one industry: in textiles, where man-hour productivity has been growing at the rate of 5 per cent per annum and total output has been stationary, employment has dropped during the last five years from 1,250,000 to less than 1,000,000—a decrease of 20 per cent.

Superimpose on this somewhat unstable structure the dislocation of modern automation, and we can see the problem in its bare essentials. Take, for example, an instance of "Detroit" automation which has so avidly been taken up by several large automobile manufacturers. In this system, a number of machines are linked together so that the material is automatically carried, positioned, and processed from one station to another in a continuous production flow. The new Milpital, California, Ford assembly plant, which uses this system, requires thirty man-hours per assembled car in contrast to the thirty-five man-hours at the older Richmond plant.

The dislocation process threatens the job security not only of the ordinary worker, but also of the highly skilled technician. For example, some of the major glass companies have developed machinery which detects flaws in the glass passing under its electronic eyes. In the past, highly skilled workers have marked out with crayon those sections which must be cut from the flowing stream of glass to eliminate flaws. The accuracy of their markings and their experience in detection of flaws earned them high wage rates. Now the machines mark the flaws with even greater accuracy and with a saving of all the labor previously engaged on the job.

NOT ONLY manufacturing companies, but banks, insurance companies, railroads, airlines, and public utilities are moving to automation to increase rapidity of calculation and facilitate business decisions. Centralized warehouses are able to cut labor costs by 50 per cent and space by 25 per cent. New military uses, of course, have utilized these same techniques in guided missiles, radar control, and submarine detection. The newest application of tape controls of machine tools is opening up varied industrial applications.

This enormous increase in productivity which will give us more goods and services at lower costs poses a lesser threat if consumer demand keeps pace, and there is no doubt that consumer habits are changing rapidly. The American consumer has been adding to the dynamics of our economy. He has moved to the suburbs and changed his way of life. As a home-owner, he has turned to a myriad of do-it-yourself activities. The television has tied him to his living room, and vacations have added to his desire for transportation and mobility. He is more than ever susceptible to fads and new crazes. In the postwar years the growth of the Southeast and Southwest has opened up new markets and new industry has settled there. So long as the present level of high profit and full employment is maintained, we can expect the American citizen to consume more and more.

But the lessons of history are against complacent acceptance of the "high plateau" theory, i. e., that increased consumption will keep abreast of high production. The tragedies of the first industrial revolution are being studied in the schoolroom by our children. The depression of 1929-33 was associated with technological displacement. Innovations and technical obsolescence are no guaranties of high employment, and new technology often discourages investment for fear of rapid obsolescence and the necessity for accelerated depreciation. And if lower employment and decreased earnings retard consumer spending, the "plateau" will tilt sharply downward.

Federated Press

"And this will cut down the demand for a Labor Day holiday, too"

Furthermore, the task of maintaining full employment is a staggering one. We must provide employment for many of the 2,100,000 currently employed who want jobs, and in addition we must also annually create enough new jobs to absorb the 800,000 new workers who join the labor force each year. And new jobs must be provided for the more than two million workers who have to change occupations yearly because of the rising productivity which we have been discussing.

That automation and its increased productivity and displaced personnel will raise grave problems needs no further elaboration or proof, but the question of what should be done to solve these problems must be answered.

Firstly, purchasing power must be kept high by a graduated-tax system that eliminates many of the present loopholes which favor property interests and which have reduced effectiveness in assuring an adequate balance in our income distribution. Rising wage levels secured through collective bargaining and national wage patterns can help to keep the balance, but there must be no oversight, as at present, of millions of potential consumers who, because they are not enjoying adequate increases in income, are limiting the ability of the economic system to respond to the challenge.

Secondly, the existing safeguards set up to protect purchasing power must be maintained and expanded. Unemployment insurance, old-age pensions, workmen's compensation, sickness benefits, and minimum wages are examples of balancing elements which have been built into our system through legislation. But in light of the increased need for purchasing power demanded by growing productivity, more liberal coverage and benefits are required. The unions are demanding higher rates for automated jobs, guaranteed annual wages, and additional unemployment benefits. Earlier retirement benefits have been urged for the displaced who are unable to adjust themselves to the technological revolution. Severance pay and early vested private pension systems can help to cushion bumps of a highly dynamic society.

Thirdly, theories of labor seniority will have to be restudied because individual workers will suddenly find their lifetime investments in their skills are worthless. Seniority systems will have to call for greater degree of transferability from plant to plant; for the highly skilled worker, unlike in the past, stands in as much or more danger of displacement by the vacuum tube and the servo unit as his less skilled co-worker.

Finally, the shorter work week, the classic answer to increased productivity, deserves new study and new emphasis. A shorter than forty-hour work week is already prevalent in coal mining, rubber, building, and women's apparel, but leadership in this field must now be exercised by unions in the mass-production industries. The thirty-hour week has already become a popular battlecry among the A. F. of L. craft unions, and the newly unified labor movement will no doubt take up this issue as the most effective method of preventing productivity from completely overbalancing distribution. The shorter work week, with its attendant opportunities for developing additional consumer demands by reason of greater opportunities for leisure, presents the best single answer to automation.

We are not only on the verge of a new phase of the industrial revolution; we are in it. America's strength and future depend upon the solutions which government, the trade unions, and the public at large find for the multiple and complex problems presented by automation.

Labor-Management Legislation Heads for Climax

'Right to Work,' Anti-Mass Picketing Bills Are Introduced

By ROY GRIMES
Post Austin Correspondent

AUSTIN, Jan. 29.—(Sp)—Fluid was the word Wednesday for the Fiftieth legislature's attitude on new labor-management legislation for Texas, but efforts to crystalize sentiment toward restrictive measures was gathering force.

Representative Marshall O. Bell of San Antonio chose the day after Governor Beauford Jester had delivered his first message to the legislature to come forward with the 1947 version of the "right to work" bill.

The same bill, which in effect would outlaw the closed shop in Texas, was passed by the House in the Forty-ninth legislature but was voted down in the Senate.

In its renewed appearance, the act was a joint presentation by Representatives Bell, Charles A. Murphy Jr., of Houston and Joe M. Kilgore of Edinburg.

Outcry Expected

The measure which may bring even more of an outcry from labor spokesmen was introduced by Representative John J. Bell of Cuero. Ostensibly an anti-mass picketing regulation, it carries sections which could make it considerably wider in scope and application.

One section would prohibit picketing in any labor-management dispute involving an existing lawful contract. Another would make it unlawful for two pickets to be within 300 feet of each other at any time. Still another would classify as slander the utterance or display of any oral or written misrepresentation in connection with picketing.

Pair Talk Up Bills

At the same time, Senator James A. Stanford of Austin and Representative Roger Q. Evans of Denison were talking up the merits of identical bills they have brought before their respective bodies following a conciliatory line of labor legislation.

The Stanford-Evans bills call for setting up a division of industrial and labor relations within the bureau of labor statistics and prescribe state mediation machinery for labor disputes.

Neither the restrictive terms of the two Bell (they are unrelated) bills nor the conciliatory provisions of the Stanford-Evans measures meet the recommendations detailed by Governor Jester on labor-management legislation in his opening message Tuesday.

Jester's Program

The Governor used three pages of his address to lay before the legislators what he thought the state could and ought to do about labor-management relations in Texas.

Much of it was in quotation from a statement by President Woodrow Wilson in 1919, keynoted by the thought that "the right of individuals to strike is inviolate and ought not to be interfered with by any process of government, but there is a predominant right, and that is the right of the government to protect all of its people and to assert its power and majesty against the challenge of any class."

Views Summed Up

Summing up the views of Governor Jester, three main points of action for the legislature were recommended:

1. That the legislature consider the enactment of a labor conciliation act similar in purpose to those of Minnesota and Wisconsin.

2. That the legislature replace the bureau of labor statistics, which renders no service as a conciliation agency, with a department of labor and industry to operate under a commission which would have equal representation from employers and labor and a larger representation from the public.

3. That the legislature outlaw strikes against the state or any of its political subdivisions.

Echo of 1945 Effort

Representative Bell's "right to work" proposal, virtually an exact echoe of his 1945 effort to knock out the closed shop, was co-authored by 22 other representatives including W. A. (Bill) Miller of Houston.

Its caption terms it an act "providing that the inherent right of a person to work and bargain freely with his employer, individually or collectively, for terms and conditions of his employment shall not be denied or infringed by law or by any organization of whatever nature; that no person shall be denied employment because of membership or non-membership in a labor union, providing that certain types of contracts shall be void and that this act shall not apply to existing contracts."

The act's biggest stick against the closed shop is in the section on contracts

"Any contract which requires or prescribes that employes or applicants for employment in order to work for an employer shall or shall not be or remain members of a labor union, shall be null and void and against public policy. The provisions of this section shall not apply to any contract or contracts heretofore executed but shall apply to any renewal or extension of any existing contract and to any new agreement or contract executed after the effective date of this act."

Almost Identical

A bill carrying almost identical provisions was filed for introduction Monday by Representatives Wayne Wagonseller of Fruitland, Joe B. Fleming of Henderson and Paul S. Wilson of Geneva. Representatives Fleming and Wilson also signed the Bell measure.

Senator Stanford and Representative Evans came out Wednesday with a statement pointing up the advantages of their bill on state mediation of labor controversies.

"Both Governor Jester and Lieutenant Governor Allan Shivers warn us against the evils of punitive labor legislation," they observed. "This bill heeds their warnings for it is not such a bill. It is a long needed complement of what we already have. It coordinates and makes more workable the labor laws now on our statute books."

Mediator Envisaged

"Their measure, besides creating the division of industrial and labor relations, would provide for a director to be appointed by the labor commissioner to serve as a state mediator in labor disputes.

The director would assist employer and employes in peaceful and voluntary settlement of controversies, to inqure into causes of differences and of industrial strife and unrest, to assist in promoting mediation, conciliation and voluntary arbitration, to collect statistical data, and to make special investigations.

In case of failure or refusal to gree in a labor dispute, the state irector would be required to call he dispute to the attention of the governor and the members of the state industrial commission within 10 days before expiration of an existing agreement. This provision would call into effect the industrial commission act of 1920, almost unused since it became a law.

Under the Stanford-Evans bill, if no agreement is reached before a contract expires, both parties must wait 10 days before a strike, work stoppage or lockout could be instituted. If either party should refuse mediation, the state director is empowered to investigate and file a public report of his findings.

The bill, its backers claimed Wednesday, would function "to keep in touch with the status of labor-management contracts and when they are about to expire to enter the discussion for mediation . . . We feel that Texas should have such a service to attempt to solve disputes by voluntary means in intra-state commerce.

"In the event the division of industrial and labor relations is unable to prevent a work stoppage by voluntary means, we now have a law to take over at that point to protect the public interest. . . . We refer to the state industrial commission. . . . Appointed by the Governor and made up of one representative of management, one of labor, and three representatives of the public. Its function is to hold public hearings, determine the true facts, and make public recommendations to the Governor in the case. It is based on the fact that an informed public opinion is the most powerful force on earth.

Since the hearing of this fact-finding commission is open to the press and public, it will be easy for the public to determine which side is right. The one which is wrong will have to back down.

"Our bill will establish the public interest before the strike. We already have it established after the strike begins."

~~REPRODUCTION OF~~ AN ADDRESS BY

ATTORNEY GENERAL ROBERT F. KENNEDY

TO THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

HOUSE OF DELEGATES

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

AUGUST 6, 1962

I am delighted to have this chance to speak today before this convention of the American Bar Association. Our system of judicial administration requires the closest possible cooperation between the Department of Justice and the lawyers of the land; and as Attorney General, I appreciate the opportunity to discuss matters of common concern with the distinguished representatives of the bar who I find in this room today.

Every department in the Executive Branch regards its mission as indispensable to the functioning of our democracy. But I cannot help feeling that the Department of Justice has a special and urgent responsibility, for the quest for justice is the very heart of the democratic experiment.

This, in my view, is a central and continuing obligation of the Attorney General's office as it must be for every lawyer. In meeting that responsibility I am heartened by the knowledge that we have the support, not only of our whole ethical and political tradition, but more particularly of the men and women who must see that the system operates and expands in this modern society of immense and unforeseen problems, of men, like yourselves, trained in the ideals and processes of Anglo-Saxon justice.

It has never been more important than it is today that free society display its capacity for justice. For here at home and all around the globe our system stands on trial before the world--our beliefs and our actions are pitted against a determined and resourceful and disciplined adversary--while in our own land urbanization, automation, the demand for equal rights in an age of bigness, all bear down upon us with a host of new and pressing problems.

Today, the advances of technology have become so rapid that frequently they tend to outstrip our capacity to deal with their impact upon our social and industrial system. Land urbanization has intensified a host of old problems, besides introducing new ones.

Automation is causing a situation in many areas of our country similar to 19th century England when the handicraft of a federal age was replaced by the machine-craft of the industrial age. The rise of associational activity has brought its special problems into the field of monoply and restraint of trade, into the organizational activities of labor unions, and into the dark and dirty world of crime.

The very complexity of modern life makes it easy for individual liberities to be disregarded. More and more the American people must rely on the law for the protection of these liberties.

It is here that you and I have such a heavy responsibility. For it rests on us to be certain that the legal protections so necessary for the individual do not become merely fine declarations in the lawbooks but that they actually have some real and genuine meaning for human beings to whom they have been granted. This task requires the care and attention of the whole legal profession.

At the Department of Justice, we are just part of this effort and as such have our limitations.

We recognize for instance that the line between what the Federal Government can and should do and what state and local authorities can and should do is often shadowy. Frequently it is the sum total of these efforts that counts. For this reason it is vital that we work closely and continuously with local authorities in achieving our common objectives.

No issues brings the role of the individual into sharper focus than that of civil rights. I am proud of the record of the Departmen of Justice in recents months in striving to assure all citizens the full rights guaranteed them under the constitution of the United States.

Assistant Attorney General Burke Marshall and his aides are performing a distingushed service in this respect--a service which goes far beyond instituting and prosecuting cases in the Federal courts. We have not filed a single civil rights case without first going to the local authorities. We have informed them of what appears to us to be a violation of the law, for, the Constitution being the law of the land, the local authorities--judges, prosecutors and lawyers--have an equal obligation to protect and defend it.

In the majority of cases, the local officials have taken action and nothing further has been required of the Federal Government. There are no front page news stories, but there are changes; there are results and they are brought about by local officials--not the Government in Washington. In the long run this is what is of real importance in this country

Sometimes the local authorities have disagreed with us about the law, and we have gone to court. On other occasions, local authorities were unwilling to remedy the situation, or could not because of what they believed to be the political facts of life, and so court action was necessary.

In all this effort Burke Marshall has been in the forefront, negotiating, prodding, advising, persuading--working with explosive problems and devising solutions which fulfill the law of our land the ideals of our nation. This is the historic role of the lawyer in the fullest sense.

I am proud, too, of those Federal judges who have seen and done their duty under difficult circumstances. A judge's popularity or unpopularity is of no proper concern to him in the performance of his judicial duties. Yet to do that duty--to give an honest reading of the constitution and of the law of the land--may and often does require great courage.

I might add that this is also the sworn obligation of every lawyer. If the bar has done much to assist in the orderly realization of constitutional rights, I would be less than candid if I did not tell you that I believe more can and should be done.

Another area of concern to every private citizen-and every lawyer - is the war against organized crime. Crime is not only a cause of economic waste, but far worse than that, it is a reproach to the moral pretensions of our society- and advertises to the world the gap between our pronouncements and our performance.

The battle against crime must have a top priority in protecting individual rights. We have heard much about the rights of the individual and with this I have no quarrel - but the general public also has some rights that need to be protected. We have made some encouraging gains in the last twenty months.

The criminal division for the first time is spearheading a coordinated drive by all Federal law enforcement agencies to reduce the entrenched power and wealth of organized crime to the point where it can be cotrolled by local authorities. Desperately needed legislation has been enacted in a bipartisan effort. Intensive investigations are being conducted into the corruption of public officials where unfortunately the inroads of organized crime are particularly frightening. We are moving forward in a systematic way but we have far to go.

A third field of prime consequence to individual rights is the protection of the competive forces in our system of private enterprise.

This is, prehaps, the most technical and complicated field with which the Department is concerned.

Obviously, there are certain areas of the Antitrust law where the guidelines have been set so definitively that no excuse for transgressing them properly can be made. This is true, for example, of conspiracies to fix prices or to apportion territories. In such cases there can be no hesitancy on the part of the Government to act.

In many other areas, however, there are complex economic situations which require deep study and understanding when action is contemplated. The Antitrust laws should be vigorously enforced byt they are weapons which should be utilized to help the consumer, the businessman both large and small - and to protect and preserve the free enterprise system. That is our intention. This is our effort.

In all of these matters, as well as the many others that come within our mutal area of responsibility, I cannot help but be concerned as to whether, despite the efforts of dedicated public officials and conscientious lawyers--there is in fact equal justice before the law here in the United States. I am speaking now of a concern for whether there is true equality in the administration of justice.

I ask you --do members of ethnic or political minorities or people who speak our language imperfectly or who have low mentality or disturbed minds; or the largest group, those who are poor really receive the same protection before the courts as the rest of our citizens? I say that all too often they do not.

I need hardly say to this audience that everyone in this land--whether immigrant or pauper, alleged crook or communist--is innocent until proven guilty and is entitled to as fair a trial and as competent representation as say, leading citizens accused of price-fixing in business or of corruption in labor.

It seems to me that our obligation - your obligation as attorneys in private practice and my obligation as Attorney General--is to make the assurance of fair and equal treatment to all before the law one of our first concerns.

Judge Learned Hand, speaking at the 75th Anniversayr of the Legal Aid Society of New York, said if we are to keep our democracy, there must be one commandment:

"Thou shalt not ration justice."

Let me discuss with you just a few of the areas which must cause us all concern. One is the problem of the representation of indigent defendants. This is not a problem of charity, but of Justice.

Mr. Justice Black points out in Griffin v. Illinois, "there can be no equal justice where the kind of trial a man gets depends upon the amount of money he has."

This is true not only at the time of trial, but during the entire range of legal procedure until the last issue is resolved.

Over a year ago, I asked a distinguished committee, headed by Professor Francis Allen of the University of Michigan Law School, to study what could be done to protect the rights of indigents in the Federal courts. The committee has found that much is being done in certain areas of the country. But its study shows that much, much more needs to be done.

Last year, almost thirty percent of the defendants in the 34,008 criminal cases in Federal court could not afford counsel. In the District of Columbia, where the Federal District Court hears all felony cases, over half the defendants had to be assigned attorneys. The situation in the states is comparable.

Federal and most state jurisdictions now hold that the right to counsel at trial is an affirmative right which must be extended by the Government when thedefendant cannot provide his own.

Last June, the Supreme Court called for argument upon the question of right to counsel and whether the decision in Betts v. Brady should be overruled.

The recent decision in Mapp v. Ohio suggests by analogy that a majority may now hold that the Fourteenth Amentment requires states to provide counsel for indigent defendants in all cases involving serious crimes. And a recent decision by the Organ Supreme Court has held that in serious crimes the state must not only provide counsel but experienced, competent counsel.

The provision of counsel is indispensable to a democratic system of justice. But translating this principle into practice is difficult. As with most problems, one of the stumbling blocks is lack of money.

And as Professor Allen's committee discovered the problem does not end by merely providing an attorney. There are the added frequently expensive problems such as bail, pretrial investigations and appeal.

The problem of bail for instance is one that has received too little attention. Professor Allen's committee has established conclusively that the question of whether a man will be kept in jail pending trial or be free is directly influenced by how wealthy he is.

A study of cases in the Southern District of New York indicates that over one-third of those required to post bail of $500 or less could not do so. When the bail was set between $500 and $1500, over half were unable to post it. And there is reason to believe that many of those unable to provide bail presentoed to substantial risk of non-appearance. Their poverty deprived them of their liberty.

Further, the problem of establishin innocence during the crucial pretrial period was made that much more difficult.

Bail protects the interests of sociey in assuring a defentant's appearance at trial and it also protects the interests of the individual in allowing him defense, and cannot take an active part to prove his innocence.

But the indigent defendant who cannot offer security for his appearance is denied this opportunity. He cannot provide for his family and for his defense, and cannot take an active part to prove his innonce.

Preliminary studies in the Southern District of New York also indicate that those who cannot make bail are more often convicted and receive stiffer sentences than those who can.

The rights of the indigent after the trial is over--in the appeal stage--is equally a matter of concern.

A series of court decisions in the last twenty years has greatly expanded the responsibility of society to help the indigent perfect his appeal. He is now pledged virtually the same treatment as one who can pay,and this is as it must be.

But, again the problem of translating this right into reality is difficult. Appellate work is time consuming and requires the highest professional ability.

It usually is an undue burden to call upon counsel, who has contributed his services at trial, to continue on appeal without compensation Competent new counsel is sometimes difficult to obtain. In this connection I wish to congratulate the bar of the city of San Francisco on what effort it has made in providing counsel for indigent persons on appeal.

We have come a long way since 1876 when a group of German immigrants banded together in New York to form the first Legal Aid Society, but we have not come far enough.

Since 1937, the Department of Justice and for many years the American Bar Association have supported legislation which would apporpriate funds to help indigent defendants in Federal courts.

Now 25 years later it is still pending before the judiciary committees of both houses of Congress. The time to translate good intentions into law is long overdue. I ask for your help as a group and as individuals in working for its enactment.

I recognize that much has been done in many local areas to cope with this problem. I congratulate you on what you have done. Yet, the problem is far from solved. Whatever device is used, it is to the bar that society must turn for legal services to be provided for the indigent. It is inescapably a responsibility of the legal profession-a responsibility that none of us can avoid.

Another problem which is closely related and in some ways is even more difficult is thedefense of those who do not fall in the category of indigent but who have limited resources available for their defens. Over forty percent of our families have incomes of less than $5,000 a year. These families cannot bear the cost of a complicated and extended trial and appeal which could easily equal their annual income.

Indeed, it can be the case that an indigent defendant, through the services of a first-rate volunteer attorney, may receive a better defense than one who pays a small fee and gets incompetent or indifferent counsel.

Legal services, particularly defense in criminal cases, are not like houses or automobiles where those with more moeny can buy better products without affecting the basic functioning of society. When one defendant cannot afford a complete defense justice is being rationed.

Today the cost of adequate defense can be high. Psychiatric and highly technical issues require expensive research, investigation and expert witnesses fot the defense as well as for the Government.

In a recent case in which the Government was involved the defendant spent nearly $500,000 in legal and accounting fees in defending himself. He is now in prison. But the point is that we must be certain that the average citizen of a family income of $5700 --the national median--can afford comparable efforts to protect his freedom. There is no question that a man prepared to spend $500,000 is far more likely to retain his freedom than a man who can afford only a few thousand dollars.

The amount of money which can be expended on defense should not affect the outcome of the trial. If justice is priced in the market place, individual liberty will be curtailed and respect for law diminished.

There is no easy answer to this problem; again, it lies with the bar itself. Professor Allen's committee is continuing its study of the problem and will have recommendations to make before the end of the year. I would like to ask for recommendations and ideas from the bar. I think they could be most important, and from all of this I would hope that we would develop methods whereby our finest legal talent would not be reserved solely for those who could pay without difficulty and an occasional indigent defendant.

I would hope from this effort that leading lawyers and legal scholars would be in court on a regular basis pleading for defendants of moderate circumstances. As long as a man is handicapped before the bar of justice because of his proverty, our task as lawyers is not done.

I thank you for this opportunity to speak.

Fortunately, no generation of lawyers as yet has lost that desire for a just society that will preserve the dignity of man and his individual right to search for happiness.

This association and its kindred associations in our fifty states and hundreds of counties and cities will, I feel sure, keep that desire aflame.

Let us as lawyers - as Americans - as Theofore Roosevelt said, "Bold ly face the life of strife, resolute to do our duty well and manfully; resolute to uphold righteosness by deed and by work; resolute to be both honest and brave, to serve high ideals, yet use pratical methods. Above all, let us shrink from no strife moral or physical."

A bar dedicated to the preservation of our basic fredoms, pledged to the search for truth, is a main bulwark of our democtatic society which can aid mightily to achieve that President Kennedy recently described as a "world of law and free choice, banishing the world of war and coercion."

LAWYER'S DUTY IN "CIVIL RIGHTS" —PRO AND CON

Are lawyers who take cases that challenge civil-rights statutes and court decisions "professionally irresponsible"?

That charge has been made by Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy. In an answering statement, John Creighton Satterfield, president of the American Bar Association, 1961-62, says Mr. Kennedy is conducting a campaign of "government by intimidation."

Here are both sides of a growing dispute.

"THE SANCTITY OF THE LAW IS IN JEOPARDY"

Following is full text of an address by Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy to the Missouri Bar Association, at Kansas City, Mo., Sept. 27, 1963:

Attorney General Kennedy

I am grateful for the opportunity to talk with this distinguished group.

Yours is one of the strongest and most vital bar organizations in the country. That you have won the American Bar Association's top Award of Merit twice within the last four years is an honor that speaks for itself—and I am impressed, too, by several other examples of your leadership in matters of civic concern.

Your scheduling of a discussion on the representation of the indigent accused is only one such example.

Everything I have read and heard about your activities suggests courage, high principle, and true engagement with the social realities of our time. You are to be congratulated.

But it is regrettable that the same spirit is not shared by all lawyers and public officials throughout the country. If it were, our nationwide problems in civil rights would be much less severe than they are.

To a far greater extent than most Americans realize, the crisis in civil rights reflects a crisis in the legal profession—in the whole judicial system on which our concept of justice depends.

I'd like to discuss three legal propositions with you. Each of them is part of a time-honored and noble tradition—and each of them, today, is being used to threaten the very foundations of law and order in this country.

The first is the proposition that it is proper and just to avail oneself of every legal defense to test either the validity or the applicability of a rule of law.

The second is that a court decision binds only those persons who are a party to it.

The third is that a court-made rule of law should always be open to re-examination, and is susceptible to being overruled on a subsequent occasion.

All three ideas are basic to our system of justice; none of them needs any explanation or defense to an audience of skilled advocates such as yourselves.

But today we have only to pick up a newspaper to see how these honorable principles—used in isolation, invoked in improper contexts, espoused as absolutes and carried to extremes—have placed the sanctity of the law in jeopardy.

Separately and in combination, they are being proclaimed by lawyers and public officials as the justification for tactics to obstruct the enforcement of laws and court orders—as the rationale, that is, for withholding justice and equality from the grasp of millions of our fellow Americans.

We are all familiar with the catch phrases of that rationale, and with the air of righteous indignation in their utterance.

The argument goes something like this:

Brown v. the Board of Education is not the law of the land; it governs only one particular set of facts and is binding only upon the litigants of that case.

Only when each separate school district, each State, and each new set of administrative procedures has been tested and judged on its own merits can it be said that a binding decision has been reached.

And furthermore—so the argument goes—a decision like Brown, repugnant to certain segments of the population and clearly difficult to enforce, may conceivably be overruled as bad law.

To resist it, therefore, is merely to exercise one's constitutional right to seek reversal of a judicial ruling.

When stated that way and surrounded by rhetoric, the argument can be made to have a gloss of respectability. It can even take on the disguise of patriotic, high-minded dissent. Indeed, it is a position publicly espoused today by the Governors of two States, by a past president of the American Bar Association, and by a federal district judge who recently overruled the Brown decision on grounds that its findings of fact were erroneous.

We cannot blame a layman—even a reasonably fair-

. . . Legal system must be "responsive to legitimate grievances" minded layman—for being confused and misled by this kind of reasoning.

But to lawyers, it smacks of duplicity. When it comes from the mouths of other lawyers, we must recognize it as professionally irresponsible. And when it comes from the mouths of public officials, we must recognize it as nothing more or less than demagoguery.

Let's go over those three legal principles one at a time. Let's examine each of them and look for the danger that lies within it.

What do we really mean, as lawyers, when we say that it is proper and constitutional to avail oneself of every legal defense?

Surely the Canons of Ethics make clear the impropriety of using dilatory tactics to frustrate the cause of justice.

We have only to imagine that principle being constantly applied across the board, in day-to-day litigation, to see that, for all its validity, it must be met by a counterprinciple—a concept that might be called the principle of good faith.

Every lawyer knows—though his clients may not—that nothing but national chaos would result if all lawyers were to object to every interrogatory, resist every subpoena duces tecum and every disposition, seek every possible continuance and postponement, frame unresponsive pleadings, and resist court orders to a point just short of contempt.

We know that tolerances are built into the system. We know what the margins for evasion and dilatory tactics are—and we also know that the system would be hard put to stand up under a concerted effort to exploit them all.

There must obviously be a strong element of good faith, of reciprocity and co-operation, if our court system is to work at all. Take away that good faith, elevate the right to avail oneself of a technicality into an absolute—and you bring the very machinery of law to a standstill.

"A Principle That Conceals"

What about the second proposition—that a court decision binds only those who are a party to it? Clearly, this too is a principle that conceals as much as it says.

Every lawyer knows—though his clients may not—the distinction between the holding of a case and its rationale. We know that although the holding contains a specific disposition of a particular fact situation between the litigants, its reasoning enunciates a rule of law that applies not merely to one case but to all similar cases.

Often there is room for much discretion and honest disagreement as to when cases are alike or unalike. But clearly, in the matter of desegregation, there can be little or no room for argument in good faith as to when one situation is different—in the legal sense—from another in which the law has been laid down.

The county is different, the names of officials are different, but the situation—in all legally significant respects—is identical.

There is something less than truth in a lawyer who insists, nine years after the Brown decision and a hundred years after the Emancipation Proclamation, that a law of the land, a guarantee of human dignity and equality, is merely the law of a case.

We come now to the third principle—that a court-made rule of law is always open to re-examination and must be viewed as susceptible to being overruled.

No one can prove in strict logic that any given case will never be overruled. But with regard to the Brown decision, I think we can all agree that the probability of its permanence is so overwhelming as to counsel the abandonment of anyone's hope for the contrary.

The decision was, after all, a unanimous one. Since 1954 there have been six vacancies in the Supreme Court, which means that by now a total of 15 Justices have endorsed it.

True enough, it was in itself an overruling of Plessy v. Ferguson, 56 years before. But that reversal had been widely expected through several generations of legal thought. The whole pattern of American and world history pointed to the abolishment of the "separate but equal" concept; and the reform established by the Brown decision was all but inevitable.

Moreover, and more importantly, it is clearly a decision that the vast majority of the American public holds to be morally correct.

Arguing "to the Point of Absurdity"

To suggest, at this point in history, that there is any real likelihood of the Brown decision's being reversed is irresponsible to the point of absurdity.

No lawyer would advise a private client to contest the validity of a decision as solidly established and as often reiterated as this one; he would not want to victimize his client by raising frivolous questions.

Yet a client is being victimized every time this frivolous question is raised today—and the client is the American public itself.

Right now, all over the nation, the struggle for Negro equality is expressing itself in marches, demonstrations, and sit-ins. It seems very clear to me that these people are protesting against something more than the privations and humiliations they have endured for so long.

They are protesting the failure of our legal system to be responsive to the legitimate grievances of our citizens. They are protesting because the very procedures supposed to make the law work justly have been perverted into obstructions that keep it from working at all.

Something must be done—and it's a job that can only be done by members of the legal profession.

First, we have got to make our legal system work. We have got to make it responsive to legitimate grievances, and to do this we must work to prevent the unscrupulous exploitation of all the obstructive devices available within the system.

Only when our judicial system offers fair and efficient adjudication does it deserve the public confidence, and it seems to me that American lawyers everywhere have a clear obligation to make that confidence justified.

Second, we have a job of education to do. The public must be better informed about the nature of our legal system—and this includes a better understanding of each of the principles and counterprinciples I have discussed with you today.

"Alternative to Demonstrations"

Only if we are able to instill that understanding will people with grievances begin to realize that there is a practical and realistic alternative to street demonstrations and sit-ins. But we have to make sure both that there is an alternative, and that the nature of that alternative is clearly understood.

If we can accomplish this, I believe we will begin to see a new phase in the movement for civil rights—an increased awareness that sit-ins and demonstrations do not in themselves cure social evils.

They serve to awaken the public conscience, and they can form a means of protest when no other means are available, but they will not dictate solutions—they can only alert us to the problems.

And in the long quest for solutions, we lawyers have a great deal to offer.

We are part of an intricate system that has developed over the centuries as man's best hope for resolving disputes and appraising policies—for working out solutions to problems.

If this system of law—of equal justice for all—can be kept viable, and if people of all backgrounds and of all races and creeds can begin to fully understand and fully take advantage of it, then—and only then—will we stand to realize the promise of democracy, both for ourselves and for the world.

"GOVERNMENT BY INTIMIDATION" IS EMERGING IN U. S.

by John Creighton Satterfield

President of the American Bar Association, 1961-62

Only four persons were mentioned in the attack upon lawyers and judges by Attorney General Kennedy in his speech to the Missouri Bar Association at Kansas City last Friday [Sept. 27, 1963]. These were "the Governors of two States, a former president of the American Bar Association, and a federal district judge," all of whom are lawyers. I am the third person named. This attack, however, directly involves many members of the legal profession and many public officials throughout the United States. Ultimately, every citizen of the United States will be affected by the pattern of which this attack is a part. Its purpose is to intimidate all persons, including public officials, lawyers and judges, who do not bow to the desires of Attorney General Kennedy and of President Kennedy.

On the surface the reason and purpose of these attacks may be obscure. In each incident which gave rise to these attacks, the Attorney General, by the use of overwhelming forces available to him, had already obtained his desires. As a part of the pattern, however, the purpose is clear.

The Attorney General states that the action of each person in each separate situation "smacks of duplicity," is "professionally irresponsible," amounts to "demagoguery," lacks "good faith," that the statements by each are "something less than the truth," and that every time a lawyer represents a client opposing the Attorney General in the field of integration—desegregation—the "client is being victimized," and that such action of an attorney is an "unscrupulous exploitation" of the client.

The slanderous nature of these statements by the Attorney General of the United States is demonstrated by the definition of slander contained in "American Jurisprudence," vol. 33, page 39:

> Slander, as now understood, has been defined as the speaking of base and defamatory words which tend to prejudice another in his reputation, office, trade, business, or means of livelihood.

The Attorney General, in his speech, specifically refers to three basic legal principles the spirit of which he alleges is being ignored by those who defend integration suits. These propositions are that it is proper to avail oneself of every legal defense to test the validity and applicability of a rule of law, that a court decision binds only those who are a party to it, and that a court-made rule of law should always be open to re-examination.

The Attorney General has said:

> Often there is room for much discretion and honest disagreement as to when cases are alike or unalike. But clearly, in the matter of desegregation, there can be little or no room for argument in good faith as to when one situation is different—in the legal sense—from another in which the law has been laid down.

This statement by the Attorney General is completely without basis in fact or in law.

The Brown desegregation decision of 1954 has already been distinguished or held inapplicable in a number of cases involving alleged discrimination. Many other cases now pending in this general area of law involve questions so different from the Brown case as to be completely removed from the basic principles outlined therein. If one case can be as broad in its application as the Attorney General would lead us to believe, the citizens of the United States would not be entitled to due process of law and equal protection of the laws.

Of the four persons specifically attacked in the Attorney General's speech, one is referred to as "a federal district judge who recently overruled the Brown decision on grounds that its findings of fact were erroneous." In the case of Stell v. Board of Education, Judge Frank M. Scarlett found that the effect of segregation upon Negro students in Georgia in 1963, shown by the evidence in that case, differed materially from the facts presented in the Brown case as to the effect of segregation upon Negro students in Kansas in 1954. Substantial differences in facts as between two cases cannot logically be ignored simply for the sake of expediency. The slander of a federal judge is quite different from constructive criticism of the legal principles involved in a judicial decision.

To those who know the facts, the repeated references by Attorney General Kennedy to "dilatory tactics" are unconvincing. Suits involving integration have been handled expeditiously by the courts. In fact, such cases have repeatedly been advanced upon the dockets and writs requiring integration have been issued by courts of appeal even before the record of the appeal from the district courts has reached the appellate courts.

It is a novel position for an experienced lawyer to take—that, because a decision has been on the books for nine years, it is bad faith and "unscrupulous exploitation" of a client for a lawyer to urge either that the facts in his case are different or that the earlier case should be differentiated or overruled. Plessy v. Ferguson was repeatedly reaffirmed by the Supreme Court over a period of 56 years. If 15 justices have permitted the Brown case to stand—as is affirmed by the Attorney General—doubtless 50 judges had reaffirmed Plessy v. Ferguson and Gong Lum v. Rice. Yet when the Solicitor General of the United States joined in a brief to have these cases overruled, he was not accused by the Attorney General of the United States—or any other lawyer, so far as I know—of being guilty of bad faith, of being professionally irresponsible and of victimizing or exploiting his client.

. . . "The Government would obtain control of education"

Sit-ins vs. the Courts

The Attorney General would further have us believe that the reason for demonstrations and sit-ins by Negroes today is the lack of remedy in the courts. Yet he argues that Negroes will ultimately prevail in the courts because the Brown decision covers all of their grievances.

On the other hand, he does not mention that those who oppose many of the aims of Negro leaders have refrained from marches and demonstrations and have put their faith in the courts, hoping that, in the long run, justice for all will prevail. The Attorney General slanders them for so doing. To use the streets in mass demonstrations which, in the words of President Kennedy, "create tensions and threaten violence—and threaten lives" is laudable. To settle disputes in the courts is to be condemned.

A new type of government is emerging upon the American scene—"government by intimidation" is now about to take the place of "due process of law" and "liberty under the law."

The first step in the pattern is to intimidate all those who oppose the desires of the federal executive branch of our Government. This intimidation is carried out by public castigation, threats of financial reprisals against public bodies and individuals, and the misuse of the power of the federal executive branch to command the attention of the public press.

The second step is to extend federal control over individuals, businesses and state and local governments far beyond that provided in the Constitution of the United States. This was begun by the issuance of executive orders in certain particular fields. A limitless expansion of such executive authority is now being attempted by the new package of legislation introduced in the Congress in June and called, for tactical and public relations purposes, "The Civil Rights Act of 1963."

The third step will be the use of the vast financial power of the United States to strangle every public body, every business and professional establishment, and every individual daring to act contrary to the wishes of Attorney General Kennedy and the threat of the imposition of federal fines and imprisonment without trial by jury.

The initial use of the first step in the pattern was in April, 1962, when a steel-price increase was announced. The citizens who made the price decisions were accused by the President through nationwide media of being guilty of "a wholly unjustified and irresponsible defiance of public interest." He castigated them as "a tiny handful of steel executives whose pursuit of private power and profit exceeds their sense of public responsibility," who "can show such utter contempt for the interest of 185 million Americans." It was publicly announced that defense contracts might be withheld and that the Federal Government might use its investigative powers to bring about prosecutions for "violations" of antitrust laws.

Intimidation as a governmental policy has been repeatedly used since that time. The speech of Attorney General Kennedy at Kansas City is a perfect illustration. I have been actively opposing throughout the United States the grasp for federal power in "The Civil Rights Act of 1963" and am doing so at the present time. The others mentioned have opposed the Attorney General. Hence we must be intimidated or defamed.

Why is this legislation so important to the Attorney General? It would grant unlimited powers to the Attorney General and the President and his appointees to withhold federal funds in every program or activity in which federal financing is involved directly or indirectly "by way of grant, contract, loan, insurance, guaranty or otherwise."

The authority is demanded that all contracts in every program "shall contain such conditions as the President may prescribe"; that there be created a commission—with powers conferred upon it by the President—to take over the supervision of employment, promotion, demotion and handling of employes of more than 90 per cent of the businesses in the United States.

"Purpose of Legislation: Disguised"

The purpose of this legislation has been disguised by repeated references to "public accommodations" and "Government contractors." These constitute less than 1 per cent of the businesses affected. In fact, it would affect every bank which is a member of the Federal Reserve System or insured by the FDIC [Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation], every form of financing affected by federal insurance or guaranty, all depositors in every bank covered by the FDIC, and all borrowers therefrom. It would draw under federal executive control almost every farmer in the United States, as it includes every person who receives any sort of financial benefit from every federal program in the field of agriculture. It would also draw under federal control practically every retail shop, department store, market, drugstore, gasoline station, restaurant, motion-picture house, theater, stadium, hotel, motel and lodging house, and in fact every "establishment" which pays any privilege license or tax to any State or municipality.

It includes uncontrolled authority to call loans, withdraw support of the FDIC and the Federal Reserve Board, and other similar entities, to cancel contracts, to blacklist banks, savings and loan associations, contractors, realtors, farmers, co-operatives, farm organizations, or any other institution or person falling within its classification.

How Elections Could Be Controlled

Under this proposed act, the Federal Government would obtain control of education through the misuse of every existing federal financial program, including grants-in-aid, research grants, lunch programs, scholarships and similar activities. Also, it would constitute the first step toward placing all elections—"general, special or primary elections held solely or in part for the purpose of electing or selecting any candidate for public office"—under the absolute control of the Federal Government. Editor's Note: In setting the minimum limit at which a prisoner may be executed at 17 years, the recent legislative session focused attention on Georgia's dark record for capital punishment. How many men have been hanged in the state? There is no record, but this exhaustive study reveals many interesting facts about the men and women who paid for their crimes with their lives.

THEY HANGED BY THE NECK

By Jeanette Moore

"TO be hanged by the neck until dead!" The dread sentence was pronounced in early Georgia on conviction of any of a large category of minor crimes. A settler might swing from the gallows for such offenses as stealing a pocket handkerchief, illegal fishing, shooting a rabbit, or cutting down a cherry tree.

In general, the rules and procedures of English courts were followed in the Georgia colony. The common law of England, which had been evolved by the English people from customs and usages, was brought to Georgia by the colonists. These laws awarded the death penalty to no less than 160 felonies—the figure later increasing to 222 capital crimes.

Murder, of course, was one of the crimes punishable by death, and the penalty in such cases had to be faithfully and completely carried out. Sir William Blackstone, famed English jurist of the 18th century, said in his Commentaries, "If the criminal be not thoroughly killed, but revives, the sheriff must hang him again. . . . If a false tenderness were to be indulged in such cases, a multitude of collusions might ensue."

On July 17, 1739, three men were tried for murder in what was probably Georgia's first murder trial before a jury. Brixy, Cozens and Levett, all implicated in the same murder, were tried and found guilty. They were sentenced to be hanged on Aug. 3.

According to the account of the execution in the Colonial Records of Georgia, just about everybody thereabouts attended, except those "being not in perfect Health, besides Orphans."

The Records state further that it was decided to give Levett a reprieve of two months because of extenuating circumstances in his case. He was not to be informed of his good fortune until the minute of his execution, giving him an opportunity to confess if he were guilty. The account records graphically that "at the Gallows, Bixby went up the (Continued on Next Page) ladder more nimbly than the hangman and fastened the rope to the beam himself." After a short prayer, he was hanged. Cozens, saying that God's vengeance had overtaken him, was hanged also. Levett was then conducted to the foot of the ladder. Here he was told of his reprieve, and was so affected that "he was very near losing his life by excessive Return and Flow of Spirits."

Thus justice was meted out in Georgia's first court of record—the Town Court of Savannah, established Nov. 2, 1732. The court had been created by the Trustees of Georgia, who were at the helm of the proprietary government obtaining at that time. Georgia's charter had given them the power to originate such courts as were necessary. The judicial officers of the court, appointed by the trustees, were three bailiffs to act as judges, a recorder, two constables and two tithingmen, or peace officers. An attempt was made to endow the court with dignity by supplying the inexperienced and often ignorant judges with "purple gowns trimmed with furr," and a "copper gilt mace." These impressive accouterments did little to cover the inadequacy of both the law and its officers.

No lawyers were allowed in the colony. It is believed they were excluded by order of the trustees. One of the inducements for settling in Georgia was that it was "free from the pest and scorge of mankind called lawyers." In 1740 a man named Williamson, who claimed to have the permission of the trustees to practice as an attorney, was warned that he must not attempt to do so. At first there were no public prosecutors in criminal cases; later the constables represented the colony or the crown. The defendant had to be his own attorney, and many a bewildered culprit was hanged without the advice of an attorney—or anyone else.

HAVING no law books and no attorneys was a disadvantage to the magistrates, who were often puzzled by difficult points of law. When there was not time to send to England for advice, it was customary to secure counsel from a lawyer in Charleston.

A Digest of the Laws of the State of Georgia of 1770 states that "Whereas cruelty is highly unbecoming those who profess themselves as Christians"—the murder of a slave was allowed with comparative impunity one time, the offender simply being deprived thereafter of holding any office within the province. The leniency ran out with the murder of the second slave, the murderer being given the death penalty.

Georgia in 1787 was much concerned with "biting and gouging." For the first offense "to wilfully or maliciously cut out or disable the tongue, put out an eye, slit the nose, bite or cut off the ear, nose or lipp, or cut or disable any member of any person," the perpetrator must "forfeit the sum of 100 pounds and stand in the pillory not exceeding 2 hours." But the second time a person was so reckless with a knife or his teeth, he drew a death penalty.

Likewise, a Georgia citizen in 1809 could steal a horse for the first time and receive only the uncomfortable punishment of "39 lashes on his or her or their bear back, on three several days," plus a short sojourn in the pillory and in jail. But woe be unto that thief guilty for the second time of horse stealing—he "shall suffer death without benefit of clergy."

THE ambiguous phrase "without benefit of clergy" was a holdover from English usage. The powerful Church of England could intervene in behalf of a condemned prisoner and cause him to be released to the custody of the church. To prevent this, it was specifically stated in a death sentence that the clergy could not interfere.

As there were no courthouses in the interior of Georgia until 1785, court was held under the trees in the yard of a private home.

Gov. George Gilmer in his Sketches (1855) says, "Prisoners were confined by putting their heads between the rails of a fence." Usually the sheriff sat on the top rail so he could kick the prisoner in the face if he tried to escape.

The minutes of the Greene County Superior Court record that as late as 1800 men were hung for crimes that would today be punishable by a fine, or at most a short term of imprisonment. The minutes of the September Term, 1800, record that Stephen Heard and William Heard, guilty of forgery, were sentenced to be "HUNG by the NECK until you and each of you are DEAD. And the Lord have mercy on your soul."

A tobacco dealer named Tarrell, traveling through Laurens County, camped on Hunger and Hardship Creek. In an argument, Tarrell killed a visitor, but made good his escape. The pursuers finally loosed the hunted man's dog, which had been tied to his wagon, and the animal led the posse through forest and thicket to his master. Thus a faithful dog seeking his master led to the arrest of the first white man to be convicted and hanged for murder in Laurens County.

Only a woman suffers this kind of pain!

NEW TABLET CONTROLS PRE-PERIOD TENSION—RELIEVES PAINFUL CRAMPS

When a woman has periodic pain, her suffering is often intensified by premenstrual bloating which puts irritating pressure on sensitive nerves and organs. Symptoms such as moodiness, irritability, and tension become more disturbing as her body stores more and more fluid. Now a woman can relieve this distress with Cardui Brand Tablets, a new product that contains Pamabrom, an ingredient formerly available by prescription only. Cardui Tablets gently release undesirable fluid from the body, and also relieve upset nerves, low back pain, headache, and functional cramps. Get Cardui Tablets, the remarkable new advance in medication for women.

women, the first in 1735. Alice Ryley, a white woman who had come to America on an Irish transport, was condemned for the murder of her master, Will Wise, and received the extreme penalty.

Polly Barclay was hanged May 30, 1806, in Wilkes County, for plotting the murder of her husband. Mrs. Barclay was strikingly beautiful, and kept the ladies of the county stirred up and worried about the possible unfaithfulness of their husbands around so much pulchritude. She was indicted for murder along with two men, one her paramour, the other her brother. The brother, William Nowland, was acquitted, and the case of the other, Mark Mitchum, was nol prossed. Mrs. Barclay expected to be freed also. Wilkes County tradition has it that she appeared in court smiling and glamorous to hear the sweet words of release. But jealous wives had been working on juror husbands, and Mrs. Barclay heard instead the death sentence. The jury, feebly rebellious against wifely instructions, recommended mercy, but the judge was made of sterner stuff and disregarded the recommendation. Mrs. Barclay, charmer to the last, went to her execution wearing a fine silk dress. She was hanged from a white oak tree, just outside Washington, Ga.

THE hanging of the third woman, in Webster County in 1873, has been fully recorded. Susan Eberhart was a girl living in the home of a middle-aged man, Enoch Spann, and his wife. The eternal triangle ensued, and Susan helped Enoch strangle his wife with a rope as she lay asleep. They both received the death sentence, and were hanged.

According to an eye witness, "Everybody in the countryside went to the hangings. They were hung on different days. Folks went in buggies and wagons and some walked for miles. Enoch Spann was hanged first—all dressed up in a swallow-tailed coat with a flower in his buttonhole. He begged them not to hang the girl, who was a pretty little thing, scared and trembly."

The last hanging in Georgia, strangely enough, took place nine months after hanging was declared illegal in the state. Gervis Bloodworth and Willie Jones were indicted in Taylor County for the murder of Howard Underwood, a patent medicine salesman. They were found guilty and given the death penalty. As the trial has been held before the hanging of criminals was abolished, the two were sentenced to be hung. Appeals and new trials delayed the execution. Finally it seemed that time had run out for the condemned men, and a gallows was accordingly built at the Butler jail. But the end was not in sight. Bloodworth and Jones claimed that the hanging would be public (which was against the law) because spectators could stand on the roof of the drugstore and see the gallows. The execution was enjoined and delayed again. It was then transferred to Columbus, Ga., in Muscogee County, in the same judicial circuit. There, Bloodworth and Jones were duly hanged on May 20, 1925, eight months after the first electrocution. The lengthy maneuverings in the case had carried the execution past the time when hanging was legal, but since the men had been sentenced under the old law, they were executed under the old law. The gallows thus overlapped the electric chair for one last function.

The "common law" prevailing in the colony was sifted through the years and adapted to the state and its people. The death penalty was lifted from a majority of so-called capital crimes. Today the death sentence is imposed for: treason, insurrection, murder, rape, forms of arson that could result in the death or maiming of any person, willful burning of a railroad bridge, wrecking a train, destroying a public building inside a city (this presumably includes a house of worship), robbery by force or by use of an offensive weapon, feticide, one form of involuntary manslaughter, and desecration and robbing of a grave.

On Aug. 16, 1924, an Act of the Legislature abolishing death by hanging and substituting electrocution, was approved. Thereafter, executions were to be held at one place only, instead of in the county or circuit where the crime was committed. The first electric chair was set up in the main barracks for males at the Georgia State Prison Farm, three miles from Milledgeville.

A newspaper article dated Milledgeville, Ga., Sept. 13, 1924, reads, "With the death of Howard Hinton, Negro, in the electric chair here this afternoon, Georgia formally changed from hanging to electrocution as the legal means of executing persons convicted of criminal offenses. . . . The death chair was built by prisoners at the State Farm here. Rep. Perkins, author of the bill passed at the last General Assembly substituting electrocution for hanging, was present at the first such execution today."

The former Rep. R. O. Perkins, now living in Columbus, recalls the circumstances surrounding the passage of his bill.

"There was a great deal of opposition to the bill," he said, "and I was afraid it wouldn't pass. When the vote was counted it was a tie, and Speaker of the House George Carswell broke the tie by voting for the bill, insuring its passage. Gov. Clifford Walker signed it.

"When I attended the first electrocution at Milledgeville, some newspaper photographers tried to get me to have my picture made sitting in the electric chair, but I declined."

In 1937, the place of execution was moved from Milledgeville to the Georgia State Prison at Reidsville, where it has remained.

IN 1948, Georgia's state executioner made $75 an execution, but the job had few takers. That year the executioner moved to South Carolina, and the attorney general was called upon to decide if he could legally keep his job in Georgia. Prison officials pointed out that executioners were hard to get. The attorney general ruled that there is no law against an executioner living in another state.

So that no one would have later thoughts about sending someone to his death, an elaborate system was set up as to pulling the lever transmitting the necessary current to the chair. Three prison guards were paid $10 each to assist in the job. The executioner adjusted the equipment, setting the current at the proper voltage. Then each of the three guards pulled a lever; only one lever controlled the fatal charge so that no one knew which guard had administered the lethal current.

Several other persons had parts in an electrocution. The prison barber received $1 to shave the head of the condemned man. Two doctors got $20 each to examine the prisoner after he was electrocuted. If both pronounced him dead, he was carried from the room by two convicts.

the setup today. A deputy warden is in charge of executions, and the condemned person is allowed the solace of a clergyman and is permitted to invite relatives and friends.

Georgia has electrocuted one woman. She was Lena Baker, Negro, who was convicted in Randolph County in 1945.

Since 1943, three persons receiving the death penalty for murder have escaped execution by being declared insane. The most recent and celebrated of these was Anjette Donovan Lyles. Sentenced to death for the murder of her little daughter, Anjette lived in the shadow of the electric chair for a year. She was then declared "psychotic and insane" by a three-member sanity commission, and committed to the Milledgeville State Hospital, where she is still confined. The death sentence had been upheld by the Georgia Supreme Court, and the case was appealed to the State Board of Pardons and Paroles, which requested a sanity hearing.

If such an insane person is declared sane again at any time, he or she must be resentenced.

Mrs. Cora Lou Vinson was a convicted murderess whose insanity plea resulted in an unusual disposition of the case. Mrs. Vinson was found guilty of the murder of her husband, and sentenced to be hanged July 28, 1922. Her attorneys entered a special plea of insanity, but at the hearing on the plea Mrs. Vinson was declared sane. She then filed a motion for new trial, which was granted. By a consent verdict, the new jury, Oct. 24, 1922, found her guilty but recommended mercy. Her death sentence was thus commuted without a finding of insanity. She was ordered to the Georgia State Prison to serve out a life sentence. It is believed that the uncommon twist in the case came about because public sentiment at the time was strongly against hanging a woman.

THE State Board of Pardons and Paroles alone has the power of clemency in Georgia. This board is composed of three persons: Mrs. Rebecca Garrett, chairman; J. W. Claxton and W. O. Brooks. To grant clemency in a death penalty case, every member must vote, a majority vote deciding. A clemency decision is made by the board in each case where the death penalty has been imposed and where the clemency power exists. (Clemency power is not vested in the board in cases where the death penalty has been given for treason or impeachment.) In addition to considering all the facts of the case, the board conducts an extensive investigation through its chief investigator. The board has decreed 41 commutations of the death sentence from 1943 through 1962. There have been 245 death sentences imposed since 1943.

Before the establishment of the State Board of Pardons and Paroles in 1943, clemency power was vested in the governor. Today the governor has the power to reprieve only. The Board of Pardons and Paroles may request him to reprieve a condemned person if there is not time to study the case for a clemency decision.

Before 1945, the state had no over-all system for keeping records of executions and no central authority for receiving such reports and records. These were kept in the county in which the execution took place, and the people of Georgia were often uninformed of executions occurring outside their own county.

In 1945, the Board of Corrections was established, and became the repository for records of executions throughout the state. Between 1945 and 1961, there were 164 executions in Georgia. Of these, five received the death penalty for armed robbery, 26 for rape, and 133 for murder, including one female murderess.

According to a U.S. Statistical Abstract, in the period 1930-'60, Georgia was first in the nation in the number of executions. The figure has steadily decreased through the years. For instance, in 1930-'39, there were 137 executions; in 1940-'49, 130; 1950-'59, 85. There was only one execution in Georgia in 1962.

The escape of one convicted criminal awaiting execution is on record. Ed Ramsey, Negro, given the death penalty for beating and robbing, escaped November, 1956, from the Elbert County jail, and is still a fugitive. He made his way to Massachusetts, and that state later refused to extradite him. Ramsey has never been returned to Georgia. He was 47 years old at the time of his escape.

Some Georgia citizens remember hearing oldsters tell of the escape of Will Myers, murderer under sentence of death, from the Fulton County jail in 1895. The record of the trial of the case is available, but not of the escape. Myers just disappeared from jail, and was never heard of again.

AN analysis by age groups of records in the files of the Board of Corrections since 1945 shows that Georgia has executed 29 persons under 21 years of age.

Georgia has executed three 16-year-old offenders, in 1943, 1946 and 1954. The three were Negro males, two being convicted of rape and one of murder.

The case of Preston Cobb, Negro, condemned to death for the murder of an elderly white man, has become a cause celebre. Cobb was 15 years old at the time he committed the crime, and his age stirred up much interest in the question of the execution of youth. The Cobb case was carried to the Supreme Court of the U.S., which refused to consider it. An appeal for re-consideration is now pending before that body. Cobb must be re-sentenced and all legal remedies exhausted before the Board of Pardons can consider his case.

Condemned persons have uttered some strange last words.

John Wallace, electrocuted Nov. 3, 1950, for the murder of a sharecropper, said in the moment before execution, "Goodby, men. I love everybody. I know I'm on my way to heaven!"

George and Michael Krull, the first men ever electrocuted by the federal government in Georgia (1957), were convicted of the kidnaping and rape of a 53-year-old spinster. George had an appropriate comment to make prior to his execution. He said simply, "It's a hell of a way to go, isn't it?"

A bill abolishing the death penalty for youthful offenders was introduced in the recent Georgia Legislature.

House Bill No. 40, introduced by Reps. John C. Bell of Richmond County, and James A. Mackay of DeKalb County provides that a person under 21 years of age, found guilty of a capital crime, automatically would receive a life sentence, whether the jury recommended mercy or not. The minimum age was amended to 17 years before the bill was passed by both houses and signed by Gov. Carl Sanders.

FOR RELEASE - JULY 7, 1963

Eighteen professors of constitutional law are among the one hundred and four deans and professors of law in Southern university law schools, from Virginia to Texas, who have joined in a statement on law and race relations.

The statement urges adherence by officials and private citizens to the rule of law in race relations under the Constitution of the United States, which in its opening words calls for both justice and order.

The founders of our nation anticipated and dealt with the false idea that state law can prevail over national law. The Constitution makes national law "the supreme Law of the Land," binding on judges in every state "any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of Any State to the Contrary notwithstanding." It requires "all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States," to take an oath to support the Constitution.

The false idea that our national law may be disregarded has been urged under several forms, as, interposition, state rights, and political promises. No form of the idea can justify violations of the supreme law of the land.

Violations of our laws and our principles are deeply harmful to our country. They divide it at home. They discredit it abroad where our enemies use them as their best propoganda. The violators serve the cause of our declared enemies.

The statement ends with emphasis on the necessity for order as well as justice. "Civil duties are as basic as civil rights." Lawlessness on one side breeds lawlessness on both sides. Only through peaceful means may we attain our ideas of Equal Justice Under Law.

Some signers of the statement have criticized it on the ground it does not go far enough and fails to stress the moral issues. Other signers wished to have it made plain that in their view formal or token violation of a declared law may properly be resorted to where this is the only way to challenge in good faith its validity, and that even non-violent assemblages cannot be justified under the guaranty of peaceable assembly when they unreasonably obstruct lawful activities of others. No disagreement on the legal conclusions stated was voiced from any law school.

RACISM IN THE U.S.

IS THE LAW ENFORCEABLE IN THE SOUTH?

Dr. Zinn is chairman of the Department of History and Social Science at Spelman College in Atlanta, Georgia. The following is his report on events in Selma, Alabama, on Oct. 7, 1963.

Howard Zinn

"There are 30,000 Negroes and less than 25,000 whites in Dallas County, Alabama. On the voting rolls, however, there are about 130 Negroes and 7,000 whites. On the first and third Mondays of every month, the Board of Registrars of Dallas County takes additional applications from would-be voters. The form, however, is a long one, and the applicant is also questioned orally. As a result, the Board has never been able to enroll more than thirty new voters in a day.

"At this rate, even making the incredible assumption that the Board accepted every Negro applicant, it would take the Board ten years to enroll as many Negroes as whites. Nevertheless, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (S.N.C.C.) began a voter-registration campaign in Dallas County last summer. It proclaimed October 7 as 'Freedom Day.' At 9:30 a.m. on Freedom Day there were fifty Negroes in line before the county courthouse, in the cotton town of Selma. By 11 a.m. there were 250 Negroes in the line. . . .

"Standing over these men and women were helmeted men with clubs and guns, members of Sheriff Clark's posse. By noon, the line of Negroes reached 300. The sun was hot, and the line did not seem to be moving.

"Directly across the street from the county courthouse in Selma is the federal building. Here are the federal court, the draft board, the social security office—all the visible manifestations that the Civil War was won by the Union and that the national government is supreme all over the United States. In this building, on the first floor, its windows looking directly at the county courthouse, is the office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the police force of the national government, created to enforce the laws of the United States. Four F.B.I. agents and two Justice Department lawyers spent Freedom Day in this building. . . .

"Through all that happened on that Monday, while federal law was broken again and again, these law enforcement officials of the federal government stood by and watched. By the time Freedom Day was over in Selma, the Constitution had been violated in a number of its provisions, several statutes of the U.S. Congress had been ignored, the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960 had been turned face down. . . .

"What happened in Selma on Freedom Day?

"A Negro registrant, before he got to the door of the county courthouse, had to run a gauntlet of armed troopers and a local cameraman whose pictures could cost the Negro his or her job.

"The registrants waited from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., standing in the sun without food or water, without being able to go to the toilet. State troopers told them they could not leave the line and return. . . .

"There were two 'incidents.'

ALBERT BEST, Attorney, Detroit
Chairman of Publicity for National Committee to Assist Southern Lawyers

AID FOR SOUTHERN LAWYERS

BECAUSE most southern lawyers are unwilling to accept civil rights cases, often through fear of losing other clients, the experience of northern and western lawyers in such cases is being fruitfully diverted to the South.

Already operating with gratifying results for a number of months, the plan for a "cultural exchange" of legal knowhow and civic courage was instituted by the 25th anniversary convention of the National Lawyers Guild, held in Detroit last February. It is administered by the Guild's National Committee to Assist Southern Lawyers.

An outstanding example of how northern experience in injunction cases can be applied to southern situations is the "unclean hands" doctrine which was developed to good advantage by attorneys for labor unions in the historic sitdown strikes of 1937 in Michigan and elsewhere in the auto industry. Corporation lawyers normally had little difficulty getting an injunction against the union on the charge that picketing interfered with the company's property rights. But when union lawyers raised the issue in court of unclean hands on the part of the employer with his employment of goons and purchase of machine guns and poison gas, judges felt obliged to consider the evidence supporting the union claims, and it became difficult for the average anti-union boss to show that his hands were clean.

"This doctrine of unclean hands," says Attorney Ernest Goodman, co-chairman of the Guild committee, "may permit the attorney in a typical case in the South, where a company or local authorities with unclean hands seek an injunction to prevent peaceful protest against segregation, to prove the illegal character of segregation in the particular circumstance, and thus allow the basic constitutional and moral issues to be openly raised and decided in the injunction proceedings."

Goodman and George W. Crockett, Jr., Detroit, are co-chairmen of the committee. Attorneys Len Holt of Norfolk, Va., and Ben Smith of New Orleans are co-secretaries. The white and Negro races are equally represented. The committee office address is 3220 Cadillac Tower, Detroit 26, Michigan.

Guild lawyers have been asked to give a minimum of 40 hours of legal services a year to assist southern lawyers in handling the growing calendar of civil rights cases there. Close to a hundred lawyers in more than a dozen states have volunteered to serve without fee in research, trial work, pleadings, and in helping conduct practice and procedure workshops to bring out essential constitutional and procedural points in preparation and trial of cases.

A manual for civil rights lawyers is under preparation by Guild experts, and a handbook for laymen on what their rights are and how to handle themselves if involved in a proceeding, especially helpful where no local lawyers will take their cases, is approaching completion.

"Having in mind the limited resources of the Guild and the enormity of the problem," says Attorney Crockett, "the committee is channeling its efforts in the direction of providing legal assistance to southern lawyers, rather than to provide direct legal aid to those in trouble."

The committee, together with the National Bar Association, in cooperation with the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, is holding a conference for southern lawyers in Atlanta, Georgia on November 30th and December 1st. The emphasis will be on "practice rather than theory; it is a how-do-you-do-it conference," and combines the need for making a living with the importance of handling civil rights cases.

LAW ENFORCEMENT

Social Integration And Police

By DR. MICHAEL BANTON
Department of Social Anthropology
University of Edinburgh
Edinburgh 8, Scotland

I COME from a policeman's paradise. Just before moving into my house in the country, some twelve miles south of Edinburgh, Scotland, I got into conversation with the village bobby. I asked him how much crime there was in the locality, and he said there was very little. But only a month previously, he said, he had got a nice case. He had caught a youth from outside the community catching wild birds with bird lime and confining them in cages below regulation size, so he had charged him with five offenses under the Wild Birds' Protection Act. I reflected that if this was what constituted a "nice case" in those parts, then I had found the right place to live!

Crime is usually lower in country districts, so what of the cities? Edinburgh, where I work, has a population of nearly half a million. Though the incidence of theft is high, even by American standards, there are few crimes of violence. Last year there was not one case of murder; there was one of attempted murder, two of culpable homicide, twenty-nine of assault and none of rape. An average American city of the same size would have about thirty cases of murder and non-negligent manslaughter.

In discussions of law enforcement it would seem to me profitable to start with an analysis of situations such as these in which the incidence of crime, social conflict and maladjustment is low, so that we can better understand what is missing in situations of tension. I shall try to do this, and I shall go on to describe what seems to me, as a sociologist, the principal features of the patrol officer's role. This leads naturally into a review of the determinants of police-public relations. Only then, I think, can we consider how racial and cultural differences affect police work. We need to look at these matters not in all their ramifications as political and social issues, but as circumstances which affect police work, and we cannot do that until we have made clear our view of what the policeman's role in society is or ought to be. Police officers have been too busy getting on with their job to philosophize about it at any length. I am going to try and do it for them and because my experience is so limited I may make many mistakes, but I hope to convince you that to study adequately the subject of our conference we need at some point to analyze the patrolman's role in a homogeneous society and then see what happens when homogeneity gives way to heterogeneity.

CONSENSUS

In the Scottish village I spoke about, the social organization works smoothly. The policeman's job is to oil the machinery, not to provide the motive power of law enforcement. The policeman, like the law itself, is only one of the agents of social control. Village societies are highly integrated because everyone is so dependent upon everyone else. If there is only one

Dr. Banton, a Reader in Social Anthropology in the University of Edinburgh, returned to Scotland in January, 1963 after a year in the United States as Visiting Professor of Political Science at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Mass. Having been engaged in a study of the role and status of police in his native country, he continued this research while in the United States, studying patrol work in two police departments in the South and one in New England. This paper was given by Dr. Banton before a conference on Law Enforcement and Racial and Cultural Contacts sponsored by the University of California at Berkeley, California, and is reprinted here with permission of Dr. Joseph D. Authority doctor, everyone has to go to him and he has to attend everybody. If there are only two grocers you may feel obliged to patronize the one who attends the same church as yourself. Even if you don't like the nearby farmer you cannot show your dislike because if he catches your son in his orchard he might make things very unpleasant for you. In such circumstances no one can afford to get out of line. People are dependent, morally, socially and economically, on their neighbors' good opinion and the sanction of gossip is a powerful one.

A POLICEMAN . . . is a kind of professional citizen, administering the moral standards defined and accepted by his community. . . . He earns public cooperation and esteem by the manner in which he exercises good judgment in performing his duties, and the foundation of his good judgment is an awareness of the public point of view. . . . He is a Defender of the Peace more than an Enforcer of the Law, possessing authority as well as power. . . . His authority gives him the willing obedience of the public, thus including the moral element, while his power compels obedience that is not necessarily rightful. . . . He will suppress his personal feelings in desegregation troubles to identify with his Department if it is committed to professional policing and has a morality of its own. . . . His role should be based upon the moral authority of his office rather than its legal powers, particularly in districts of racial and cultural differences.

There are two chief comments to make on this sort of society. Firstly, such societies are usually small ones in which nearly everyone knows everyone else. Integration is facilitated by the small scale, homogeneity and stability of the population. Secondly, this kind of social order is not just a matter of economics and social organization; like any other kind of society it has moral qualities. In the village society, more than elsewhere, the rich recognize responsibilities to the poor and people know that if disaster befalls them they can turn to their neighbors for assistance. Thus girls and boys grow up attuned to the social order, accepting their place in it and believing the distribution of rewards to be reasonably just. No man tries to be an island, sufficient unto himself; no one wants to be. People who live together like this are agreed in what they consider right and what wrong, so that we can say the highly integrated village society is characterized by a high level of consensus or agreement on fundamental values. These moral judgments pervade social life and do not stop short when business relations are in question. In these circumstances the policeman obtains public cooperation, and enjoys public esteem because he enforces standards accepted by the community. This gives his role considerable moral authority and sets him apart from the crowd socially, much as does the role of minister of religion. It is partly responsible for the view—shared by police and public alike—that in Britain policemen should not carry guns.

We can agree that life in a small highly integrated society has many attractions, but most of us would also regard economic progress as desirable and the two just do not go together. In the traditional kind of society the various social institutions are so inter-related that an alteration in one affects all the others and it is difficult to introduce changes. In an economically developing society, however, people and resources have to be moved around. Individuals have to pursue their private benefit and to fight the community controls that put a brake on change. Some people receive great rewards, greater than their moral deserts; others, who are scarcely less worthy, are much less fortunate. In these circumstances there is less feeling that the social order is a just one, and less agreement upon moral standards. No social changes are without their costs, and one of the costs of economic development is a decline in social integration. One index of this is the crime rate. Last year the number of indictable offenses known to the police in Britain rose by 8½ per cent over the previous year. In the United States the crime rate for last year was 10 per cent above the average rate for the previous three years.

Do we conclude that the crime figures will go on forever upwards? I have not studied this question properly but I believe they will not. The activities of professional criminals may well extend and the juvenile problem may get worse while other offenses which are linked with poor living conditions, such as drunkenness and wife-assault, will decline. As the community adjusts to new conditions and people come to see the evil of particular practices a new consensus can arise. The example is perhaps of only marginal relevance but I might cite the instance that in Sweden if Johansson invites Karlsson to a party and gives him liquor, then Karlsson is subsequently arrested for drunken operating and Johansson's part in the matter is discovered, the Registrar of Motor Vehicles may well suspend Johansson's license to drive as well as Karlsson's. Swedes accept this because they are now sufficiently aware of the dangers of drink at the wheel. There may come a time, even in individualistic America, when public consensus on these matters is high enough to allow the authorities to take such drastic steps.

In contrasting village society with the big industrial nation I have inevitably exaggerated. Even in the small scale, stable society consensus is never perfect but it is relatively high. A greater danger, however, would be to underestimate the level of consensus that exists even in the biggest and most rapidly changing society. We notice the areas in which moral controls are absent and where the police have to crack down, but we overlook the range of basic issues, such as ideas of duty to kinsfolk and neighbors, where popular morality remains powerful. I shall maintain that this popular morality is of central importance to our discussions here.

THE POLICEMAN'S ROLE

In both the United States and Great Britain the patrol officer is left very considerable discretion as to the enforcement of the law. It will be agreed that nothing is more important to police-public relations or to police efficiency generally than that the individual police officer should have good judgment in handling people. Where does he get this judgment? Firstly, I think, we must stress the role of the courts which throw out prosecutions they think unnecessary even though there has been a violation, and serve as judges not only of the public but of the arresting officers. A police officer can, in the long run, go only as far as the courts will let him and the courts are a good expression of the consensus of responsible opinion. A police officer who lacks a sense of judgment will probably come to grief in the courts one day. Secondly, and rather more important, is the influence of the police officer's private life. Out of uniform he is subject to exactly the same controls as any other citizen. He mixes with other citizens on an equal footing and soon hears what they think about the police. The resulting awareness of the public's point of view is the foundation of the officer's sense of judgement. Many times I have heard an officer discussing his treatment of an offender say to me, "I know that if I were in his place I should feel so-and-so . . ." In a military-style police where the officers live in barracks and do not mingle with the public this kind of understanding must be greatly reduced. The supervisory officers with whom I have talked confirm this conclusion, for they speak of their difficulties with enthusiastic young officers who have insufficient sense of how the public reacts to police controls. By and large it seems that the older an officer is, the better his sense of judgement. This must be because in his private life he has been more thoroughly absorbed into the community and understands it better. We should remember, too, that even on duty the police officer's powers are often merely those of the private citizen and that he is personally responsible for any wrongful arrest or error. The policeman, as we in the West understand his role, is a kind of professional citizen. He cannot be a good policeman if he is not a good citizen with an understanding of his fellows. And if we try to determine the rights and duties of a citizen we find that the law only takes us part of the way, for what constitutes citizenship is defined more by the common understandings of the community than by written regulation.

POLICE-PUBLIC RELATIONS

I turn now to the question of police-public relations, in the first place from the standpoint of the policeman. Many policemen believe that there will always be friction between police and public because members of the public instinctively resent the power which the policeman has over them. I do not deny that in dealing with certain types of criminal or in a tough urban neighborhood there may be justification for the view of policemen and public as adversaries, but I must say that it does not accord with conditions in the forces that I have visited. The point is important, for if you believe that police and public must be antagonists, and other citizens always resent police powers, then, if you are logical, the view you take of police-public relations will be fundamentally different from mine.

My reasons for rejecting the adversary conception can be expressed in three inter-connected arguments. Firstly, if one analyzes the number and character of contacts the policeman has with members of the public during his tour of duty one finds that he spends very little time chasing criminals or locking people up. A great deal of time is spent helping citizens in distress, whether it be escorting a mother who is rushing a badly bleeding child to a hospital, notifying a parent that his or her child has been killed in a motor accident, or just getting a cat out of a tree. When an officer answers a call it is the complainant he meets and not the violator. Usually the complainant emphasizes the moral wrong that he or she has suffered and not the legal wrong, if any. The complainant says that someone else has done wrong and in explaining what it was and why it was wrong, he or she inevitably emphasizes what in the circumstances would be right or moral conduct. Consider a trivial but representative case. I remember going with a car to a woman who complained of a boy's behavior. This boy had a bad home and was emotionally disturbed but he had been friendly with her son and she had allowed him to come to the house and had been very considerate towards him. But the boy had behaved badly and in the end she had to forbid him the house and tell her son to avoid him. The boy had responded by making anonymous threats over the phone, by breaking the garage windows with his BB-gun and by insulting her in public. She could stand it no longer and wanted the boy to be checked. Notice the following features of the case: The woman sought to justify her own actions in the matter; she was complaining that the boy's conduct was morally inexcusable; she did not know whether or not it constituted a legal offense and never spoke about legal remedies; she wanted the police to put pressure on the boy and his parents so that he would behave better, not that they should take him to court. This, I think, is typical. By complaining of the boy's bad behavior the woman is implicitly reaffirming the accepted view of how boys ought to behave. When the policeman answers a call as often as not it is this reference to how someone ought to have behaved that he hears first. He is reminded what morality expects at the same time as he is told of an offense.

Secondly, it is inadequate and at times misleading to describe a policeman's job as law enforcement. We know that every policeman ignores some violations but pursues certain others at times more rigorously than a strict interpretation of the law allows. A policeman's activities are governed much more by popular morality than they are by the letter of the law; most often morality and the law coincide, but when they do not, it is usually morality that wins. In Britain we recognize this with an admirable five-word formula for police work. We say that the policeman's job is "to keep the Queen's peace." One can see the interplay of law and morality in many sorts of cases but as good an example as any is that of matrimonial disputes. To enforce the letter of the law of assault is impracticable. Police action on these calls, both in the U. S. and Scotland often ignores the law and exceeds it; what the officer does depends upon his judgments of the moral claims of the parties and the extent to which they acknowledge the moral claims of the officer.

Popular morality, of course, changes. A generation ago a policeman could correct a troublesome juvenile by giving him a good cuff on the head, or he could clear up a case of wife-assault by giving the offender a taste of his own medicine. Public opinion used to support such sanctions because it thought them appropriate. Now it no longer does so. But a policeman's moral authority is still such that he can keep a lot of cases out of court by speaking to offenders and impressing them with the error of their ways. He can do this because his office possesses authority as well as power. It is useful to make a distinction between these concepts. Webster defines authority as "legal or rightful power." Power, we see, is not necessarily rightful, but authority includes a moral element. If someone has power over you he can force you to do his will, but if he has authority over you, you accept his right to command you and you obey him voluntarily. Members of the public may resent police power but not police authority because authority is conferred on the policeman by the community. If he has the authority to command obedience it is because people consider it morally right that he should. Policemen do not always act from authority; sometimes they simply exert the power conferred on them; in dealing with some individuals they have no alternative. All I seek to demonstrate is the importance of moral consensus to the everyday activity of the policeman.

Another way of making this point is to instance the patrolman's personal involvement in some of the cases he deals with. Locking up drunks soon becomes a routine but personal distress rarely loses its power to move a man's heart. I have noticed how, in the event of a bad case, say, a father maltreating his daughter, even a hardened patrolman feels moral indignation over the man's conduct. Everyone here will know, too, of occasions on which a policeman has dipped into his own pocket to help the children of someone he has locked up. He is involved in these cases as a man as well as an agent of the law. Sometimes officers allow their personal feelings to lead them astray but this does not mean that their superiors should prescribe exactly what they must do in every circumstance. The answer, I feel, is to develop new techniques of training in how to understand and handle people. If the patrol officers were better selected and better trained their supervisors could depend on them more and public relations would be improved.

My third reason for disagreeing with the adversary view of police-public contacts is that even criminals recognize the moral authority—as opposed to the power—of the police when it does not interfere with their plans. You have probably heard more stories than I of criminals who have borne no grudge against the arresting officer even when this might have been expected; of criminals who are outraged when others infringe standards they think should be enforced, or of cases like the hardened criminal who complained to an officer that his son was getting into bad ways. "I don't want him to grow up like me," he said, "It's too late for me to change now, but he's got a chance to lead a better life." I suspect also that the criminals' partial admission of the moral claims of the policeman underlies the viciousness with which they have treated convicted former policemen in some American penitentiaries.

When we discuss police-public relations we should, above all, beware of taking at face value some of the things members of the public say. Nearly everyone grumbles, but their complaints are often attempts to make their violations seem excusable, to still their own consciences; implicitly, many of these grouses are a recognition of the policeman's authority even if expressed in a backhanded sort of way. When people complain that Patrolman No. 999 was rude, they are saying that he falls short of their notion of how a policeman should behave, and if the public sets a high standard in this respect the police should be the last to complain.

The police officer seeks to control the subject for his own ends; he cuts short the complainant who starts on an irrelevant story and keeps the conversation to official business. It is as well to remember, also, that the subject seeks to control the officer's behavior. In a Scottish rural community a man does not like to inform on his neighbors; he has to live with them. So instead of telling the constable that so-and-so is committing a particular offense, he may suggest that the officer take a walk up a certain lane on Friday evening. In this way he controls the officer's behavior by seeing that action is taken but that no one can blame him for it. Similarly I have heard of people going to much trouble to communicate with a particular officer who is temporarily out of the district, because they know him and trust him. The key element here is that you feel safe with the man whose reactions you can predict. You will say more to the man you know to be discreet and unlikely to cause you embarrassment. The policeman who wields moral authority responds in a predictable fashion, in the manner that is socially approved. The policeman whose reactions are uncertain is the man who relies on his individual powers, unconcerned whether the subject will think he is exercising them rightfully or not. It is impossible for members of the public to have confidence in this kind of officer.

Perhaps I might add that while I have seen a lot of police work in American forces that is as good as anything in Britain, or, I believe, anywhere else in the world, I have the impression that in the United States it is less easy to be sure how a police officer is going to react in given circumstances. I do not think this is just because I am an outsider, for Americans tell me the same thing. We know from studies of race relations that if members of a minority suffer discrimination only in one instance out of a thousand it has a quite disproportionate effect on their morale. When discrimination is unpredictable it can always occur the next time; what happened to my friend could happen to me tomorrow. It affects people's attitudes and behavior far more seriously than the statistical incidence of cases would suggest. It is the same with policemen. The subject who has once been treated badly by a policeman is on the alert ever after lest his experience be repeated. This can apply with particular relevance to the attitudes towards the police held by racial minorities. But in making comparisons of this kind we must recognize that it is much easier for the British policeman to be predictable because in our highly integrated society there is greater consensus about the right way to respond to given situations. The moral authority of the police officer depends upon the level of social integration and moral unity of the community and one cannot compare the work of British and American policemen without recognizing these differences in the context which they have to operate.

SITUATIONS OF RACIAL CONTACT

This brings me at last to the question of how the patrolman's work is affected by racial differences. Yet let me say at the outset that we cannot fruitfully discuss this topic without making certain assumptions. Policemen cannot deal satisfactorily with minority problems unless they have the support of the courts, unless their force has enough men for the job and is properly led. An officer should always be able to depend to some extent on the authority of his uniform or his badge. He should not have to establish his personal authority by proving that he individually is a good guy before he can get on with his job, though I fear that in some communities the latter is indeed the case. But if these conditions are met, then it would seem to me that the only racial problems a deparment should have to worry about are those within the department itself. In dealing with members of the public they have only to observe high standards of professional police work and they will automatically have dealt with the race issue, for professional policing demands respect for all citizens and due consideration for the circumstances of every individual. I am not saying that we should ignore community differences and treat everyone alike. The Jew will not thank you for saying, "let's forget all the centuries of anti-Semitic persecutions and just treat one another as individuals." People belong to communities whose history is reflected in the outlook of the present generation. One must understand that history if one is to understand the people.

But let me try to outline what seem to be three of the chief problems in this area. The first is that of the police department which has to assist in carrying through a desegregation order that is resisted by powerful groups in the community. Others are qualified to discuss this problem and I am not, but I would like to suggest that the root of the difficulty lies in the conflict between law and popular morality, or, to be more exact, between federal law and a liberal morality on the one hand, with traditional morality on the other, probably supported by state or local laws. When the police officer is no longer enforcing laws that are popularly recognized as just, then his position changes. He can no longer claim moral authority but must rely purely on his powers and be prepared for a burst of unpopularity until the community reconciles itself to the new order and vests it with moral approval. The experience of the Little Rock Police Department suggests that this is not so difficult and that the department which is committed to professional policing has a morality of its own which will carry it through such troubles and outweigh the personal feelings of the men. Speaking of the events there in August 1959, one observer remarked, "Whatever Chief Smith, or anyone else on the force may have thought about the Negroes or school integration didn't matter so much as what was getting to be their pride in the force . . . in fact, the vast majority of them were ardent segregationists." [1]

The second case is the one I want to discuss at greatest length so it may be as well if I summarize my argument. I have maintained that very many of the patrolman's actions derive from his moral involvement in the community rather than his legal powers and obligations. The patrolman shares the moral standards of his community and it endows him with authority because he does so; he is a defender of the peace rather than an enforcer of the law. If you accept this argument I would like you to consider what follows logically from it where you have someone policing a community with which he feels no personal identification. What, for example, if you have a white officer on duty in a Negro section of a southern town?

At the time of World War I a Captain of detectives in a southern town told a writer on police matters, "in this town there are three classes of homicide. If a nigger kills a white man, that's murder. If a white man kills a nigger that's justifiable homicide. If a nigger kills a nigger, that's one less nigger." Something of this attitude towards crimes between Negroes remains in many parts of the South. It is not the fault of the police. If what I have been told is true the courts in many towns will give a Negro convicted of assaulting another Negro a sentence only a fraction of that which would have been given had the parties been white. If the courts take this view it is hard for the police officer not to follow suit.

My six weeks acquaintance with police work in the South was all too brief for me to speak with confidence, but at no time did I get the impression that white officers felt the same moral involvement in the colored areas as they did in the white. An officer who came across a Negro woman who had been badly beaten by her lover showed none of the moral indignation he might have felt had they both been ordinary whites. In the eyes of the whites, these beatings and stabbings were just customs of the colored sections, like shooting craps.

Many departments now employ Negro officers to police Negro neighborhoods, especially in the evening. Of the six departments employing Negro police which I have visited, heard about, or read about, in each one the Negro police have the reputation of being stricter with Negro offenders than white policemen would be. White officers in fact sometimes take pleasure in saying that Negroes wanted their own police but that now that they have them they regret it. Why is this? White officers say that their Negro colleagues can afford to be tougher because there is no threat of a Negro's bringing a civil rights suit against them, but I think you will agree that the matter is more complicated than that.

A Negro officer in one southern city put it to me like this. Before the introduction of Negro police, he said, Negro citizens were not getting proper protection. Negro bullies were allowed, by white officers, to get away with all sorts of offenses against other Negroes in return for the information they supplied. Often, too, he said, Negro violators were able to satisfy white officers by telling them a tale no Negro would have believed. Now, he said, the Negro neighborhoods were better policed. It was not true that Negro officers were too tough; they were no tougher than white officers were with whites who had committed similar crimes. Nor was it true that Negro citizens hated their own police—it was only the criminals and the people who wanted to curry favor with the whites who said this. White officers in the past had arrested drunks but they had never worried about drunken men who were neglecting their wives and children. Negro officers, on the other hand, were concerned with the moral issues and they had many times proceeded against people for this sort of offense and been instrumental in reforming them. He himself had subsequently been thanked by the very people he had proceeded against on such grounds. The white officer would not be so concerned with trying to reform a Negro offender because it was beneath his dignity and he would think the task too difficult anyway. This view of the matter is in line with the argument I advanced earlier. What the Negro officer is maintaining is that the Negro officer belongs in the Negro community and quite apart from the extra understanding he has, he feels a moral involvement with its people. He claims moral authority as a policeman where the white officer relies upon legal power because—rightly or wrongly—he rarely sees Negroes as subscribing to the moral norms acknowledged in his community.

The Negro officer whose views I quote over-simplified some of the issues though I believe him to have been right on the main ones. Traditional Negro attitudes towards the white man have a wider hold in the South than an educated Negro leader may like to admit. Many Negroes do take orders more easily from a white officer. When Negro police were first introduced into the city in question Negro toughs boasted that no Negro police were going to arrest them. As a result the first Negro officers had to win respect in the Negro lower-class neighborhoods by the strength of their arms. They had also to charge many Negroes with idling and loitering to disperse the crowds on the corners where so many of the fights originated. However, fourteen years after Negro police were introduced in this city one Negro patrolman had still made no fewer than 1,125 cases between January 1st and August 5th of this year and some of his colleagues had totals almost as impressive. This supports the contention that some Negro officers are remarkably hard-working but it is far from disproving the statement that Negro officers are particularly severe upon Negro offenders!

While we are on this topic I think I should refer to the fears that have been widely expressed about the trouble that would result if Negro officers were to arrest whites. In northeastern states, so far as I can discover, there is rarely trouble and the Negro officer's authority as a policeman is not questioned. In the South Negro officers are sometimes allowed to arrest white offenders and sometimes required to call a white officer to make the arrest. Dr. Elliott M. Rudwick has collected information on this point.[2] My very limited experience would suggest, however, that there is less restriction on the arresting power of Negro officers than his table indicates. Some forces, I suspect, have thought it judicious to report that Negro policemen do not arrest whites whereas in fact they do so if necessary and receive the support of their departments. This matter has not turned out to be so troublesome as was anticipated. I have myself been with Negro officers to investigate a family dispute in a ramshackle poor white dwelling house inhabited by people who looked to me like real hillbillies, and who had certainly been drinking, but I could detect nothing that suggested they resented having Negro officers attend the call.

I do not wish to imply that the recruitment of police officers from amongst a racial or cultural minority will solve all a police chief's problems in this area, but I do think that if you see the patrolman's job as defined by the authority the community confers upon it, then you cannot expect someone from another group to perform the job so conscientiously or to receive the same degree of cooperation. However, what is important is not the officer's color but his willingness to sympathize with the people he protects. A white officer could police a Negro quarter just as well as even a hard-working Negro officer, but he would have to be an exceptional man.

The third kind of problem which I want to bring up is that of desegregation within police departments. Again, I am hampered by lack of personal acquaintance with the difficulties, but there is some interesting data which I think bears upon this point in a book about the Philadelphia Police Department published in 1957.[3] Most of the white officers who completed the questionnaire said they had no objection to working with Negro officers on many tasks but they were reluctant to partner them in patrol cars. They mostly justified this by saying they could not tolerate a Negro's smell, or by some similar remark which does not sound very convincing to the outsider. I suspect that a truer interpretation would be that white officers were allowed some choice in their companions for this form of duty and that the colleagues of the man who partnered a Negro would wonder why he had chosen to depart from the usual pattern. He would appear a deviant and people would wonder why he rejected his colleagues of a similar race. The officer might have no personal objection to accompanying a Negro but nevertheless fear that doing so would compromise him in the eyes of his colleagues. This interpretation is in line with the remarks of some police officers in the South who had considerable respect for their Negro officers but would not have liked to ride with them. As one said to me, it would have hurt his pride.

There are other possible angles, for example, the fact that, working side by side a colleague for eight hours a day, an officer in a patrol car sees more of his partner than he does even of his wife, and it is vital that he find a congenial companion. But still I think the example helps us see that resistance to association with members of a minority does not necessarily spring from a man's personal attitudes, or his ignorance about the people in question—as some of the more popular discussions of prejudice imply. The example reminds us that people may be influenced chiefly by what their associates might think. Desegregation could be so successful in the U. S. Army, I believe, because whites and Negroes were contained within the same organization and the whites did not have to look over their shoulders to find out how other whites were interpreting their part in the matter. In a police force the task is more difficult but it does help to ascertain whether one has to deal with a situation in which the resistance stems from individual attitudes or from social conventions which make association with people of another race appear low class or deviant behavior.

On this score, too, it would seem to me that in police forces of the South which have a separate Negro section the Negro officers can be merged into the organization not by focusing on race but by concentrating upon professional standards of police work and upon the common responsibilities of everyone in the department. But on this, I suspect, I am again preaching to the converted. However, I would add that if I were a police administrator looking for weaknesses in my organization the first place I would look would be amongst any officers coming from a minority group. Organizational defects are more likely to show up where you have racial differences as an additional barrier to communication. In one force I visited the Negro officers worked hard, they paraded more smartly at roll call than anyone else, their morale was high and their white colleagues did not try to disparage their capabilities. Why should one city be so successful? There can surely be little doubt that the answers lies in the quality of leadership the department has received. If in another department the white officers say the Negro officers are lazy and only want the job because of the advantage the uniform gives them with the womenfolk, this may be an expression of prejudice. It may be a truthful account of the situation. But, it may also be a sign that the morale of the department is not as high as it might be.

CONCLUSION

Earlier I expressed an opinion that we have a long way to go in developing better techniques for training officers in human relations. The formal writings on this subject often strike me as saying no more than every intelligent nineteen-year-old should have discovered for himself. Everyday situations are so varied, and so much depends upon delicate nuances of vocal tone, gesture, dress, demeanor, etc., that text books can rarely do them justice. Research has shown that to lecture a group of adults about the character of minority groups does not necessarily lead to any improvement in their attitudes towards them. I would suggest that when dealing with recruits (older men are a different problem) it is desirable for the instructor to deal with the effect of minority groups upon police work by a freer method of discussion than he would normally use. What we should try to do first of all is to help people develop a greater insight into their own feelings and an understanding of them. When people have this insight into the pressures upon them they have more control over the situations in which they are caught up. This makes for better judgement and better policing.

Finally I should emphasize that my argument relates to patrol officers and their dealings with the ordinary public; it does not cover the special position of detectives or of dealings with professional criminals. The detective has to be a law officer where the patrolman is still primarily a peace officer serving a popular morality that is recognized by policemen and subject alike. I was interested to hear in one American city which was replacing two-man cars with one-man cars that a major argument for this practice was that the officer who is by himself has to treat a prisoner with more tact and less force; he has to handle him in such a way that the man accepts the policeman's authority. I am sure that you will agree that for a police officer to use force where persuasion would be sufficient is one of the easiest ways to alienate the public, so this development is of general interest. Of course it can operate only if communications are such that additional cars can always be dispatched to a dangerous call, but whether or not the practice spreads, it does indicate an attempt in a city with relatively low social integration and a high crime rate, to base the policeman's role upon the moral authority of his office rather than its legal powers. I would be the first to agree that any such policy must be adapted to local circumstances. But, the move in this direction by police administrators does make me feel that the opinion I have expressed may not be altogether mistaken, and I am sure that if there are good arguments for this policy in ordinary police work it has a special relevance to law enforcement in districts of racial and cultural contact. □

A STATEMENT ON LAW AND RACE RELATIONS

As lawyers and law teachers in the South, we wish to call the attention of our fellow citizens to the role of law in dealing with a current and long-lasting problem.

Our country, North and South, now shares in one of the great changes in history. The readjustment of the relations of Negroes and whites here is but a minor phase of a worldwide readjustment of peoples. It is of the utmost importance that we carry forward our part of the change with the ancient virtues of wisdom and justice and moderation. An understanding of the role of law in the change can contribute something to this end.

Law is a means by which a free people advances justice and maintains order. Without it there would be either despotism or anarchy. The first paragraph of the Constitution of the United States states these twin purposes of justice and order, to "establish Justice" and "insure domestic Tranquillity."

The advancement of justice through law comes about at times through public protests against injustices believed to exist, as our history has often illustrated. The privilege of protest is guaranteed by the first Article of the Bill of Rights which protects "the right of the people peaceably to assemble" and "to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." The denial of this peaceable right by officers of the law is itself a violation of the law.

The equality of all citizens in the exercise of civil rights is guaranteed by the Constitution and by the principles of a free people on which our government rests. The denial of equal rights to a part of our people is a violation of our law and our principles.

These matters, basic to our government and embodied in our national law, have occasionally been obscured by the false idea that our national law may be disregarded and put aside by State officials or private citizens. The men who founded our government perceived this danger and put into our Constitution a provision to meet it. The words of the Constitution deserve to be repeated now when some would ignore them:

> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof . . . shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of Any State to the Contrary nothwithstanding.

Observe that the Constitution and federal laws are made "the supreme Law of the Land," and that the Judges in every State are bound by them "any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary nothwithstanding."

The idea that our national law may be disregarded has been put forward in different forms. One form is the so-called doctrine of interposition of the State between the nation and the individual citizen. This doctrine under its old name of nullification was rejected over a hundred years ago by President Andrew Jackson. Its natural consequence, secession, led to the tragedy of the Civil War. Its use by the fifty States today would pull our country to pieces. It is a backward doctrine that is as out of date as feudalism.

Another form the idea takes is that the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution reserves to the States and denies to the United States all power over local matters. The Fourteenth Amendment, however, requires the States to exercise their powers with full regard to the elements of fairness the later Amendment specifies. These elements of fairness demanded by the Fourteenth Amendment include "due process of law" and "the equal protection of the laws." Whatever may be the broad powers reserved to the States by the Tenth Amendment, these powers must be exercised in a manner consistent with due process and equal protection.

A similar false idea recently asserted is that the invalidation of the separate-but-equal doctrine is not binding, because it is not compelled by the express words of the Constitution but only by what the Supreme Court has said the Constitution means. This argument leads on to anarchy for it implies that every person is entitled to interpret the law for himself and to act accordingly. Here again the founding fathers, knowing that under a system of law there must be a body with the power of final interpretation, answered the argument for anarchy by placing the power in the Supreme Court. The Judicial Article of the Constitution begins:

> "The Judicial Power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court" (with such inferior courts as Congress may establish).

It makes plain that the judicial power vested in the courts extends to the interpretation of the Constitution itself:

> "The Judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, (and) the Laws of the United States,"

Nearly a hundred and fifty years ago it was held, through Chief Justice Marshall, that the Supreme Court of the United States, not a State Supreme Court, is the final interpreter of national law.

Yet another form is an appeal to the terms of the statute of a State, or to a promise by a candidate in a political campaign that he would resist the enforcement of national laws he disliked. The reliance on the terms of a State statute is footless in light of the Constitutional provision that the Laws of the United States are the supreme Law of the Land. The appeal to a campaign promise is overridden by a greater oath. For the successful candidate when sworn into office takes an oath with the people as witnesses to uphold the Constitution of the United States. The official who would deny controlling effect to our national law violates his oath of office as well as our fundamental law.

Men who have taken the oath of office are under an even more manifest obligation than the ordinary citizen to observe the law. In violating the law, they inflict a grave injury to our country at home. These men inflict an even graver injury on our country abroad. They discredit it and give aid and comfort to our mortal enemies in these dangerous times. These thoughtless persons, while not in the camp of our enemies, do our enemies' work.

There is the other element of law that must be observed, "to insure domestic tranquillity." Order is no less an essential part of law than justice, and civil duties are as basic as civil rights. Lawlessness breeds lawlessness on both sides. It may quickly get out of the control of those who initiated it in a minor way and turn into uncontrolled mob violence. Those who in their zeal for change would violate the law hamper the means by which their purpose may be achieved. They, too, defeat the ideal inscribed over the building of the Supreme Court of the United States, "Equal Justice Under Law."

WASTED EFFORT IS BEST PROSPECT

Congressional Liberals Listless on Rights Bill

By ART PINE
Atlanta Constitution Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, Jan. 28 — The prospect of a new civil rights bill is usually a source of anguish for Southern conservatives in Congress.

But this year it's the would-be sponsors of the bill who'd rather not think about it.

"There's a feeling of listlessness about the whole thing," said a congressional staffer who has been in on initial drafting sessions. "No one seems very eager to get it started."

THE REASON is a simple one: Unless something serves to change the mood of Congress, any hour spent trying to promote a 1967 civil rights bill is likely to be a wasted one.

Sen. Philip A. Hart, D.-Mich., chief sponsor of the ill-fated 1966 bill, has already announced that this year's legislation would follow pretty much the same lines.

Last year, however, the bill emerged battered from the House and died after only 19 hours on the Senate floor. Its sponsors failed twice to muster enough votes to break a Southern filibuster.

This year, the road will be tougher: There are 47 more Republicans in the House, and even among the Democrats there seems a resurgence of conservatism.

And in the Senate, the liberals just last week lost their fight to lower filibuster-cutoff requirements, which many regarded as a test-vote for the civil rights bill.

THE DILEMMA for the already-committed liberals is now whether to offer meaningful legislation and bet against high odds, or to introduce a sure-bet that would amount to little more than tokenism.

The 1966 bill, which probably will serve as a model for this year's legislation, had six major parts:

Two sections dealt with federal court juries, providing for uniform methods of jury selection and prohibiting discrimination in choosing of panelists.

Another would have enabled the U.S. attorney general to seek injunctive relief against public officials—and private citizens — who tried to interfere with a person's civil rights.

A fourth section — this one widely supported by Southerners after the black power demonstrations — would have made it a federal crime to cross state lines to incite a riot.

IN THE ORIGINAL bill, but scratched off by the House, was a provision enabling the U.S. Justice Department to file civil suits to force school desegregation.

The final section — by far the most controversial — would have guaranteed open housing. It was the first civil rights provision ever to have much potential effect in the North.

It was the housing provision which underwent the greatest reduction in the House.

When first presented, it exempted only homeowners selling their own houses and those real estate agents representing homeowners who had stated in writing that they did not want to sell to Negroes.

By the time the bill was passed on to the Senate, it was made inapplicable to general real estate agents, builders or landlords with fewer than four living units, and ethnic groups renting apartments.

IN SHORT, it covered primarily developers of large subdivisions and agents for multifamily apartments — about 30 per cent of the entire housing market.

With the present climate of Congress, and the same stringent filibuster-cutoff rule still before them, sponsors of this year's bill will have two choices:

1. Submit essentially the same bill that finally passed the House last year, and hope it goes through without being gutted, or

2. Try to save what they can in advance, either by separating the housing section into a companion bill or by watering it down until it is acceptable to enough legislators to pass.

Which they do depends on two major factors — how much time and effort the Johnson administration wants to spend pushing the bill and whether there will be any dramatic racial incidents to help them.

MUCH OF THE steam generated behind last year's bill was a result of the efforts of Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey, who devoted a considerable amount of time to selling the bill to Congress.

But this year, there has been no indication so far as to how hard the President is willing to press. If the outlook doesn't appear to be promising, some think, Johnson may not think it worth the time.

"There's been no sign of a concerted push," said one insider this week. "I don't think the White House has made up its mind."

The "dramatic incident" is a miracle the liberals are hoping for and half believing in.

MOST RECALL vividly the pre-1964 struggle in which Southern policemen were nationally televised clubbing Negroes —a vision that helped push through a major bill that year.

In 1966, the only vision was that of black powermakers like Stokely Carmichael, and even some civil rights leaders now are blaming him for last year's defeat.

Until early April, when the would-be sponsors take their final congressional head-count before introducing the bill, the makeup of this year's legislation will be a long way from certain.

Proponents of the bill are just beginning their "pulse-taking," as they call it, with casual questions to senators and representatives to sound them out.

"We're having to go through the motions all over again," said one northerner last week," and we don't know quite where they're going to lead us."

WASHINGTON (UPI) — President Lyndon B. Johnson will ask Congress Wednesday for a sweeping civil rights program, including a gradual, three-stage end to discrimination in housing.

The President is scheduled to send the special message to Congress, marking the fourth time in four years the administration has asked for civil rights laws.

The new civil rights package, according to informed sources, is very similar to the one passed by the House in modified form and filibustered to death by the Senate last year.

The controversial "open housing" section has been revamped to provide for a gradual end to discrimination in the rental or sale of property rather than the outright ban advocated last year by the administration.

The sources said the new housing proposal will be patterned after the equal employment opportunity section of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Under this provision, employers with less than 100 employes were exempt the first year. This was reduced to 75 the second year; to 50 the third year, and to a basic 25 after that.

A similar three-stage operation is planned for the housing proposal. It would be voluntary the first year; apply to large developments and apartments the second year, and to all homes after that.

Opposition to the housing provision killed the 1966 civil rights bill, although it was sharply modified by the House. The House-passed bill would have exempted all but an estimated 23 million apartments in larger buildings and homes in new developments — about 40 per cent of the nation's total housing.

The chief obstacle to Senate approval was Republican leader Everett M. Dirksen, who refused to accept any housing provision. Without his aid, efforts to stifle the Senate filibuster failed.

The new civil rights package also will include several other provisions which died last year.

These would outlaw discrimination in the selection of federal, state, and local juries and strengthen federal laws forbidding violence and terror against Negroes and civil rights workers.

New provisions in this year's program would give added powers to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and grant another extension to the Civil Rights Commission.

The proposed bill would provide "cease and desist" powers to the commission which now has to go to court to move against employers who discriminate.

ATLANTA

Atlantans in Slums Explain Problems

AC 2/17/67

By MARGARET HURST

Atlantans with problems found a receptive ear Thursday night at the first public hearing of the Atlanta Community Relations Commission.

An overflow crowd packed the aldermanic chambers at City Hall as approximately 35 persons representing areas such as Vine City, Lightning, Blue Heaven, Pittsburg and Summerhill told the commission of problems which were sometimes personal and often community-wide.

The commission was created to deal with problems of poverty and race.

Three boys from the Vine City area asked the commission to reopen a community center closed because of a cutback in Economic Opportunity Atlanta funds.

One of the young men, Joe Lewis, said things were so bad in Vine City that "even the rats were complaining about a better place to live."

Another Vine City spokesman, J. Otis Cochran, asked the commission to try to reopen the center.

"A city which can spend millions of dollars on a stadium to entertain thousands of middle class Atlantans can find money to saves hundreds of boys on the brink of delinquency," Cochran said.

Bob Haver, a spokesman for the Southwest Atlanta for Progress group, voiced a problem with a slightly different twist —how to slow down integration.

Haver, a white man, stressed that his group believes "integration is healthy", but added, "we don't want our neighborhood to become all Negro or all-white."

He told the commission, "We need people who understand change to come to our meetings and speak to us." He said the street on which he lives has a population of about 50 per cent Negroes and 50 per cent whites and he is interested in stabilizing the population along those lines.

Mrs. Louise Whatley, a resident of Carver Homes, said Carver parents were charged $5 whenever children were found playing on the grass and that service charges doubled and tripled for each time a repair was needed.

And so it went for nearly three hours. There was talk about zoning, discrimination in city jobs, discrimination in real estate sales and scores of other matters. The commission members promised to do what they could.

LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS

ANALYSIS OF CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1967 (Senate No. S.1026)

The Administration's 1967 civil rights bill (S.1026) covers the same general areas of concern as that of 1966 (H.R.14765) with the exception of Title III. In last year's bill that title would have granted to the Attorney General the right to institute suits to desegregate public schools and public facilities. Title III of this year's bill is an amendment to Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. It would give to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission authority to issue cease and desist orders enforceable in the federal courts. This year's bill has an additional title - VI - to extend the life of the Civil Rights Commission.

There are a few significant changes from the 1966 bill in Title IV, the housing title, and Title V, protection for civil rights. The differences in the jury titles, I and II, appear to be technical and less than major.

Reference in this memorandum to H.R.14765 will be to the bill that passed the House and was filibustered in the Senate in 1966.

TITLE I - FEDERAL JURY REFORM

The first title regulates the selection of federal juries. It prohibits discrimination in selection on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, national origin or economic status. It establishes a method of selecting juries on a random, representative basis. The basic source of jury lists will be voting lists, except that where such lists are not representative, the judicial council of the circuit can require the use of additional sources. Parties to a suit may require the production of evidence by the jury commissioner to determine whether the provisions of this title are being complied with. The only disqualifying factors for jury selection would be failure to meet citizenship, age or residence requirements, illiteracy, incapacitating mental or physical infirmity or conviction of a crime punishable by more than one year's imprisonment.

TITLE II - STATE JURY REFORM

Title II prohibits any distinction because of race, color, religion, sex, national origin, or economic status in the selection of state juries. The prohibition could be enforced through civil action brought by the Attorney General, a private person suffering discrimination, or by a litigant in a criminal or civil case. In any such case, the title provides discovery procedures under which it would be determined how juries are selected. If the court finds probable cause to believe that discrimination occurred and that the records are insufficient to permit a determination, the burden is shifted to the state to show non-discrimination. Relevant jury records must be kept for a specified time, and would be subject to production and inspection. When a court finds discrimination, it is authorized to fashion appropriate relief, including: suspension or prohibition of discriminatory qualifications, or ones that are so subjective as to permit abuse; requiring use of objective criteria; and appointment of a master to perform the duties of the jury commissioner.

TITLE III - EQUAL EMPLOYMENT

Title III would amend Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to strengthen the authority of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Under this title the Commission would have subpoena power to assist in its investigation of charges of discrimination. It could conduct hearings on such charges. Upon a finding of discrimination, it could issue cease and desist orders enforceable in the federal courts. Such orders could include a requirement of affirmative action, including an award of back pay. Before conducting a hearing, the Commission would be required to attempt to affect a settlement by conciliation.

The title would continue in effect the requirement that cases must be referred for a limited time to state and local governments having enforceable FEP laws. The Commission would be authorized, but not required, to surrender complete jurisdiction in employment cases to such governments.

Individuals who do not receive satisfaction from the Commission would be authorized to file civil suits for redress, and the authority of the Attorney General to file suits against patterns or practices of discrimination would not be affected.

Persons aggrieved and "other persons" may intervene in a hearing at the discretion of the Commission, and "any interested person" may intervene in the enforcement proceedings in the discretion of the court. Aggrieved persons may obtain review of any final order of the Commission.

TITLE IV - HOUSING DISCRIMINATION

This title would prohibit discrimination because of race, color, religion or national origin in the purchase, rental, financing or occupancy of any housing (with the single exception of housing sponsored by religious organizations for their members).

This total coverage would be reached in stages. Immediately on passage of the bill, all housing now covered by the existing executive order would be affected. In 1968 all housing not owner-occupied and all housing of five or more units would be added; this would add many apartments and all new housing. Beginning with 1969 coverage would include the total housing market.

The chief means of enforcement would be by administrative action conducted by the Department of HUD. The Secretary would be authorized to receive and investigate complaints, to conduct hearings and to issue court-enforceable cease and desist orders, including orders for $50 a day penalties for failure to obey initial orders. He would have subpoena power to support investigations and hearings. Before issuing a complaint, he would be required to try to affect a settlement by conciliation.

Aggrieved persons who do not obtain satisfaction through the administrative procedure may file civil action to enforce rights protected by this title. The Attorney General could file suits against patterns and practices of discrimination.

The Secretary may cooperate with, and delegate duities to, state housing agencies, including the full enforcement of provisions of this title.

The title includes an "anti-block busting" provision, and one that would prevent real estate organizations from discriminating in admission practices.

To assist him in enforcement of the title, the bill provides for an additional assistant secretary for the Department of HUD.

TITLE V - INTERFERENCE WITH CIVIL RIGHTS

Title V would make it a federal criminal offense to interfere with specified civil rights because of the victim's race, color, religion or national origin. The rights so protected are voting, running for public office, serving as a poll watcher, enrolling in or attending a public school or college, participating in or enjoying any federal or state benefit or program, seeking or engaging in employment, engaging in housing activities, serving as a juror, using any common carrier, enjoying any benefit assisted by federal funds and using any place of public accommodation.

Also prohibited is interference with anyone to discourage a person from enjoying such rights or for having assisted another to do so.

Penalties could be up to life imprisonment, where death occurs. Existing civil rights laws are amended to provide similar penalties.

Persons aggrieved would also be given the right to sue for preventive relief or for damages.

The "anti-riot" provision adopted in the House last year is not included.

TITLE VI - CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

Under this title the life of the Civil Rights Commission would be extended for five additional years beyond its present termination date--January 31, 1968.

THE NEW YORK TIMES,

Kennedy Puts In Bill to Produce Jobs in the Slums

Criticizing U.S. Antipoverty Effort, He Seeks to Lure Private Plants to Ghetto

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, July 12 — Senator Robert F. Kennedy offered in the Senate today a plan to create jobs for the unemployed and unskilled in the slums through the use of private capital.

The plan would represent a sharp break with the nation's 30-year tradition of trying to help the hard-core jobless primarily through government action.

In a 45-minute Senate speech, the New York Democrat, while emphasizing that he had supported Great Society programs and called for their expansion, said that much of the present Federal antipoverty strategy was "ineffective, inefficient and degrading."

His bill for slum jobs—like one for more and better housing for the poor, which he will introduce tomorrow—seeks to lure the capital resources of private industry into the poor ghettos through tax incentives.

Proposed Inducements

It would offer companies willing to build job-producing plants in the ghettos the following inducements:

¶An increase in the percentage of new investment in machinery that businesses may deduct from taxes due the Government. At present, businesses may deduct from taxes owed up to 7 per cent of the cost of new machinery and equipment. Mr. Kennedy would raise this to 10 per cent.

¶A further tax credit of 7 per cent of the cost of building a new plant. Present law allows only for the 7 per cent deduction on equipment and machinery.

¶A special tax deduction that would amount to one-fourth of the salaries paid to the hard-core poor hired by a company. Business concerns, in computing the cost of doing business for purposes of income tax deduction, now may deduct from gross income the salaries and wages they pay. Under the Kennedy plan a ghetto company would deduct 125 per cent of the wages paid its low-income employes.

Sees a Present Failure

¶An accelerated depreciation schedule that would shorten by as much as one-third the period in which businesses could write off the cost of construction, plant and equipment. Such a fast tax writeoff lets the owner of a property assign a larger share of the property's value to depreciation in one year, as a business expense, thus reducing the owner's taxable income in that year.

Senator James B. Pearson, Arkansas Republican, joined Mr. Kennedy in introducing the bill. There were 18 other sponsors, including five Republicans.

Mr. Kennedy made clear that he sought to remedy what he called "the greatest failure in our existing poverty efforts—the failure to involve and rely on the private enterprise system which is the basic strength of the nation."

United Press International Telephoto

Senator Joseph S. Clark, left, chairman of subcommittee on employment, manpower and poverty, and Senator Robert F. Kennedy, New York Democrat, at hearing yesterday.

This failure, he said, has condemned the poor to "a separate economy, almost a separate nation—a second-rate system of welfare handouts, a screen of government agencies keeping the poor apart from the rest of us."

"To rely exclusively, even primarily, on government efforts is not only to ignore the shaping traditions of American life and policies," he asserted. "To ignore the potential contribution of private enterprise is to fight the war on poverty with a single platoon, while great armies are left aside.

"For private enterprise is not just another part of America. In a significant sense, private enterprise is the very sinew and strength of America."

The incentives offered in the bill would not apply to businesses that moved their plants from one location to another. Only those that constructed new facilities or expanded existing ones would be eligible.

Poverty Areas Designated

Moreover, to be eligible, businesses would have to build or expand in one or more of 193 areas in 37 states designated as "poverty" areas by the Office of Economic Opportunity, or in other areas that might be designated later by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development.

In addition, businesses would have to agree to do the following:

¶Create at least 50 full-time jobs, of which two-thirds would have to be filled by residents of the poverty area or by other unemployed persons.

¶Agree to maintain the investment for 10 years. If an employer were forced to reduce his staff for economic reasons, he would have to retain the same percentage of low-income persons.

¶Fulfill other conditions, such as obtaining approval from the city government and paying wages comparable to those paid by competitors in the same locale.

The bill also provides for a manpower training program, which would cost $20-million the first year. Unlike present manpower programs, in which trainees face an uncertain future, trainees would be prepared for specific jobs in ghetto plants.

The over-all cost of the Kennedy plan is difficult to estimate, because it would depend on the size of the investment that business made in the slums.

Mr. Kennedy offered a hypothetical example in which one business, making a $1-million investment split equally between plant and equipment and creating 50 new jobs, would receive benefits under the bill amounting to about $90,000.

Of this, $35,000 would be accounted for by the 7 per cent tax credit for plant, $25,000 by the extra tax credit for machinery and equipment, and $30,000 that the employer would save on his tax bill by deducting 125 per cent of his employes' wages.

Under this calculation, the cost to the Treasury of creating 50,000 jobs—1,000 times as many as in the example—would be $90-million.

Mr. Kennedy said, however, that the Treasury would recoup this and more from new income tax revenues generated by the new jobs, increased profits of construction companies, new tax revenues generated by jobs created "indirectly" by the original investment, and other sources. In addition, he said, the welfare rolls would be reduced.

HOUSE TAKES UP CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

LEGISLATION

Measure With Penalties for Violence May Pass Today

NYT 8/16/67

By JOHN HERBERS

WASHINGTON, Aug. 15—The House began debate today on a long pending bill that would extend legal protection from intimidation and violence to persons exercising their civil rights.

The bill, one of the least controversial of President Johnson's civil rights proposals, is expected to pass tomorrow, possibly with weakening amendments.

It would strengthen laws making it a crime to harass or harm Negroes or civil rights workers excercising federally protected rights. It would provide for punishment up to life imprisonment in the event of death, and would specifically apply in the areas of voting, education, public accommodations, employment, jury service, use of common carriers and participation in federally assisted programs.

Republican Emanuel Celler, Democrat of Brooklyn, who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, pleaded for passage of the bill to help alleviate the "Negro despair" he said was the cause of recent urban rioting. This bill, he said, and the one passed by the House last month making it a crime to cross state lines to incite a riot "are the reverse and obverse of the same coin."

Part of Defunct Bill

The measure is part of the omnibus civil rights bill that passed the House last year but died in the Senate. It was not nearly as controversial as the sections on open housing and jury reform, partly because it would be applicable chiefly in the South. It now has the support of the Republican as well as the Democratic leadership.

Southerners are providing most of the opposition. They slowed action on the bill today by demanding frequent quorum calls. One of the pending amendments, by Basil L. Whitener, Democrat of North Carolina, would specify that nothing in the bill pre-empt state laws, so long as the state laws did not conflict with Federal laws.

The southerners charged that the bill would be used to protect those who incited riots, and even some who spoke in favor of the bill used the occasion to denounce the riots.

Urges Maturity

"The time has come," Mr. Anderson said, "for this Government to ask those in the civil rights movement to exhibit a little maturity of judgment" and cease using "inflammatory language."

John Conyers Jr., Democrat of Detroit, who is a Negro, responded that Dr. King had condemned the riots and had been "the most consistent opponent of violence that America has had, black or white."

Mr. Celler pointed out that the legislation President Johnson was seeking was not new but a strengthening of laws enacted a few years after the Civil War, but "artificially drawn and full of lopholes."

"We are seeking to put flesh and muscle on the old skeleton," he said.

ON LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT

Foes of civil rights proposals borrow weapon from LBJ talk

B'ham News 1/24/68

BY PAUL SCOTT

WASHINGTON

President Johnson's decision to leave the problem of race rioters to local law enforcement officials has presented a strong new weapon to Senate opponents of one of his major civil rights proposals.

They are now using the President's anticrime statement in their fight to kill or drastically alter legislation intended to protect individuals in the exercise of a wide variety of civil rights.

Headed by Sen. James Eastland, D-Miss., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, these opponents are attacking the administration's measure in the Senate, where it is now being debated. The group is circulating a memorandum charging, "The provisions of this (civil rights) bill could be used to harass and deter local law enforcement officers."

THE EASTLAND group memo calls attention to the President's declaration in his State-of-the-Union address, "Those who preach disorder and those who preach violence must know that local authorities are able to resist them swiftly, to resist them sternly, and to resist them decisively." Then it warns:

"It is manifestly unfair to put these local officials in the front line of the struggle to maintain a society of law and order while placing them under the terrible omnipresent threat of being hailed into federal court on a criminal charge because the attorney general determines they had used an unreasonable amount of force in suppressing a riot."

To rule out this "threat," the Eastland group will attempt to add to the administration's civil rights proposal an amendment written into a similar bill on the House floor. It provides:

". . . Nothing within this section shall be construed so as to deter any law enforcement officer from lawfully carrying out the lawful duties of his office and no such officer shall be considered to be in violation of this section for carrying out the lawful duties of his office or enforcing, lawful ordinances and laws of the U. S. or their political subdivisions."

IN ADDITION to this protection for local law enforcement officers, the Eastland group will try to add to the Senate bill another House-passed amendment, designed to make sure the bill isn't used to protect agitators such as H. Rap Brown and Stokely Carmichael, the Black Power militants.

This amendment, which obtained overwhelming Republican support in the House, states:

"As used in this section, the term 'engaged in speech or peaceful assembly' shall not mean the urging, instigating or inciting of other persons to riot or to commit any act of violence in futherance of a riot."

Both of these House-approved amendments were defeated by narrow margins in the Senate Judiciary Committee, which cleared the controversial civil rights measure by a cliff-hanging eight-to-seven vote.

IN MOUNTING their campaign the Eastland group will attempt to label the administration's civil rights proposal publicly as "a protection measure for agitators like Brown and Carmichael."

This attack plan is clearly indicated in the minority report prepared by Senators Eastland and Strom Thurmond, R-S. C., which charges:

"This bill will give added protection to roving fomentors of violence, such as Stokely Carmichael and H. Rap Brown.

"Under its terms and provisions, if a person had been present during the inflammatory speech of H. Rap Brown which led to the Cambridge, Md., riots on July 24, 1967, and, becoming enraged at the inflammatory statements made by Brown, had shouted a threat to him from the audience, that person could be tried under this act and fined up to $1,000 and imprisoned for one year.

"If such person had jumped up on the platform and struck Brown, giving him a bloody nose, he could be punished by 10 years in prison and fined up to $10,000. No punishment could be imposed on H. Rap Brown under these circumstances."

THE EASTLAND group is also planning to offer the House-passed antiriot bill as an amendment to the civil rights measure. Senators Edward Kennedy, R-Mass., and Philip Hart, D-Mich., co-authors of the administration's bill, blocked a similar effort in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

SEN. EASTLAND

Since the House by a 347 to 70 vote passed the antiriot bill last July, Senators Kennedy and Hart have also succeeded in keeping the Judiciary Committee from reporting it out as a separate bill.

Unless it is set aside for other legislation, Senate debate on the civil rights proposal could tie up that body until next spring. Since liberal supporters are planning to try to attach an open housing amendment to the bill, both supporters and opponents are threatening to "debate the measure for months."

The first major congressional reform bill since 1946 is due for early approval by Congress.

After delaying action on the Senate-passed measure for more than 10 months, House Democratic leaders have finally decided to bring the legislation to a floor vote early in February.

A Common Fear Grips Rights Talks

WASHINGTON—An odd mood of foreboding is developing in the civil rights debate in the Senate. The leaders on both sides share a common fear: that they will not be able to control events during the long summer debate and that some ghastly incident will inflame the races and once more command this doom-filled story.

Paradoxically, the principal antagonists in the debate do not fear one another so much as they fear their own most militant supporters. It is not Sen. Richard B. Russell of Georgia who fears the drift of some Negro leaders from peaceful demonstration into civil disobedience, but Sen. Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota.

Russell is afraid of violence by the white militants and Humphrey is afraid of civil disobedience by his most ardent Negro supporters, and for the same reason. They both fear the reaction of the majority of the people against whoever starts the fighting.

Humphrey needs at least 64 votes to bring the talking to an end probably sometime near the close of June. He now has only 60 votes and isn't very sure of all of them, and he is convinced that, while orderly Negro demonstrations may help him, dramatic civil disobedience creating civic disorder could very well make his task impossible.

This is why the administration has been so concerned about plans by the Brooklyn chapter of CORE to tie up all traffic leading to the World's Fair just as it is concerned about talk of creating a water shortage in New York simply by opening the taps. Nothing is more calculated to lose rights votes than carefully planned traffic jams.

The longer the bill goes on, the greater the danger of violence. Thousands of white students will be going into the South to help with Negro voter registration as soon as classes end in June. And thousands of partisans will be flocking here to petition their senators. This is a short-tempered city anyway in the gin and humidity season, and it will take mature and responsible leadership to keep the militant minorities from dominating the news.

The Lawyers Speak Out—

Mail inspired by the filibuster against the civil rights bill falls roughly into three categories. There is fanatic support of the senators filibustering and of denunciation of the bill. Much of the latter is based on erroneous information. There also is some approval of the bill's objectives. An increasing number of letters seek information about the bill or portions of it.

A number of Southern leaders who oppose the legislation have assured their constituents it is unconstitutional. If it is, then these persons have nothing to worry about and one wonders at their agitation. However, only the U.S. Supreme Court, constitutionally established to determine what legislation is in accord with the Constitution, may say.

Those provisions of the bill that would end bias in job opportunities and in access to places of public accommodation now have vigorous endorsement from a distinguished panel of 22 lawyers. They include four past presidents of the American Bar Association and three former attorneys general of the United States.

The List

Those who sincerely seek information will be interested in the list. The former attorneys general are Francis Biddle, Herbert Brownell and William P. Rogers. The latter two served under President Eisenhower. Mr. Biddle was in Franklin D. Roosevelt's cabinet. The four former presidents of the A.B.A. are:

David F. Maxwell of Philadelphia, John Randall of Cedar Rapids, Iowa; Charles S. Rhyne

The List

Those who sincerely seek information will be interested in the list. The former attorneys general are Francis Biddle, Herbert Brownell and William P. Rogers. The latter two served under President Eisenhower. Mr. Biddle was in Franklin D. Roosevelt's cabinet. The four former presidents of the A.B.A. are:

David F. Maxwell of Philadelphia, John Randall of Cedar Rapids, Iowa; Charles S. Rhyne of Washington and Whitney North Seymour of New York.

Others signing included Norris Darrell of New York, president of the American Law Institute, and four law school deans: Erwin N. Griswold of Harvard, Eugene V. Rostow of Yale, John W. Wade of Vanderbilt and William B. Lockhart of Minnesota.

The lawyers included a legal memorandum. In it the signers said Title Two of the bill, outlawing discrimination at hotels and other places of public accommodation had two "sound constitutional bulwarks."

These, the legal memorandum said, are Congress's power to regulate interstate commerce and the 14th Amendment's ban on racial discrimination by the states and their agencies. As to Title Seven, on fair employment, the lawyers said its provisions were well within the findings of many judicial decisions on the power over commerce.

People Deceived

In 1954, and in the years before, there were Southern politicians who chose to deceive the people of their states by declaring that eliminating discrimination in segregated schools was unconstitutional and assuring them that the state laws would be able to maintain discrimination. Had they told the people the truth the South and the nation would have been able to leave the school problem to the professional school administrators rather than making the issue one of politics.

The bill does not interfere with homeowners in selling or renting. The bill does not even mention housing.

Private clubs, organizations and fraternities specifically are exempted. The bill does not say any public accommodation business "must serve" anyone. It simply says all persons must be treated alike. Rules of dress and conduct may be enforced. Small rooming houses are entirely exempted.

The civil rights bill has nothing whatever to do with curriculum or the hiring of teachers. Nor does it do any harm to unions. The bill does not seek to legislate racial equality. Its sole and total purpose is to establish equality of citizenship. It does not touch the private home, club, or social life.

The truth will help us more than fiction.

The Civil Rights Bill—No. 1

TITLE II LISTS 'OPEN' PLACES

4-19-64

By TED LIPPMAN
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—H.R. 7152, "The Civil Rights Act of 1964," is a 55-page, 11-title bill. It passed the House of Representatives Feb. 10 and has been the subject of Senate debate since March 9.

Title II outlaws discrimination on the basis of "race, color, religion or national origin" in any "establishments which serve the public" if (1) "its operations affect commerce" or if (2) discrimination is "supported by state action."

This is the first of five articles giving details of the civil rights legislation now before the U.S. Senate. The articles will continue daily in The Atlanta Constitution.

The bill lists the following "places" specifically: Inn, motel, hotel, restaurant, cafeteria, lunch room, lunch counter, soda fountain, motion picture house, theater, concert hall, sports arena, stadium.

THIS is not a limiting list. Places located in the listed places are also covered. (A bar in a motel, for example.) Also, the bill defines "commerce" as "travel, trade, traffic, commerce, transportation or communication" across state lines.

If a law or "regulation, rule or order" of a political subdivision compels segregation in any place, that place is also covered by Title II. "Custom or usage" enforced by political subdivisions also bring the place involved under Title II.

Private clubs are not covered unless the club's facilities are available to customers of places covered above. (A club's golf course open to a hotel's guests.)

An individual or the U.S. Attorney General may apply for an injunction against the owner or operator of an establishment that discriminates or one "about to" discriminate.

U.S. district courts have jurisdiction over cases involving this title.

U.S. Given the Power to File Suit Against State Facilities

By TED LIPPMAN
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Title III and Title VI of the civil rights bill (H.R. 7152) deal with facilities run or owned by a state or political subdivision (excepting schools) and with programs receiving federal financial aid.

This is the third of five articles giving details of the civil rights legislation now before the U.S. Senate.

The 11-part bill passed the House Feb. 10 and has been before the Senate since March 9.

Title III allows the attorney general of the United States to file suit in a United States district court against any facility owned or run by a state or political subdivision if that facility is said to be discriminating on the basis of race, color, religion or national origin.

Before the attorney general may file such a suit, he must receive a signed complaint charging discrimination. He must certify that he believes the signer is unable to file suit on his own, because of fear of reprisal or lack of money.

Title VI says no person may be discriminated against on the grounds of race, color or national origin under programs receiving federal financial aid. Aid is defined in the bill as "grant, loan or contract other than a contract of insurance or guaranty."

Title VII says each federal department and agency shall make rules "of general applicability" to ensure that federal funds are not used in a discriminatory way.

The rules must be approved by the President.

An agency or department may be cut off the particular federal aid involved if it finds, in a hearing, that the "recipient" is discriminating. "Recipients" of federal funds are states, cities, counties and agencies of states, cities and counties.

Birchers Going All-Out to Kill Rights Bill by Letter Writing

4-21-64 Const.

By BEN A. FRANKLIN
(Copyright 1964 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON — The John Birch Society has called on its members to continue a "massive" letter writing and advertising campaign against passage of the civil rights bill that is reported already to have produced "half a million messages to Washington."

In the March issue of the John Birch Society Bulletin, official magazine of the extremist group, Robert Welch, society president, urged members of local chapters to organize "the most massive protest—by mail, telegram, by advertising, by the distribution of literature, by personal conversations and in every other practicable way —that we have ever undertaken with regard to any legislation."

Both the March and April issues of the Bulletin include the layout of a suggested three-column newspaper advertisement. The Bulletin suggests the ads be placed with "scrupulous proofreading."

However, the bulletins also suggest that the ads should not carry a John Birch Society identification.

The suggested headline for the advertisement declares: "Every Vote for the Civil Rights Act of 1963 Is a Nail for the Coffin of the American Republic."

South Setting Racial Pace, Editor Says

4-21-64 Const.

By CLIFF SESSIONS

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Eugene Patterson, a new member of the Civil Rights Commission, predicted Monday that the South will lead the nation in settling racial problems.

Patterson, editor of The Atlanta Constitution, told the Women's National Democratic Club he believed a "final, good faith settlement will come first in the South."

The nation is making progress in race relations, he said, "but we are now finding a national problem and not just a Southern one."

NAMED BY PRESIDENT

Patterson, appointed Saturday to the Civil Rights Commission by President Lyndon B. Johnson, said "vicious racialism" is dying in the South although "pockets remain, perhaps entire states."

He said his home town had desegregated "practically every facet of life" and integration of each additional facility is greeted with "an astonishing sense of relief."

Segregation is no longer a "political necessity" in Georgia, said Patterson, predicting a change in the South's attitude will be reflected in the action of its politicians. He said changes had already been noted in Sen. Richard B. Russell, D-Ga., and Herman E. Talmadge, D-Ga.

MYTH IS DYING

The veteran newsman said the South is killing a myth that "the devil shaped the Negro" and he warned other regions against accepting a myth that "Satan shaped the Southerner."

He urged that problems be met with national unity and without "dividing into sections any longer."

Patterson predicted Negroes in the civil rights movement would not permit "divisive zealous leaders to seize and misuse it." He commended Senators. Hubert H. Humphrey, D-Minn., and Thomas H. Kuchel, R-Calif., for issuing a warning against unlawful demonstrations.

4 Parts of Touchy Measure Stir Up Little Controversy

By TED LIPPMAN
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Four titles of the 11-title Civil Rights Act of 1964 have received little attention, at least relatively, in the Senate debate that began March 9. (The bill passed the House on Feb. 10.)

Title V extends the life of the Civil Rights Commission to 1968.

This is the fourth of five articles giving details of the civil rights legislation now before the U.S. Senate.

It also broadens some of the powers of the commission, a fact - finding, recommending agency set up by the first modern civil rights bill in 1957.

Title IX deals with appeals growing out of civil rights cases. If a case appealed from a state court to a federal district court is remanded back to the state court, that action can then be reviewed by a higher federal court.

Title X establishes a community relations service. This service would operate under the Department of Commerce. Its function would be to "provide assistance to communities and persons therein in resolving disputes, disagreements or difficulties relating to discriminatory practices. . . ."

It would provide (or offer) such service whenever it felt "peaceful relations among the citizens of the community involved are threatened. . . ."

Title XI is labeled "miscellaneous." It says that "nothing in this act" shall keep the Justice department from using existing laws on civil rights, that the new law will not preempt similar state laws, that Congress shall appropriate whatever money needed under the new law and that if part of the law is found unconstitutional that won't affect the rest of it.

Republicans On Civil Rights

Republican policy on civil rights shapes up as a tougher one than the Democrats' in some respects, if an influential GOP committee prevails. A new paper issued by the Republican citizens group, called the Critical Issues Council, even proposes to cut back the number of congressmen of any state that persists in denying voting rights to Negroes.

The punitive proposal, made with dead seriousness, can hardly be called the work of liberals. Former President Eisenhower's brother, Dr. Milton Eisenhower, is chairman of the council. Its membership includes Adm. Arleigh Burke, Arthur F. Burns, Raymond Saulnier, Thomas S. Gates, Gen. Lauris Norstad, Lewis L. Strauss and Walter H. Judd.

It is a measure of the country's commitment to civil rights that such a Republican group should be found endorsing most objectives of the Democratic administration's bill and proposing to toughen some of it.

Preoccupation with the current Senate filibuster can delude persons who lose perspective. It is probably true that the nation is reacting adversely to the wrecking-crew tactics of some heedless Negro demonstrators, and that Alabama's George Wallace is tearing up the patch in Indiana. But the undistracted realist who wants to see where he is going will note that both parties are going forward, not turning back, on civil rights.

The Republican committee endorses FEPC and public accommodations legislation; it suggests a toughening in the education section of the present rights bill to speed up school desegregation; it concludes, "The civil rights bill now in Congress may not be enough to assure the Negro's right to vote."

If "painfully slow" judicial enforcement "continues to be inadequate," the GOP committee writes, then "under the 14th Amendment state representation in Congress can be reduced in proportion to the numbers of voters systematically denied the franchise."

How can this be justified? "If Negroes are counted when representation (in Congress) is determined," the Republicans state, "then they should be allowed to vote.

"If they cannot vote, they ought not to be counted for purposes of (a state's) representation. Republicans have recognized that it may be necessary to implement this alternative."

Democratic policymakers have not yet gone this far. But they may. To deny the vote to a qualified Negro citizen is not thought to be right by most of the nation (or by most of the South's people, I believe). It is those who do think it is all right who should note the facts most soberly, for their wishes are the ones in conflict.

Literacy Tests Are Out --- Unless Written, Certified

By TED LIPPMAN
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—The bill is officially H.R. 7152. Its short title is "The Civil Rights Act of 1964."

It is 55 pages long and contains 11 separate titles or sections. It was passed by the House of Representatives on Feb. 10. The Senate has been debating it since March 9.

This is the second of five articles giving details of the civil rights legislation now before the U.S. Senate.

Title I and Title VIII deal with voting.

Title I says that state, county and local officials may not use "different" standards in determining if different people are qualified to vote.

Literacy tests are outlawed, unless they are written (if the prospective voter asks they be oral, they may be, if state law permits), and unless certified copies of the questions and his answers are given to the individual after he has taken the test.

In states in which literacy is a voting requirement, anyone who has completed six grades of school and who has not been ruled an incompetent is presumed to be literate.

All elections in which any federal office is filled is covered by Title I. That includes primaries.

In disputes growing out of the application of this section of the bill, the attorney general of the United States or the defendant may have the case heard by a special three-judge federal panel. An appeal from the panel's decision is to the Supreme Court.

Title VIII requires the U.S. Department of Commerce to compile statistics on voting and registration in "such geographic areas" recommended by the Commission on Civil Rights. If the commission requests it, the statistics must be broken down on the basis of race, color and national origin.

Aug. 15, liberals plan strategy to by-pass Senate committee, where bill is hopelessly stalled

Aug. 18, Hennings filed series of civil rights amendment to pending Senate bill

Aug. 25 - Javits and Case try new amneuver to force civil rights legislation onto Senate floor; they filed a discharge motion to try to pry the bill out of the Judiciary Committee.

This maneuver continued during recess with Celler reportedly having half of 219 signatures needed by Dec. 21, 1959. The House bill now does not contain Part III, registrars and anti-lynching provisions.

Nov. 18 - Atty-Gen Rogers said the administration may ask Congress for federal anti-lynching law.

CIVIL RIGHTS BILLS - 1959

1-15-59 - Dawson introduced civil rights bill
1. affirming federal court decisions
2. stating resistance or evasion is denial of constitutional rights
3. several states have not made "prompt and reasonable start" in school deseg.
4. denial of rights imposes second class citizenship

3. provide financial and technical help for states and communities to make changeover from segregated to integrated schools. Est. $4,895,000 to be matched by states for extra professional people.
4. government take over schools built with aid of federal funds (paying rental) for education of children of military personal who had been attending public schools closed in integration disputes
5. require preservation of federal election records and authorize Justice Dept. to inspect them
6. Give a basis of law rather than presidential executive order to gov. comm. which polices non-discrimination clauses in government contracts; also authority to hold hearings
7. continue Civil Rights Commission for two years beyond Sept. expiration date

SEE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD FOR COMPARISON OF THREE BILLS

2-6-59 - H. Talmadge (with Byrd, Robertson, Olin Johnson, Lister Hill, J.J. Sparkman, Eastland, Stennis) offered proposed constitutional amendment which would vest exclusive administration of public schools in the states and their political divisions.

May 20, 1959 - Humphrey introduced omnibus human rights bill in Senate designed to enforce integration in interstate transportation, prohibit discrimination in employment, outlaw poll tax, strengthen criminal provisions of existing civil rights laws, and strengthen laws relating to peonage, slavery, and involuntary servitude.

June 18, 1959 - House Judiciary Committee approved omnibus Civil Rights bill including all of administrations proposals PLUS authority for Atty-Gen. to seek injunctions on behalf of individuals whose civil rights are threatened (broader than Part III).

Members of Senate sub-committee voted 5-3 against injunction proposal

July 3, 1959 - Southern senators won modification of civil rights legislature in House Judiciary Committee when they broadened an anti-bombing provision to include all types of structures. (would include labor disputes)

July 28 - Republicans joined Southern Democrats in rejecting House Committee (vote 18-13) Part III which would empower Atty-Gen. to seek fed court injunctions to enforce civil rights. The Senate Judiciary Committee has already stricken this provision from a civil rights bill in Senate.

Aug. 18, 1959 - Sen. Hennings filed a series of civil rights amendments to a pending Senate bill dealing with the jurisdiction of Federal Courts. The amendments go beyond Pres. Eisenhower's recommendations.

Aug. 14, 1959 - Javits called for prompt action on civil rights legislation lodged in Senate Judiciary Committee.

Aug. 25, 1959 - Javits and Case offered motion to discharge Judiciary Comm. from further consideration of rights bill cleared by subcommittee in order to get it out of committee where it has been stalled for weeks.

Sept. 8, 1959 - Rep. Celler filed a petition to bypass a rules committee roadblock holding up action on civil rights legislation.

Senator Keating introduced bill to establish a commission on equal job opportunity under government contracts

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION - 1960

Jan. 6 - In an almost unprecedented action, Speaker Sam Rayburn invited House members to step up and sign a "discharge" petition as the quickest way to get a civil rights bill before the House. This action would by-pass the House Rules Committee, which has blocked such legislation. A petition to discharge the stalled bill has been on the House desk since last Summer; it hav 106 signatures, 219 are needed.

Jan.11 - Sen. Javits introduced 5 new civil rights bills:

1. recommendation for appointment of federal registrars to insure Negro voting rights.
2. permit Atty-Gen. to represent in lawsuits individuals who charge civil rights violations (Modification of Part III)
3. federal anti-lynching bill
4. require preservation of voting records and availability for federal inspection, require state voter registrars to fulfil their duties

Janl 14
(Eisenhower reaction to federal voting registrars at news conference: I don't even know whether it is constitutional. He prefers the c. r. bill he suggested last year.

Jan. 19 - First day of Senate Rules Committee Hearing: Sen. Ervin and Charles Bloch among those testifying.

Jan. 24 - Senate Rules Committee resumed hearings on voting rights legislation; set Feb. 5 as closing date.

Jan. 25 - N. Y. Times published list of 146 Democrats and 30 Republicans signing discharge petition; total 176.

House Republicans explained they were against discharge petitions "in principle" because they do not believe in circumventing House rules.

Jan. 26 - Atty-Gen Rogers proposed (news conference and draft Bill), for Administration, federal court "referees" instead of "registrars". Two advantages:
1. buttress right to vote in state as well as national elections
2. not only register voters where courts find pattern of discrimination, but also, at request of court, follow up cases to make certain that referee-registered voters are allowed to vote and have votes properly counted.

Jan. 38 - Sen. L. Johnson said toady changing the Constitution was the "proper" way to abolish the poll tax. Urged Senate to approve pending amendment "by overwhelming vote"

Jan. 29. House Rules Committee called to meeting for Monday, Feb. 1, by chairman to discuss civil rights bill lodged there since last August.
Hearings opened Feb. 4.

Jan. 31 - Administrations proposal for court appointed referees endorsed by Javits. discharge petition now has 190 of necessary 219 sigs.

Feb. 2 - Senate approved, 70-18, omnibus amendment that would affect five states, by outlawing poll tax (72-16, Holland of Fla.)

2. grant suffrage to District of Columbia to vote for President, Vice president, and delegates to House, as many as it would have as state, and to have such power as Congress conferred on them. (Keating)

3. permit Governors to appoint members of House of Representatives if majority of House killed in a nuclear attack. (Kefauver)

This poll tax amendment was approved after the Senate rejected Javits proposal to substitute a statute for the Amendment (50-37)

Feb. 11 - CCR staff director Tiffany said today the Commission is not opposing Justice Department's plan for Federal court appointed referees.

Feb. 16 - Senate majority leader Lyndon Johnson laid before Senate a minor bill affecting an Army post in Missouri and said it would be the vehicle on which civil rights amendments would be considered.

Sen. Russell moved to postpone consideration and debate until Feb. 23. Defeated 61-28. Senate filibuster begins.

Civil rights Amendment proposed as "riders" to House bill in Senate (Dirksen Amendments).

2/18 Justice Dept. sent to Congress new version of its voting referee bill. House Judiciary Committee member, McCullough of Ohio, said he would offer this draft as the official administration plan.

Signatures now: 209

Feb. 18 - House Rules Committee formally cleared civil rights legislation for floor action by vote of 7-4. Debate expected to begin around March 10.

Feb. 23 - Three major voting rights bills before Senate:

1. Humphrey-- federal voting registrars
2. 7-point administration bill, with federal court-appointed referees
3. compromise bill by Hennings, Senate Rules Comm. cham., with federal enrollment offices.

The Dirkson bill for the Administration omits two proposals of Humphrey"s bill:
1. limited federal funds in technical aid for school districts that end deseg.
2. statutory authority to President's Committee on Government Contracts.

Feb. 25 - Sen. Russell invoked Senate rule to restrict immediate civil rights consideration to an anti-bombing proposal.

Feb. 26 - Senate roll call vote defeated motion to adjourn Feb. 29 session at 5 p.m. and thus backed Senate Leader's plans for round-the-clock sessions in civil rights fight. (67--10) 24 hour sesssions began at noon on Feb. 29.

March 2 - Senate killed vivil rights bill amendment (Long of La.) to uphold right to advocate legal resistance to forcible integration. (64-34).
To table: D - 34, R - 30; Against D - 8, R - 26

Bills before Senate:

1. Dirksen Amendment--7 parts (6 part Eisenhower 1959 bill with new section on voting rights.

2. Celler bill--4 parts (House Judiciary Committee rewrite); biparticon move to add 5th section to it on voting rights

Dirksen	Celler

Nov. 12 - Plans to purge Colmer (Miss.) from House Rules Committee.

Dec. 25 - Plans to enlarge House Rules Committee to break southern bloc. Other suggestions: 21 day Rule in effect as in 1949 and 1950.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION: 1961

Jan. 1 - Two battles to change procedures of the House and Senate began Jan. 2 as the 87th Congress met; the Kennedy administration's legislative program is vitally involved.

Democratic liberals have been meeting in caucus. The attitude of Speaker Sam Rayburn is likely to be decisive; so far no commitment.

Both Republican and Democratic platforms in the 1960 election pledged revision of Senate rules. A compromise proposal (Sen. Keating) would permit majority closure, but would grant each side on a pending issue a further 50 hours of speaking time.

Question to be debated is whether Senate is a "continuing body" with rules that carry over.

Proposals given out to press are: 1) enlarging rules committee by two or three; 2) revising 21-day rule; 3) election (rather than appointment) of two powerful committees: the policy and steering committees.

Jan. 2 - Rayburn announced he favors purge of Colmer and perhaps Winstead (Miss.) and Whitten (Miss.) or even all five southern Democrats who openly opposed the Democratic ticket (Williams (Miss.) Passman (La.).

Jan. 3 - 87th Congress convened.
Mansfield elected majority leader; Humphrey asst. leader, Senate Democrats
Dirksen, leader, Kuchel, whip, Republicans

House: McCormack, leader for Democrats; Halleck leader for Republicans

Nixon opinion (not ruling) after three-hour bombardment: Senate has right to adopt or change its rules at the opening of each session if the majority wishes.

SENATE: Anderson (& T. Morton) submitted resolution for reducing 2/3 requirement for cloture to 60%, or 3/5.

Humphrey & Kuchell offered motion to reduce required votes to 51, a constitutional majority, after 15 days. Their proposal insured 100 hours of debate before a filibuster could be forcibly stopped. (Precedent for majority closure: used in Senate before 1808.)

Bill introduced embodying Kennedy's proposals for aiding economically depressed areas.

Jan. 9 - Hearing on President-elect's cabinet appointees scheduled.
Senate filibuster continued through 5th day.

Jan. 10 - Mansfield & Dirksen moved question of rules changes be sent to Rules Committee. No agreement to vote obtained, and Senate adjourned without voting. Motion necessary, leaders said, so Senate could proceed with important business and take up rules change later in session.

k

Jan. 11 - Assignments to Senate committees ratified.

Vote 50 - 46 to send two proposals to Rules Committee. For D - 32; R - 18; Against D - 31, R - 18.

Rayburn announced plan to enlarge House Rules Committee rather than purge Colmer. Three members to be addes to 12 member committee: 2 Ds and 1 R.
Delay assures that Lyndon Johnson will be presiding when issue comes before Senate again.

Russell preferred tabling and killing motion, but feared he did not have necessary 3/5 vote.

Jan. 17 - Javits & Keating introduced 7 bills to

1) S-481, authorize atty-gen to initiate civil rights suits
2) S-484, provide technical & financial assistance to state and local school districts seeking to desegregate
3) S479, establish a statutory commission on equal job opportunity under government contracts
4) S-483, extend life of CCR indefinitely
5) S-480, establish 6th grade education as proof of literacy for voting purposes
6) S-482, make unlawful deprivations of rights under 14th amendment
7) S478, eliminate poll tax

Cooper: a bill authorizing U. S. atty-gen to intervene in school desegregation cases instituted by individuals.

Moss: three bills to
1) extend life of CCR
2) provide that 6th grade edu satisfy literacy requirements for voting
3) abolish poll tax

Jan. 18 - Rayburn in bat tle with Smith won formal endoresment at caucus of House Democrats for enlargement of Rules Committee. Rules Committee instructed to bring legislature to floor; Smith of Va. to introduce it.

Jan. 23 - Republican House minority in joint D-R conference voted against liberalizing Rules Committee

Jan. 24 - Resolution to increase Rules Committee membership reported to floor Committee vote 6 - 2, Smith and Colmer against.

Jan. 28 - Rayburn rejected compromise, fight continues. Smith had proposed guarantee Rules Committee, if retained in present form, would clear for House consideration the five items on Kennedy's priority list of domestic legislation:

1) development of depressed areas
2) expansion of housing programs
3) higher minimum wage with broader coverage
4) health insurance for aged
5) federal aid for public schools

Rayburn wanted guarantee ALL administration bills would be cleared at his request.

Jan. 30 - White House pressure added to battle. Criticism from N.C. re "blackmail" from Interior Dept. re proposed federal saline water conversion plant at Wrightsville Beach.

Jan. 31 - House Rules Committee enlarged from 12 to 15 members; vote 217 - 212 For: D - 175, R - 22; Against D - 64, R - 148.

Feb. 1 - Southern Democrats who voted against Rules Committee change charged "reprisals" in committee appointments. Committee on Committees denied charge.

Feb. 2 - Sources close to House leadership privately acknowledged charge true; Rayburn denied.

Feb. 4 - Pilcher (Ga.) said fight against enlarging rules committee was sponsored by U. S. Chamber of Commerce, Am. Farm Bureau, and special interests to block Pres. Kennedy's program. Cited other expanded committees in past and said civil rights not issue.

Feb. 6 - Republicans choose 3 conservative members for rules committee. Now 4 conservative southerners and 8 moderate to liberal democrats.

May 9 - Clark-Celler six point proposal to seppd school desegregation. (Pres. Kennedy appointed last year to put Democratic platform promises in form of legislation.)

1) require every school board operating segregated public schools to adopt desegregation plan within six months and file with Sec. of Welfare. Provision for court enforcement. Plans to provide compliance no later than start of 1963-64 school year.
2) make CCR permanent agency
3) provide judicial and administrative remedies against discrimination by business or labor unions in hiring, firing, or promotion
4) empower atty-gen to bring civil injunction suits in federal courts to prevent denial of civil rights because of color, race, or creed; authority now to file only to prevent denial of voting rights
5) eliminate poll tax as requirement for voting in federal elections
6) eliminate literacy tests as requirement for voting

May 10 - Salinger said, "The President has made it clear that he does not think it is necessary at this time to enact civil rights legislation." He added the administration was working on what it could accomplish under existing law.

Aug. 29 - Extension of CCR arguments; no vote in absence of quorum

Aug. 22 - attempts to attach civil rights rider to CCR extension bill made. Javits and Keating proposed amendments to 1) eliminate poll tax restriction on voting, and 2) authorize atty-gen to initiate civil rights suits, including school desegregation. Tabled and killed (Mansfield)

Senator Clark, to prove Senate rules archaic, forced 45 minute delay for 1) reading of preceding day's proceedings, 2) quorum call, 3) other delays within his rights. Hopes for change during next session.

Sept. 13 - House and Senate voted a twoyear extension of CCR by approving appropriations bill 300 - 106. Bill gave CCR $888,000 to finance during current fiscal year, same amount as last year.

Bill sent to President for signature

Sept. 18 - Senate defeated by 43 - 37 cloture petition aimed at changing rules and curbing filibusters. Against D - 28, R - 15; For D - 26, R - 11.

Then voted 47 - 35 to table Mansfield resolution on rules changes.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION: 1962

Jan. 22 - Congressman Ryan spoke to his bill, H.R. 7143, giving CCR authority to issue court enforceable cease and disist order against person or orgnization guilty of civil rights discrimination in fields of employment, insurance, labor relations, housing, and public accommodations.

Jan. 25 - Sen. Mansfield introduced Administaation civil rights legislation (bill drafted by Justice Dept.) to declare completion of 6th grade education is sufficient test of literacy for purpose of voting. One section of the bill states that Spanish-speaking citizens have ample Spanish-language news sources and are well qualified to vote even if they do not speak English. The 6th grade qualification would apply to Puerto Ricans who are now required to pass liberacy test in English.

(Est. 200,000 Puerto Ricans in N. Y. unable to vote last fall because of language requirement)

Jan. 31 - By vote of 61 - 25, literacy test bill sent to Senate Judiciary Committee. VP Johnson's ruling had been challenged by Sen. Javits, who appealed the ruling requesting the bill be sent to Rules Committee. Vote to table Javits' appeal sent bill to Judiciary. (For tabling: D 44, R 17; Against D - 13; R 12)

March 24 - Debate on literacy bill begun in House.
March 14 - Senate opened civil rights debate when Mansfield moved for action on poll tax amendment by attaching it to Hamilton resolution.
March 26 - After 10-day southern filibuster, (6 hours per day), Senate shut off debate 62 - 15 rollcall vote by calling for consideration of minor bill, a resolution to make the New York City home of Alexander Hamilton a national shrine. S.J. Res. 29. Voting against: 14 southern Democrats and Hickey of Wyoming.

Holland, joined by Mansfield and Dirksen, offered as a substitute his proposal for a Constitutional Amendment that would prohibit the imposition of poll taxes as a qualification for voting in federal elections.

A move to outlaw poll tax by simple legislation is also pending. Javits plans to offer similar bill.

March 29 - Vote approving poll tax amendment 77 - 16 after 11=day filibuster.

Sent to House Judiciary Committee.

Five states retain poll tax as requirement for voting: Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas and Virginia. Arkansas recently supported poll tax in a referendum, as a revenue-producing measure for public schools.

Literacy test was principle administration c. r. bill; Atty-Gen. Robt. Kennedy called literacy tests the principal device for discrimination in voting. The bill was unanimously supported by CCR and endorese by 1960 Republican platform.

April 12 - Completing two weeks of hearings on literacy test bill in Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, the bill was endorsed as "inadequate but small and significant step" by: Roy Wilkins, NAACP; Lawrence Speiser, ACLU; Joseph L. Rauh, Jr. ADA.

Now 18,500,000 Negro Americans, about half are living in South - 10% of total population. Under voting rights laws passed in 1957 and 1960, Justice Dept. has brought 23 actions in the South, 14 under Atty-Gen. Kennedy, all instituted in Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama.

? Dept. of Urban Affairs bill killed?

April 24 - Mansfield introduced pending bill (private relief refunding $2,001.48 to Texas farmer: Norman) as vehicle for latest civil rights move. The bill had recently been made the Senate's unfinished business. He then planned to offer the literacy bill as an amendment because the original bill is still tied up in the Senate Judiciary Committee. Russell called for quorum and it could not be obtained, so Mansfield adjourned Senate.

April 25 - Mansfield introduced literacy test bill and filibuster began.

19 states require literacy tests (6 are Southern)

Alabama	Georgia	Mississippi	Oregon
Arizona	Louisiana	New Hampshire	Rhode Island
California	Maine	New York	South Carolina
Conn.	Mass.	North Carolina	Washington and Wyoming
Delaware		Oklahoma

Other essential bills, including appropriations bills which should clear before July 1, are blocked.

"filibuster" is the Spanish equivalent of the Dutch word which literally meant "free booter" and referred to buccaneers who used to raid the Latin American coasts. It has come to mean "talking to death."

April 26 - Dept. of Justice only filed 25 civil rights voting cases to prosecute; Commission on Civil Rights, out of total of 613 complaints only 390 fall in "sworn" category.

April 27 - Sen. Holland offered amendment to narrow scope of literacy bill by making it apply only to literacy requirements. (Bill as written would apply to tests for "literacy or otherwise").

Sen. Dirksen blocked two Senate subcommittees from holding sessions during "debate".

Douglas-Javits proposal tabled

Senate passed Holland amendment

The AFL-CIO in April joined other organizations in urging Congress to defeat the Holland proposal for a Constitutional Amendment to abolish the poll tax and urged substitution of the Douglas-Javits federal statute.

May 7 - ACLU backed literacy test right-to-vote bill.

May 9 - By vote of 53 - 43 (For: D 30, R 13; Against: D 30, R 23) Senate refused to invoke cloture against two-week-long southern filibuster on literacy bill.

Vote to table bill defeated 63 - 33 (Against tabling: D 38, R 26; For: D 23, R 10)

Majority leader asked unanimous consent to limit debate on bill; Russell objected, and this opened filibuster again. Mansfield filed second cloture petition.

May 10 - Sen. Case offered two amendments

1. direct amendment to HR 1361, Norman bill (constitutional amendment to 15th amendment)
   a. 6th grade education qualification to vote
   b. Congress shall have power to enforce

2. Amendment in substitute for Mansfield-Dirksen substitute for that bill same

May 14 - Spokesman for Justice Dept. estimated that 750,000 Negroes are barred from voting or even registering to vote by unfair literacy tests; the Dept. has 26 court cases pending on this issue.

May 14 - Second attempt to limit debate (cloture) on literacy test bill; rejected by Senate 52 - 42 (D 30, R 22; D 31, R 11). Same margin of loss as last week.

May 15 - On Motion introduced by Mansfield, a vote to formally set aside the literacy bill after three weeks of debate carried 49 - 34 (D 30, R 19; D 22, R 12)

May 16 - Senate resumed consideration of bill HR 1361 for relief of Norman

May 20 - CCR reported last fall that in 129 southern counties where Negroes are a substantial part of population, less than 10% are registered to vote. In 23 counties in five states no Negroes are registered.

May 22 - Amendment to abolish poll tax, in federal elections only, reported out of committee.

May 27 - Under consideration in Congress: two measures approved by House Education & Labor Committee.

1. would deny Federal aid to segregated landgrant colleges (set up under Morrill Act of 1862) $1,600,000 fed funds go to land grant colleges in 16 southern and border states that still maintain segregation.
2. would cut funds to segregated elementary and high schools in impacted areas 17 southern and border states have received $357,393,069 in last 11 years for school construction; more than half has gone to segregated schools.

May 25 - Sen. Humphrey revealed response to enquire of Director of Census requesting population statistics relating to Senate vote on cloture.

46 Senators for (incl pairs)	Pop.	111,121,000
54 Senators against "		67,439,000

(totals to nearest thousandeth)

June 19 - House passed by voice vote and sent to Senate a bill to designate next Jan. 1 as "Emancipation Proclamation Day."

June 21 - House Democrats defeated two Republican attempts to write a civil rights amendment into the Administration's farm bill. Vote 142 - 106. Along party lines; three Negro Democrates voted against the bill too.
(Farm bill would provide federal loans to help farmers create recreation areas to supplement their incomes.)

Similar amendment, presented a few minutes later, defeated by voice vote.

July 27 - Sen. Dodd introduced bill (S 3576) to protect right of citizens to vote in federal election and to facilitate prompt judicial review of alledged denials of such rights, by requiring that literacy tests begiven in writing and meet certain other requirements. Referred to Judiciary Committee.

Other bills in this area: S 480, S 2750, S 2979)

Aug. 14 - Vote for cloture passed 63 - 27. to curtail debate on Kennedy's communnications's satellite bill. (Cloture approved only 4 previous times out of 27 attempts, the last occasion in 1927 on a matter concerning prohibition.) Only 15 of 25 southern senators voted to resist cloture; 5 were absent.

Aug. 17 - Vot of 54 - 37 to table Morse-Clark antidiscrimination bill to prevent racial discrimination in employment practices of private corporation created by satellite bill. (Am. tel and tel, part owners with 4 subsidiaries now subject to 18 to 20 complaints to equal job opportunities committee.) (For tabling D - 3, R 24; Against D 28, R 9(

ited by Castro. This, of course, had to happen before the New Frontier came to power.

Mr. President, in the morning paper I read that our esteemed colleague, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], has said that the President's preeminent task is to educate and lead public opinion. I wonder if it follows that the Attorney General's preeminent task is to tamper with history and brainwash the American people into a belief that the New Frontier can do no wrong?

AMENDMENT OF RULE XXII—CLOTURE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] to proceed to the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 9) to amend the cloture rule of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I rise to defend the rules of the Senate and to speak in objection to the ideas and concepts contained in the brief dated January 4, 1963, entitled "Memorandum and brief concerning the need for a new anti-filibuster rule permitting a majority of the total Senate to close debate, and, supporting the proposition that the Senate of the 88th Congress has power to enact such a rule at the opening of the new Congress by majority vote, unfettered by any restrictive rules of earlier Congresses." This memorandum contains basic presumptions with which I cannot agree. I believe the entire basis of this memorandum is in error. For convenience I have divided my remarks in two parts in an effort to correct the false impressions created by this brief. First I would like to speak against the idea that this rules battle is nothing more than a civil rights squabble and a cloak behind which liberals are making a noble battle to assure our citizens a protection of civil rights. On the contrary, I intend to show, using previous debate and the positions taken by great Members in the history of the U.S. Senate, that exactly the opposite is true and that unlimited debate has been the bulwark behind which minorities have steadfastly stood to defend their rights. I feel very deeply that a close look at the history of the Senate debate on this question will show that this is not a civil rights battle, but one which goes to the very essence of our form of government. I feel equally deeply that the proponents of the change of rule XXII are misleading the public, the press, and many Members of the Senate on what this battle is all about.

My early remarks will cover a wide range including such men as La Follette, Borah, Calhoun, Townsend, Dawes, and many others. I believe a study in depth of the history of these men is irrefutable proof that the brief filed by the proponents on this rules change is based on fallacy.

Second, I shall discuss the second major premise of the brief, that is, that the Senate is nothing more than another House of Representatives, is not a continuing body, and only a simple majority is required to do anything to Senate rules they desire. This particular question has much historical significance and my opponents are not impressed by the most serious scholars and writers on this question. The position of eminent historians and textbook writers as well as the position in the courts, which I shall document in my talk, that the Senate is a continuing body, is dismissed as "dubious academic theory" which the proponents of cloture wish to subject to practical reality. To shed some light on the fallacy contained in this issue I will delve into the practical history of this body and court decisions on this question. I intend to show nothing could be more practical than the 175 years' practice which has given the Senate a wonderful set of rules into which the wisdom of nearly two centuries has gone. These rules must be protected against the onslaught of a temporary majority backed by numerous pressure groups. These are my sincere convictions. I have in the past made my position clear in my three terms in this body and I plead that this evidence and these talks will not be lightly considered by those of us presently enrolled in this battle. For 18 years I have held this same position.

Mr. President, I pointed out in 1961, and I would again like to bring to the attention of the Senate some aspects of this question frequently ignored by the proponents of a more rigid cloture rule of the Senate. I would like to point out that, contrary to popular opinion, we do not have freedom of debate at this time in the U.S. Senate, but, as a matter of fact, two-thirds of those Senators present and voting can require the other one-third, or a total representation of 16 of our sovereign States, to silently watch legislation they detest be passed by this body.

Unfortunately for those who sincerely feel that there are many legitimate reasons why the Senate should have unlimited debate, the American public has been led to believe that there is one reason, and one reason only, why a bare majority vote in the Senate cannot shut off debate, and that the only reason we require a two-thirds vote is because the southern Senators use feedom of debate as a weapon against civil rights legislation.

Mr. President, I can think of no greater disservice that could be done to the citizens of this country than to mislead them about one of our greatest institutions, and to place in their minds the mistaken concept that this battle which has been fought in the U.S. Senate ever since its inception is a civil rights struggle.

Mr. President, there are at least 10 very good reasons why the Senate should have unlimited debate, some of them, of course, much better than others; but each on its own merits a very valid reason for continuing this Senate as the last free forum in the world.

Mr. President, in an effort to shed some light on this subject that has been so clouded by the opponents of free discussion in the Senate, I shall list some of these reasons and discuss them in the hope that we can disprove the opposition's theory that this is merely a sectional civil rights battle.

Mr. President, one of the reasons why we have traditionally had unlimited debate in the Senate and have not resorted to the majority rule which prevails in most of our other institutions, is the very cogent fact that minorities have rights which no majority should be able to override.

The framers of our Constitution, having full knowledge of this fact, set up the Senate as a separate entity without reference to population of the States whatsoever, so that a simple majority of our population could not trample the rights of a minority. Unfortunately, some of our very largest minority groups who have temporarily gained majority influence over the Congress through bloc voting and propaganda efforts unwisely lose sight of the valuable contribution the Senate has made in the protection of the rights of these very minorities. Unbelievably at this particular time, they are among the most vocal advocates of a change in the very rule which so often has protected them.

Mr. President, another reason that the Senate does not have majority cloture is the realization that many times a majority of Senators do not represent a majority of the people of the United States.

Many times in the past Senators of the large populous States have fought against such changes as are proposed here today because, as they have pointed out, a coalition of smaller States representing a fragment of the population of our country, but a majority in the U.S. Senate could, with a simple majority vote, overwhelm the vote of the Senators of the larger States even though the senatorial minority represented by far a majority of the population, the wealth, and the tax contribution of the United States.

Unfortunately again, many of these Senators are at this time on the other side of this battle and now clamor for majority cloture, losing sight of, or ignoring the fact that their predecessors in their infinite wisdom not only established unlimited debate in the Senate, but fought vehemently to protect their right to speak out at length on any subject.

Mr. President, the advocates of simple majority cloture, in the Senate, which should be termed "gag rule," many times have pointed out that this is the last bastion of freedom of debate anywhere in the world, and have cited foreign parliamentary bodies as well as State senates of the great States of our own Nation as operating under rules which include the previous question rule or simple majority cloture. Each time this comparison has been drawn, the Senators fighting to preserve free speech in this body have pointed out, and I shall point out again, that very little parallel can be drawn between such institutions and the U.S. Senate.

First of all, the U.S. Senate has the unique duty of sitting in appellate capacity, so to speak, to carefully inspect legislation, to mull over, chew on it, and digest it, and we are the only body in this Congress that has the time or the rules to allow such complete consideration. To eliminate freedom of debate in the Senate is to make this body nothing more than a rubberstamp for the House of Representatives and to reduce this Senate to a shell of that which it was when we were elected to office.

Furthermore, the Senate has the additional unique functions of giving advice and consent to the President on treaties and confirmation of appointments which are functions not served by any other body in our Government and which, in itself, requires that we have generous debate so we can freely discuss these things without danger of intimidation by the tremendous powers of the White House. To remove generous debate from the rules of the Senate would, for all practical purposes, eliminate the Senate's function of acting as a curb on the Presidency, since a majority of the President's party could railroad through legislation and confirmation without an opportunity for minority dissidents to speak out in opposition.

Mr. President, a reason frequently given by proponents of cloture in the U.S. Senate is that needed legislation is blocked by unlimited debate and we must, in fact, have majority cloture in order to pass the legislation the country needs.

Mr. President, a review of the debates on legislation throughout the history of the Senate indicates very strongly that the vast majority of the legislation defeated by generous debate was, in fact, later recognized as bad legislation; and the proponents of cloture are sadly lacking in examples of good legislation that has been defeated by unlimited debate. Several years ago in this body, in debate on this same question, it was pointed out that we must have majority cloture if we were to pass foreign aid legislation, the Federal aid to education bill, and civil rights measures.

Mr. President, in the last session, operating under the existing rule, as far as debate is concerned, we saw the largest foreign aid bill ever passed go out of this body, we saw the Federal aid to education bill pass this body, and we saw the Civil Rights Commission's life extended for an additional 2 years, even though a large minority of the Senators feel that the Civil Rights Commission does more harm than good.

If we remove ourselves from the world of fancy for just a few moments and look to the lessons of history, a more concrete basis from which to draw our conclusions, we will see that very rarely in the past has needed legislation been defeated and that, as a matter of fact, many times unwise legislation such as the Reconstruction Act of Louisiana and the force bill, which would have put Federal bayonets around our ballot boxes, has been defeated. I might note that later it was acknowledged by the proponents of these measures that the legislation was unwise and should not have been passed.

Mr. President, in every effort to sway public opinion, the proponents of this measure in the past and at the present time have misled the American people into thinking this entire Government was set up so that a simple majority would prevail in all functions.

It has been pointed out time and time again, and it hardly seems necessary—but unfortunately it is required—that I point out that the very reason the Senate was set up was so that the majority of the population in this country could not run roughshod over the smaller States or the lesser or minority group. The Senate itself was a part of a compromise between the people who wanted majority rule and those who wanted to protect the rights of the States.

Mr. President, it saddens me that a great number of people across this land of ours have chosen to disregard or have completely forgotten the wisdom of our forefathers in framing this Constitution so that we could not have an impassioned temporary majority running wild over the rights of the minority and using the very force of government which is supposed to protect the minorities to grind these unhappy people into dust.

The Constitution itself provides for yeas and nays by a small minority of the Senators as a check on the majority and as a method which can be used and has been used as a dilatory tactic. Furthermore, the Constitution itself provides in several instances, which I shall enumerate later, for a two-thirds vote of the Senators. These constitutional requirements, along with the constitutional provision that no State can be deprived of its equal representation in the Senate without its consent, certainly stand as bulwarks against a temporary majority depriving Senators or States of their votes.

One argument frequently used by those wishing to impose gag rule on the Senate is the possibility of a minority of the Senators holding up legislation that the majority thinks is important. What these people fail to see is that there is much less danger from a minority than there is from a majority. Our predecessors in this body in their wisdom established unlimited debate for the very purpose of allowing deliberations to go to any lengths necessary in order to insure good, calm, deliberative action. Nowhere in their efforts to impose this gag rule on the Senate do the proponents of this measure point out the times that a single Senator or a small handful of Senators have delayed action on unwise bills until the public indignation could rise to such a point that the small minority became a majority and the legislation was subsequently defeated.

There is not a Senator in this body who is not aware that hasty action creates many mistakes, and that time after time the Senate in its deliberations on various measures has recognized mistakes which the House has made in bills passed in haste and corrected them, principally through the efforts of a small minority of the Senators endeavoring to shed some light in the particular subject.

A further argument for majority cloture that goes hand in hand with the contention I was just discussing is the more frightening suggestion that unlimited debate allows a small minority to block much legislation. This particular position of the proponents of majority cloture fascinates me for several reasons.

First of all, it has been pointed out that many times the Senate with relative unlimited debate passes more bills in a session of Congress than does the House with its strict cloture rule. When this fact is pointed out to proponents of majority cloture they easily shift their line of logic and maintain that this phenomenon occurs because of a fear of the majority of the Senators of this body that one Senator may block some pet proposal of theirs if they block his proposal. Not only does this glib switch from one line of reasoning to another refute their contention that legislation is blocked by unlimited debate, but it casts aspersions on every Member of this body who is conscientiously seeking to represent his State.

Mr. President, it seems to me unfortunate that on an issue as vital as this, which concerns the very essence of the U.S. Senate, that all the bad should be pointed out and indeed magnified, while none of the advantages of unlimited debate are given publicity, and especially by our newspapers.

I believe that unselfish interests, when properly instructed as to the nature of majority cloture and the very real protections the Senate offers to minority groups under its present rules, will favor the retention of the rules we now have. It seems to me especially worthy of note that many men who have used unlimited debate, even though they were in a small minority of Senators to protest action when great, vital, constitutional issues were at hand, have been among those considered to be the giants of the Senate.

Three such men who were violently opposed any change in unlimited debate have their portraits hanging in the Senate reception room right outside this Chamber. They represented divergent views on most other issues and they came from different sections of the country, but they were giants of the Senate and they opposed cloture. Men such as John C. Calhoun of my own State of South Carolina, Bob La Follette, from Wisconsin, and Daniel Webster, three Senators selected as among the five greatest in our history. When a vital constitutional issue was at hand in the Senate, none of these men would flinch from using every senatorial power at his command to focus public attention on what he considered to be inopportune action and thus bring great pressure on this body to act in a more wise manner.

Unfortunately in this time and age of fantastic communication devices, people can be given superficial explanations of issues and can be aroused to a fever pitch on the wrong side of any question in a matter of hours. In order to adequately educate the public on issues of vital concern to their welfare under such adverse conditions, it sometimes becomes necessary for a minority of the Senators to resort to lengthy discussion of the issues before the Senate in order to get even a cursory mention of their viewpoint.

While it is true that we have much faster communications in our day and time than this Nation had in the days of such stalwarts of oratory as Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, and Bob La Follette, it is also a truth that much of our communication network is in the hands of a relatively few men, and in many cases there is presently only the side of an issue favorable to limited interests.

One of the things that will be lost if this body adopts majority cloture is the opportunity of a Senator, when he feels in his heart that the Senate is taking precipitate, unwise action, to take the floor and by sheer length of debate focus national attention on what he considers to be the true issues at stake.

Many times since I became a Member of this body, I personally, and many of my colleagues, have been attacked as being provincial because we still believe in sovereignty of the individual States. While the press of modern affairs has required a much greater centralization of government, it does not necessarily follow that we must abolish the system of government so wisely established for these United States by the framers of the Constitution.

Certainly every Senator must concern himself with the national interest, but by no means does this require that a Senator fail to represent the interests of his State. It is sad but true in many cases that the only voices which a State may have to protect the citizens and interests of that State are those of its two Senators. Unfortunately it is also true that many times when a Senator raises his voice in defense of his State, he is accused of provincialism and held up to ridicule before the people of the other areas as though there were no longer any sovereignty vested in our 50 States.

I think it was wise indeed to realize when this great Union was formed, while we had much in common, there would forever be divergent interests among the States, and to provide each member of the Union with two voices in this body which could not be removed without their consent.

I remind every Member of this body that the U.S. Senate is the only place where the State has a voice representing it, and where the rape of the State's rights can be protested.

Unhappily, certain groups in our country have felt it to their interest to ridicule the idea that Senators are ambassadors of their States by refusing to recognize the divergent interests of our States at all, but using the dangerous world situation to spotlight only the general welfare of the United States and, consequently, sneer at any consideration of Senators as being their States' ambassadors.

I sincerely pray that this unfortunate view will be exposed for what it is, to wit, an effort to change the very constitutional nature of our Government and to eliminate the last vestige of States' rights in our country. I think that when the question of unlimited debate is removed from all the trappings that have been placed around it by organized pressure groups and misguided advocates, we shall see the problem a lot more clearly and a lot more sensibly before we are moved to vote on it.

Mr. President, I would like to return and dwell at length on the first point I made and in order to dispel this erroneous notion that the fight over cloture is nothing more than a civil rights battle of a very recent nature, I would like at this time to call to the attention of the Senate some comments of Senators speaking of cloture who have preceded us in this body and who have ranged over a period of half a century. These comments are taken from the report of the Committee on Rules and Administration in 1947, 80th Congress, 1st session, Calendar No. 85, Report No. 87, and should dramatically demonstrate that this is not merely a fight on one narrow legislative objective.

This question has been before the Senate for many years, long before the civil rights issue ever came into being.

William Alden Smith, a Senator from Michigan from 1907 to 1919, said:

The proposed new rule is intended to curtail the individual power of Senators. How can a Senator represent his State appropriately in a crisis if a few Senators may decree in caucus and then absent themselves, leaving the State to its fate, shorn of the power to be effective?

I have never seen the present rule abused. I have been impatient at times with Senators, but good has come to the country in most instances as a result of our liberal latitude in debate.

Much good and no harm has come from unlimited discussion here; and, to curtail it and deprive ourselves of this power and privilege, it seems to me, is not called for by any situation now existing.

The instances where this rule of unlimited debate has been abused and has worked to the disadvantage of the Government are very rare indeed and the cases where it has been of tremendous advantages to the Government and to the people of the United States can be counted by hundreds and hundreds.

Senator Smith, of Michigan, further said:

No, unlimited, debate, as I define it, was such a protracted and prolonged discussion as to bring acutely to the minds of Senators the necessity of composing that particular situation.

The longer I stay here the less I speak. Some of the best men who ever served in this body have grown to dislike verbal controversy.

Men got over the fascination of their own speech, but if the occasion should require, or if some injustice has sought to be done, unlimited debate would be a very desirable and potential weapon to reside in the senatorship.

It is not that a Senator wishes to be heard at great length: It is the power to defend his State, which you are attempting to curtail.

Take away the right of unlimited debate and you take away the one great distinguishing characteristic of senatorial procedure.

A great deal of agitation has been heard at varying times concerning the necessity for having some rule that would limit debate. There were those of us who did not think any rule at all was necessary. I speak now advisedly, as a member of the Committee on Rules, when I say that that rule was adopted as a compromise rule, and assurances were given that if it should be agreed to—as it was, without any controversy—it would end this matter of so-called cloture legislation. It has answered its purpose.

During my somewhat protracted membership of this body a few filibusters have been engaged in. I was the victim of one of those filibusters, Mr. President. A bill in which I was deeply interested, which had been debated for weeks in the body, as I remember it, was at the end of a session defeated by a filibuster.

At that time I felt very keenly on the subject but, when I came to look it all over, I was led to the conclusion that the evils that grew out of our present system were insignificant compared to the benefits that grew out of it.

I think I have myself participated in two filibusters during the time I have been a Member of this body, and I have never had occasion to regret it. I believed that they were justified. I believe that great good came to the country because of those portracted discussions.

Henry Cabot Lodge, a Senator from Massachusetts from 1893 to 1924, said:

This is a general rule to limit all debate, indiscriminately on every measure, whether trifling or of the gravest importance, affecting the Constitution, the welfare of the entire country, or the interests of a section of the country, or what may be the vital interests of a single State. Mr. President, I believe that a rule of that kind is thoroughly unsound in principle, and I think we ought to retain in principle, and I think we ought to retain in the Senate the general debate and the latitude of debate which we now have.

Certainly, Mr. President, as the late Senator Lodge said, we should "retain in the Senate the general debate and the latitude of debate which we now have," even though they have been whittled down somewhat since the time when Senator Henry Cabot Lodge was a Member of this body, because at that time the cloture rule was much stronger than the cloture rule we have today.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RIBICOFF in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, if it is understood that in doing so, I shall not lose the floor, and shall not be charged with making two speeches.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator from South Carolina recall, as a historical fact, that when the first cloture rule was adopted, in 1917, the very famous liberal, Senator Robert La Follette the elder, of Wisconsin, stated, in speaking in opposition to the rule:

Mr. President, believing that I stand for democracy, for the liberties of the people of this country, for the perpetuation of our free institutions, I shall stand while I am a Member of this body against any cloture that denies free and unlimited debate. Sir, the moment that the majority imposes the restriction contained in the pending rule upon this body, that moment you will have dealt a blow to liberty, you will have broken down one of the greatest weapons against wrong and oppression that the Members of this body possess. This Senate is the only place in our system where, no matter what may be the organized power behind any measure to rush its consideration and to compel its adoption, there is a chance to be heard, where there is opportunity to speak at length, and where, if need be, under the Constitution of our country and the rules as they stand today, the constitutional right is reposed in a Member of this body to halt a Congress or a session on a piece of legislation which may undermine the liberties of the people and be in violation of the Constitution which Senators have sworn to support.

Does not the Senator from South Carolina recall that that magnificent statement was made by Senator La Follette during one of the previous fights in regard to the rules question?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes; and Senators will recall that he favored even a stricter rule than the one we now have.

Mr. ERVIN. Yes. At that time Senator La Follette was speaking, was he not, against any cloture whatsoever?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is true.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator from South Carolina agree with me that if either the proposal for majority cloture or the proposal for cloture by 60 percent of the Members of the Senate were adopted, it would sound the death knell of the freedom of debate the Senate has always stood for as the greatest deliberative body on earth?

Mr. JOHNSTON. In My opinion, there is no question about that.

Furthermore, when two-thirds of the Members of the Senate belonged to the same party that the head of the administration belonged to—as at present—if only a bare majority of the Senate were needed in order to invoke cloture and to pass measures, in view of the pressure used by the administration, the minority—in this instance the Republicans—might just as well close shop and go home, for if there were majority rule on everything, the administration could control the Senate.

Mr. ERVIN. And if a majority cloture rule were adopted, would it not permit a majority of a quorum, namely, 26 Senators out of 51, to silence the entire Senate?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is true.

Mr. ERVIN. And if the Senate adopted a rule to permit cloture to be invoked by the affirmative votes of 60 percent, would not that mean that 31 Senators out of a total of 51 could silence the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is true; in that way Senators could be prevented from speaking.

Mr. ERVIN. Does the Senator from South Carolina share my conviction that if a majority of Senators were granted the power to silence all other Senators, they would be granted the power—which could be exercised arbitrarily—to prevent a minority of Senators from representing their States under the Constitution?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Certainly that is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to a statement made by Senator Moses, of New Hampshire, as set forth in an article which he wrote in 1925 for the Saturday Evening Post. I ask the Senator from South Carolina whether he agrees with the observation, made by Senator Moses, to the effect that no good legislative measure had ever been defeated or unduly delayed by the right of freedom of speech in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have read that article, and later in my speech I shall quote part of it. I think Senator Moses was entirely correct when he made that statement.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to ask the able and distinguished Senator from South Carolina whether he had the privilege of serving the U.S. Senate with the great liberal, Senator Joseph O'Mahoney, of Wyoming?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I did.

Mr. ERVIN. Does the Senator from South Carolina recall that in the fight for the rules change in 1959, Senator O'Mahoney stated that rule XXII, in securing the right to speak, as it does, was necessary to be retained, because it was the only rule which made it possible for the Senate to be a forum of freedom of speech for the benefit of the people of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSTON. He did—and very forcefully.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator from South Carolina agree that not only does the rule under discussion afford protection to a minority, enabling it to state its views, and giving it an opportunity to convert itself into a majority; but also it is a rule which protects all the people in the United States?

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator is correct. At times certain questions arise that should be explained to the public at large. Time is required to do that.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina if it is not his understanding that the Senate is the last legislative body on the face of the earth in which a minority has a right, by virtue of the rule under discussion, to exercise freedom of speech for the benefit of its country?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is true.

Mr. ERVIN. I ask the Senator if the Senate is not the only place, even in our own land, which we call free America, where the rights of the people can be preserved even against the attack of overwhelming majorities?

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator has spoken the truth on that point. The right has been very useful on many occasions.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for the questions he has asked.

Mr. President, the case for free debate in the Senate has never been better stated than in a paragraph I am about to read from a well-known book. It is there said:

It is the proper duty of a representative body to look diligently into every affair of Government and to talk much about what it sees. It is meant to be the eyes and the voice, and to embody the wisdom and will of its constituents. Unless Congress have and use every means of acquainting itself with the acts and the disposition of the administrative agents of the Government, the country must be helpless to learn how it is being served: And unless Congress both scrutinize these things and sift them by every form of discussion the country must remain in embarrassing, crippling ignorance of the very affairs which it is most important that it should understand and direct.

The informing function of Congress should be referred even to its legislative function. The argument is not only that discussed and interrogated administration is the only pure and efficient administration, but more than that, that the only really self-governing people is that people which discusses and interrogates its administration. The talk on the part of Congress which we sometimes justly condemn is the profitless squabble of words over frivolous bills or selfish party issues. It would be hard to conceive of there being too much talk about the practical concerns and processes of government. Such talk it is which, when earnestly and purposefully conducted, clears the public mind and shapes the demands of public opinion.

That, Mr. President, is taken from "Congressional Government," pages 303 and 304, written by the then President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, and I think it would not be easy to find a more powerful exposition to that necessity for debate which, I think, is infringed on by this proposed rule.

Warren G. Harding, a Senator from Ohio, 1915–20:

I have been hearing about the reformation of the Senate since I first entered politics; and it was rather an ironical thing the other day that one of the most emphatic speeches made in favor of the adoption of this rule was uttered by the very latest arrival in this body.

I have been observing the Senate at close range now for 3 years. I came with the notion that the Senate "fiddled" away a great deal of valuable time in debate, and I am still of that opinion; but the debate that needlessly consumes the time of the Senate is not reached by the proposed rule.

If it is desired to cut down the number or length of speeches, Senators could be told at the beginning of a session that they could speak only 25 or 30 hours during the year, and when they had spoken for that length of time, they would have to stop. Such a rule might prevent some from talking so long and taking so much time to make speeches.

Further quoting from Harding:

I want to feel that the Senate still controls its own destinies. Moreover, the new cloture rule is ample. I am opposed to the so-called reformation of the Senate in the name of a war measure.

But the reformation of the Senate has long been a fad. I came here myself under the impression that there ought to be cloture and limitations on debate; and the longer I sit in this body, the more convinced I become that the freedom of debate in the U.S. Senate is one of the highest guarantees we have of our American institutions.

Mr. President, before I take my seat I wish to say that the length of a speech is not the measure of its merit.

While the Senate may not listen, because the Senate does not listen very attentively to anybody, I discover, though Congress may not be apparently concerned and though the galleries of this body may not be filled to add their inspiring attention, I charge you, Mr. President, that the people of the United States of America will be listening. This is the one central point, the one open forum, the one place in America where there is freedom of debate, which is essential to an enlightened and dependable public sentiment, the guide of the American Republic.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask him some questions to determine whether he agrees with me that one of the best illustrations of the wisdom of the Senate rules occurred in 1946?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I yield, with the same understanding, that I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. ERVIN. I ask the Senator if he does not recall that during the spring of 1946, a strike of many weeks' duration occurred in the coal mines of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I recall the incident clearly.

Mr. ERVIN. I ask the Senator if he does not recall that before the end of that strike, a strike vote was taken on the railroads, and some of the railroad unions voted to go on strike on a certain designated day.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I remember.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator recall that a great deal of public feeling was aroused due to the fact that a long strike had taken place in the coal industry, and that a threat had been made that on a particular day there would be a nationwide strike on the railroads?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I recall that.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator recall that at that time a proposal was made in the House of Representatives that railroad workers be drafted into the Army, and, as members of the Army, be compelled to remain at work regardless of their wishes?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I remember that also.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator remember that the House of Representatives acting under the high popular feeling of the moment and acting under a rule which limited debate to a comparatively few minutes, passed the bill undertaking to draft railroad workers into the Army by an overwhelming majority?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I recall that.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator remember that when that bill, which had passed the House after only a few minutes of debate and by an overwhelming majority, reached the Senate, a request was made that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the bill and that thereupon an objection was interposed by a Senator under the Senate Rules, which necessitated the bill going to the committee?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I recall that.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator recall that as a result of the ensuing delay, Senators were given time to think, and recognized the truth, which apparently had escaped all of us in the House—that if the bill became law, the Congress of the United States would be undertaking to impose involuntary servitude upon railroad men?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is correct. I remember it. I was a Member of the Senate at that time.

Mr. ERVIN. Can the Senator from South Carolina understand why the Senator from North Carolina, after a few minutes' reflection, has always considered that that was the worst vote he, the Senator from North Carolina, ever cast as a member of any legislative body?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I presume the Senator would so consider it.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator from South Carolina think that is a perfect illustration of the unwisdom which legislators may exercise in times of public excitement if they are not restrained by some rule which enables one Senator, or a minority of Senators, to point out the unwisdom of the legislative proposal which the majority may be at the point of adopting?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I certainly do. I can understand why the Senator feels as he does today, because he acted, we might say, hastily, without proper debate having been had upon a subject, such as should be had in the Senate.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator from South Carolina rejoice in the fact that so long as rule XXII stands in its present form the Senate is not likely ever to engage in the passage of legislation like that piece of proposed legislation in haste?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is correct. That is the way I feel, and I know the Senator feels as I do in this regard.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. President, I now wish to quote the words of a Senator with whom I served in the Senate. He represented the State of California from 1917 to 1945. I refer to Hiram W. Johnson. This is what he said:

> But in this day, Mr. President, there is something else that I see as well. I see that we have transmuted in the past 14 months our Republic; I see that upon which we have prided ourselves in the past, that of which we have boasted in the past, that which we have taken upon ourselves and loved during all of the years that this Nation has been a nation—has been transmuted under the exigency and the emergency of war, and rightly so, into an autocracy as powerful as any autocracy upon the face of the earth.
> But, Mr. President, there is another day coming as well, and in transmuting our Government temporarily in the fashion that we have done, there is no reason why any man of wisdom, of foresight, with an atom of statesmanship, should not prepare against that day when it will be his duty and his obligation as great as is the obligation today to win this war, to bring back this Republic into its own, and make this Government as it has been in all the years of the past.
> It is that day when we must finally face the ultimate issue and restore this Government to its pristine purity and its pristine glory and to its original character; it is this day I guard against now by permitting not the entering wedge in this body and with its Members, so that they could not do fully, freely, wholly, absolutely, and successfully their duty when the day shall come.
> The last place in all this world where freedom obtains, the place where freedom of speech may be abused, abused, abused, and abused again, but the last free forum in that day will then have been destroyed, and we here this day will have commenced and made easy that destruction.

It is my understanding that the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. FONG] wishes to make a short statement at this time. I shall be glad to yield to him with the understanding that I shall not lose my right to the floor and that when I resume my remarks it not be counted as a second speech, if the Senate will agree to that request unanimously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request by the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of the Humphrey-Kuchel substitute amendment for Senate Resolution 9, I should like to make a brief statement for the record setting forth my reasons for supporting a change in Senate rule XXII so as to permit a constitutional majority of elected Senators to limit debate after reasonable time has been allowed for debate.

What we seek to provide by this additional method of limiting debate is a way by which the principle of majority rule may become operative so that the majority of the Senate can come to a vote on the merits of the substantive issues which come before it.

In the brief 3½ years it has been my privilege to serve in the U.S. Senate, I have witnessed five "talkathons" designed to prevent the majority of the Senate from voting on the merits of substantive measures before it. I have witnessed how the threat of a talkathon succeeded in forcing the majority to emasculate legislation in order to get a bill of some sort passed. I have witnessed how the Senate rules have been used not as tools for promoting orderly business in the Senate but as tools for thwarting the majority from its duty to legislate.

I recall very vividly the round-the-clock sessions of the Senate in 1960 which lasted for 9 days and nights and forced Senators to remain within calling distance of the floor at all times, sleeping at night in their offices and in rooms near this Chamber. An attempt to halt the talkathon by closing debate under existing rule XXII requiring a two-thirds majority failed. The upshot was that, in order to pass a civil rights bill, the majority was forced to water it down to the point of acceptability to the minority of civil rights opponents.

What has happened from time to time in the Senate resembles minority rule rather than the majority rule contemplated by the Founding Fathers. These architects of the U.S. Constitution clearly endorsed majority rule as the rule for congressional action, for they expressly specified all the instances in which more than a majority vote is required. There are only five instances in which a two-thirds majority is stipulated in the Constitution: in the power of Congress to override a Presidential veto, in Senate ratification of treaties, in the initiation by Congress of amendments to the Constitution, in the impeachment power, and in expulsion of Members of Congress. It seems clear that, insofar as the drafters of the Constitution were concerned, Congress was to operate by majority rule unless otherwise instructed by terms of the Constitution.

Indeed, Alexander Hamilton, in Federalist No. 22, wrote:

> To give a minority a negative upon a majority [which is always the case where more than a majority is requisite to a decision] is, in its tendency, to subject the sense of the greater number to that of the lesser.

Hamilton also pointed out:

If a pertinacious minority can control the opinion of a majority, respecting the best mode of conducting it, the majority, in order that something may be done, must conform to the views of the minority; and thus the sense of the smaller number will overrule that of the greater, and give a tone to national proceedings.

In the words of the Supreme Court, majority rule is "sanctioned by our governmental practices, by business procedure, and by the whole philosophy of democratic institutions" (N.L.R.B. v. A. J. Tower Co., 329 U.S. 324, 331). Moreover, the Court has ruled that a House of Congress may not by its rules ignore constitutional restraints (United States v. Ballin, 144 U.S. 1, 5).

The history of the U.S. Senate shows that throughout the years Senators have zealously guarded their rights to full and free debate, each always conscious of the fact that while today he might be in the majority on one issue, tomorrow he might be in the minority on another issue.

This helps to explain why the Senate has been so loathe to limit debate of some of its Members who have used filibusters to prevent majority action. Since 1917, when the Senate adopted the original rule XXII to limit debate, there have been 27 votes to limit debate, only 5 of which succeeded. That is a batting average of only 17 percent. The Senate succeeded in limiting debate in 1919, on the Versailles Treaty; in 1926, on the World Court; in 1927, on branch banking; in 1927, on prohibition reorganization; and last year, on the communications satellite.

Eleven of the twenty-seven cloture votes have dealt with civil rights issues, including two votes last year on the literacy test bill. Every attempt to close debate on civil rights matters has failed.

It seems ironic that the majority of the Senate, in attempting to protect the rights of minority groups throughout America, has found itself thwarted time and time again by a minority of Senate Members right here in this Chamber.

That the existing rule XXII makes it possible for a minority to obstruct the will of the majority of the Senate was recognized by both major political parties in their platforms adopted in 1960. The Republican platform states:

We pledge: Our best efforts to change present rule XXII of the Senate and other appropriate congressional procedures that often make unattainable proper legislative implementation of constitutional guarantees.

The Democratic platform pledges:

In order that the will of the American people may be expressed upon all legislative proposals, we urge that action be taken at the beginning of the 87th Congress to improve congressional procedures so that majority rule prevails and decisions can be made after reasonable debate without being blocked by a minority in either House.

To accomplish these goals will require Executive orders, legal actions brought by the Attorney General, legislation, and improved congressional procedures to safeguard majority rule.

Unless and until these reforms in congressional procedures are effected, the pledges of both the Republican and the Democratic Parties for meaningful and effective civil rights legislation will remain just noble words and noble promises, incapable of fulfillment, for never has the Senate agreed to limit debate on a civil rights issue since rule XXII was first adopted in 1917.

To permit the principle of majority rule to operate, not only in civil rights matters, but in all other substantive matters, no matter how controversial, we sponsors of the Humphrey-Kuchel substitute are proposing a second procedure whereby the Senate could limit debate.

Our proposal, which is embodied in Senate Resolution 10 and in the substitute amendment to Senate Resolution 9, retains the existing method whereby a vote on cloture could be had 2 days after filing of a cloture petition signed by 16 Senators. To succeed, this, of course, would require two-thirds of the Senators present and voting to vote in the affirmative. If 100 Senators voted, 67 would have to vote "yes" in order to limit debate.

Under our proposed alternative, the vote on cloture would occur 15 days following the filing of a cloture petition by 16 Senators. To limit debate under our proposal, 51 of the 100 Senators would have to vote in the affirmative.

A majority of the Senate can vote to draft your young men into the armed services, and a majority of the Senate can vote to send them to war. It would seem reasonable that a majority of the Senate should be allowed to limit debate. Particularly since the Constitution, article I, section 5, provides that a majority shall constitute a quorum for doing business and that a majority shall determine rules of procedure.

Inasmuch as all Senators are well aware that they may be in the minority sometimes, it is highly doubtful that 16 Senators would file a petition until there was real evidence of a filibuster. Probably 2 to 3 or even more weeks of debate would occur before Senators would sign a petition. After the petition is filed, our plan guarantees 15 additional days of debate before the vote on limitation could be taken. This adds another 2 weeks for debate.

Then, if 51 votes are cast for debate limitation, a minimum of an additional 100 hours of debate is allowed. The majority would have 50 hours to debate and the minority would have 50 hours to debate. If the 50 hours of debate on either side expired before a Senator had an opportunity to speak, he would be given an hour to talk, under our guarantee of 1 hour for each Senator.

Ours is a more generous plan for the minority than existing rule XXII, which guarantees only 1 hour of debate for each Senator. Thus, at present a minority of 20 Senators would have a total of 20 hours guaranteed them for debate. Under our plan, this same minority would be guaranteed 50 hours.

Certainly, the weeks preceding filing of a debate limitation petition, plus the 15 days guaranteed after its filing, plus the minimum of 100 hours after the Senate agrees to limit debate, provide ample time to present the pros and cons of any issue and to inform the American people.

The Senate often passes important, far-reaching, and costly legislation with only a few days' debate. Last year, for example, the Senate debated the highly controversial trade bill only 3 days and the controversial tax revision bill only 9 days.

To contend that our proposal unduly restricts the time for debate is not very persuasive in the light of such experiences. For, in the 5 to 6 or more weeks available for debate under our plan, surely Members of the Senate—majority and minority alike—have ample opportunity to present their opposing viewpoints.

So we come to the real bone of contention—whether the majority of the Senate shall be permitted to perform their duty to legislate on matters of vital importance to the Nation; or whether one-third of the Senate shall be permitted to obstruct the other two-thirds of the Senate.

In other words, shall the minority rule the Senate by denying the majority the right to come to a vote?

Or shall the Senate, by its rules of procedure, permit the majority to work its will while at the same time safeguarding the right of the minority to be heard?

If I understand the sum and substance of the present parliamentary tangle in the Senate, the Senate could be doomed to a self-perpetuating debate limitation rule which a minority could employ to block majority rule.

If the opponents of changing rule XXII prevail, the majority of the Senate may even be denied an opportunity to vote on the merits of the changes proposed in rule XXII. If the majority of each new Congress is denied the right to change Senate rules by minority filibuster which can only be cut off by two-thirds vote, the Senate forever will be the victim of rules adopted by a Senate of years gone by. The majority will continue to rule only by sufferance of the minority, who will still possess the weapons with which to deny the majority the right to legislate. Only insofar as the minority decides to permit the majority to act, will the majority be able in practice to act. Majority rule as contemplated by those who framed our Constitution will be a mockery.

Against a determined minority, the majority will continue to be frustrated in attempts to insure the protection of civil rights for those Americans who now do not enjoy the rights guaranteed to all Americans by the Constitution.

Against a determined minority, the majority will continue to be frustrated in attempts to enact legislation in other essential fields, despite the mandate of the electorate at the polls and despite party platform promises.

The rule XXII change we propose will help the majority fulfill its responsibility to legislate while at the same time it will protect the right of the minority to be heard. As Alexander Hamilton said:

The public business must go forward.

The rule XXII change we propose will offer Senators from every State, large or small, equal opportunity to be heard.

Similarly, the equal number of votes awarded to each State in the Senate, whether large or small, is undisturbed, so that small States under our proposal need have no fear of being outvoted merely on the basis of size. Each State will still have two votes.

The rule XXII change we propose is one step toward more orderly procedure in the Senate at a time when representative government is on trial before all the world whose people are watching to see whether our National Congress is geared to the space age.

Attempts to improve rule XXII have failed at the beginning of each of the last three Congresses by the expedient of avoiding a vote on the merits of the proposed changes. I hope that this year the Senate of the United States will be permitted the opportunity to express itself on the merits of the pending proposals. Let the Senate of the United States no longer sidestep the important issues involved, but face up to its responsibilities.

Let us make representative government more workable in this legislative body and more responsive to the will of the American people who are represented here in the U.S. Senate. Let us justify the faith the people had in electing us and let us demonstrate anew the viability of the Government fashioned so wisely by the Founding Fathers that individual freedom and liberty might be perpetuated for one and for all in America forevermore.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me, so that I may make a brief statement, without his losing his right to the floor?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I yield to the Senator with the understanding that my so doing will not affect my speech in any way, and that it will be regarded as only one speech, and that I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I ask unanimous consent that these remarks may not in any way affect the rights of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

EXCESSIVE SPENDING

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have been disturbed—as I am sure many other Members of the Senate have also been disturbed—by the increase in Government spending, particularly in some areas in which such increases are hard to understand and explain.

One of the most shocking of this spending increases is listed in the budget under "Commerce and Transportation." In the past 6 years there has been an increase in Government spending for Federal aviation, for example—representing subsidies to commercial aviation, from $219 to $885 million; for water transportation—representing largely subsidies to shipbuilders—there has been an increase from $365 to $677 million; and the most dramatic of all increases has been subsidies for "advancement of business"—which is the term that is used in the budget—from $127 million in 1957 to $617 million in the present budget. This is an expansion from 1957 alone of nearly fivefold.

One of the reasons for this explosion of spending is because the Small Business Administration has expanded its activities. I am conscious of this, as chairman of the Small Business Subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Today there appears in the Washington Daily News an article entitled "Small Business Agency Is Now a Banking Giant." It is written by Dixon Preston, and spells out in detail the story of Small Business Administration loans for recreational purposes.

The regulations of SBA provide, at page 8 of its pamphlet entitled "Business Loans" under "Ineligible Applications," the category of ineligible:

> 6. If the purpose of a loan is to finance the construction, acquisition, conversion, or operation of recreational or amusement facilities.

For this purpose the agency is not by law to make loans. However, there is a saving clause which provides "unless the facilities contribute to the health or general well-being of the public."

As Mr. Preston points out, under this "unless" clause, in the 6 months between June and November 1962, the SBA made loans to 128 motels and hotels, 42 bowling alleys, 15 ski lifts, ski lodges and other skiing operations, and 11 golf courses.

Mr. President, in my State, as I am sure is also true in many other States, we find that some commercial recreational enterprises are overbuilt; there are too many of them, and they are having difficulty surviving competition.

In areas where banking facilities are adequate, which is true in most parts of the country, it is very hard to justify this kind of activity by a Government agency.

I hope Congress will consider, during this session, modifying the authority of the Small Business Administration to make loans of this kind, which make a very questionable contribution to the economic growth of our Nation.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on an economic matter?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I have a question which troubles me. Due to my limited capacity, I find I am unable to unscrew the inscrutable. I was reading this morning an article by a theoretical economist who said that if the Government spent more money than it received in revenue, it had an active deficit and the likelihood was that this would spur the economy into action; however, if the Government received in revenue less than it spent, it meant that there was a passive deficit, which was bad. Can the Senator explain exactly how much difference there is between spending more than one receives, and receiving less than one spends, and why one of them is good for the country and the other is bad?

I am incapable of comprehending the difference, because I have not studied enough of modern economics.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I was fascinated by the same phrase, which appeared, I believe, in the Washington Post lead editorial this morning. It said that the kind of deficit proposed in the 1964 budget was an active deficit. I was deeply concerned because that was not in keeping with even the Keynesian economics that I studied. Keynes theorized that during a depression, or recession, at a time when the economy is going downhill, a Government deficit stimulates the economy and helps to halt the decline. But the idea of an active deficit in the editorial is that when the economy is moving ahead, and progressing, and profits are going up, and all the business indexes are advancing, but not fast enough, it is still necessary to have a deficit. But under these circumstances to increase the growth even further.

This means, to me, that when the economy is going downhill, we have a passive deficit; that when it is going up, we have an active deficit. However, at all times, we have a deficit, and at no time do we have a surplus.

Apparently that surplus word is one that is going out of the economic vocabulary. During super economic expansion periods when the economy is operating, perhaps, under virtual war conditions, the economists will permit a surplus to prevent inflation. But this would be, if past experience is a guide, only at a time when the Government is spending astronomical sums of money. As we know from World War I and II experience, the deficits are bigger than ever under such circumstances. They become super active deficits. The surplus is on its way to dodo land to become extinct.

I share the view of the Senator from North Carolina. I am not capable of unscrewing this inscrutable. I feel it remains inscrutable.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article published in the Washington Daily News be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ITS RECORD: $2 BILLION IN LOANS IN 10 YEARS—SMALL BUSINESS AGENCY IS NOW A BANKING GIANT

As a taxpayer, you might be surprised to know you're helping finance a commercial deer park in Park Rapids, Minn.

Also a ski lift in northern Indiana, golf courses in New Mexico, Ohio, and Tennessee, bowling alleys in Texas, a summer camp in Pennsylvania, a kosher delicatessen in Memphis, a marina here in Washington, mountain lodges in Colorado, motels in Alabama, and a fellow out in Hawaii who simply describes himself as a professional planner.

You're doing all this because you, as a taxpayer, help to support a young but fast-growing Federal agency called the Small Business Administration (SBA).

The Small Business Administration, as its name implies, makes loans and provides other services for small businesses. But as an agency, SBA itself is anything but small business.

RAPID GROWTH

From virtually a standing start 10 years ago, SBA has grown into a banking giant. It has 3,200 employees, a loan fund of nearly $1.3 billion and has, in 10 years, made or taken part in 54,518 loans totaling more than $2 billion.

Yet it loses money. And that is where you come in. Tax funds of $26 million a year pay the administrative costs of operat-

Not only is the arms race in the Near East a matter of deep concern to the United States but also one of great complexity. Quoting the President again from his comments to the press on April 3:

We would be reluctant to see a military balance of power in the Middle East which was such as to encourage aggression rather than discouraging it. So this is a matter which we will have to continue to observe. We have expressed our strong opposition to the introduction or manufacture of nuclear weapons in the Middle East, and we have indicated that strongly to all of the countries. So we have to wait and see as time goes on. At the present time, there is a balance which I think would discourage military action on either side. I would hope it will continue.

While watching the situation closely, the Department also is exploring carefully every possible solution to the problem.

If I may be of any further assistance to you, please do not hesitate to call on me.

Sincerely yours,

FREDERICK G. DUTTON,
Assistant Secretary.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., April 26, 1963.

Hon. SAMUEL S. STRATTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. STRATTON: Your telegram of April 4, 1963, addressed to Secretary McNamara regarding West German scientific activity in the United Arab Republic has been referred to this office for reply.

We have evaluated the points set forth in your message and find them essentially correct. West German activity in Egypt has been well publicized for several years. On the aircraft side, the Egyptian Government began efforts in the late 1950's to establish its own aircraft industry. As stated in your letter, there are German technicians and mechanics engaged in the production of a jet trainer and a light fighter reconnaissance aircraft. To the best of our knowledge Mr. Willy Messerschmidt has not been identified with this program in Egypt.

Insofar as the United Arab Republic's rocket project is concerned, we estimate that there are some West Germans engaged in this program. There is no evidence that any West Germans are working on nuclear, radiological or biological weapons. Parenthetically, we have not been able to identify any prominent Nazis involved in any of the foregoing activities.

I am sure you will appreciate that your query as to the steps the U.S. Government can take to terminate German scientific activity presents policy considerations which fall within the proper competence of the Department of State. I understand the Department of State is writing you separately on this point. However, I can assure you that both the Department of State and the Department of Defense are conscious of the need to stabilize conditions in the Middle East area, particularly with reference to Israel and its neighboring Arab States. As you know, the United States has long held to the view that the introduction of weapons of mass destruction and sophisticated offensive weapons into the Middle East was inimical to our interests as well as to those of countries immediately concerned. I believe our recent decision to make the Hawk missile available to Israel to broaden Israel's capability for defense against manned aircraft demonstrates our Government's resolve to maintain a power equilibrium in the area.

I trust that the foregoing is responsive to the military points raised in your communication to Secretary McNamara. If I can be of further service to you on this matter please do not hesitate to call me.

Sincerely,

FRANK K. SLOAN,
Deputy Assistant Secretary.

STATEMENT ON CIVIL RIGHTS

(Mr. MULTER (at the request of Mr. ALBERT) was granted permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the following is a statement I presented today to the Judiciary Subcommittee presently holding hearings on civil rights bills:

STATEMENT OF HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER BEFORE HOUSE JUDICIARY SUBCOMMITTEE No. 5, MAY 9, 1963

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to testify in support of the bills before the committee, including my own bills, H.R. 543 and H.R. 548. H.R. 543 is designed to prevent discrimination in public places and public transportation against members of the Armed Forces; H.R. 548, to protect the right to vote in Federal elections.

A modern-day De Toqueville or Lord Byrce, Mr. Chairman, might well conclude that civil rights is a triennial bloom in the congressional garden. In 1957 after years of agonizing frustration—frustration within as well as without the Congress—we enacted a Civil Rights Act. In that act the Congress took a significant step toward fulfillment of the promise of the 15th amendment which guarantees to every American citizen the right to vote regardless of race or color. By that act Congress authorized the Federal Government to bring civil actions for injunctive relief where discrimination denied or threatened the right to vote. The act further prohibited intimidation, threats, and coercion for the purpose of interfering with the right to vote in Federal primary and general elections.

Three years later, in the wake of some obvious disappointments in connection with its earlier efforts, Congress sought to strengthen the 1957 act by enacting the Civil Rights Act of 1960. It provided that States, as well as voting registrars, may be sued for discriminatory practices. Title III of the 1960 act required the preservation of voting records, and empowered the Attorney General to inspect them. Under title IV, Congress provided for Federal voting referees to facilitate the registration of persons improperly denied the right to vote.

Another 3 years have passed. We are now seized of the opportunity which, if I may continue with my horticultural analogy, will permit us to convert this delicate bud into a hardy perennial. The means for accomplishing this are embodied in proposals before this committee.

The right to vote is a constitutional right. As everyone familiar with Federal elections knows, many qualified Americans are systematically denied the right to vote. This is accomplished by the so-called literacy test. These tests, fair and nondiscriminatory on their face, are administered so as to prevent certain of our citizens from voting. They make a mockery of the 15th amendment. They eat at the vitals of the democratic process. They are, in short, an intolerable evil in a representative system of government.

H.R. 548, if enacted, will remedy this unwholesome situation. This is not a new proposal, indeed some of the members of this committee have introduced identical or similar legislation in this as well as the 87th Congress. It is, in truth, a modest proposal. It does not attempt to eliminate literacy as a proper and reasonable qualification for voting. I do not think the requirement of literacy for voter qualification should be abandoned completely. It is important that the voter have an understanding of the issues which he is called upon to decide. But, as frequently used, these tests bear absolutely no relationship to a person's qualification to vote.

This bill, moreover, is applicable only with respect to voting in Federal elections, a matter of some concern to the Nation and Congress as well as to the States.

Lastly, the bill does not propose any oppression or arbitrary governmental action against individuals. On the contrary, it is designed to facilitate a person's constitutional right to vote only in the face of State discriminatory action.

The bill requires the States which use literacy tests, to use an objective standard. The maximum uniform standard set forth in the bill is the completion of the sixth grade in any public school or accredited private school. This includes such institutions in the several States, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico. This is a reasonable standard; it is much like the standard which my own State of New York has used for many years.

When this proposal was before the last Congress, some Members expressed doubts as to its constitutionality. The power to determine the qualifications of voters, they argued, was left to the States. That power—the power to set the qualifications for voters in Federal as well as State elections—is not, however, unlimited.

The 15th amendment provides that neither the Federal Government nor the States can deny or abridge the right of citizens to vote on account of race or color. And, Congress is empowered to enforce this prohibition by appropriate legislation.

The clear import of the 15th amendment is that Congress has the power to enact laws to prevent the States from abridging the right of citizens to vote on racial grounds. The Commission on Civil Rights has found that certain States are in fact using their voter qualification laws to deny citizens the right to vote on racial grounds. If Congress endorses these findings—which are incorporated in H.R. 548—it clearly has the power by appropriate legislation to prevent the States from abridging the right of citizens to vote on racial grounds.

Is the enactment of an objective standard—the sixth grade test in this case—beyond the power of Congress? This test does not alter the State requirement that persons be literate in order to vote. The sixth grade test is simply a means by which Congress may insure that an otherwise legitimate State voter qualification—literacy—is not used as a means of excluding voters on racial grounds.

Under the Constitution the qualifications prescribed by the States for elections to the most numerous branch of their legislature apply in Federal elections. The right to vote in Federal elections is not however a right derived from the States. State-established voter qualifications are, of course, subject to the Constitution, particularly to the 14th and 15th amendments which prohibit certain types of discriminatory action.

The Supreme Court, in a number of cases, has upheld the validity of literacy tests. But these cases, and I refer specifically to Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections, 360 U.S. 45 (1959), hold only that a State may adopt a fair literacy test for voting provided that such a test applies alike to all citizens of the State without regard to race or color. The Lassiter decision suggests, what commonsense tells us, that a State may not establish qualifications that abridge the right to vote on racial grounds.

The 14th amendment provides that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." That amendment also provides that Congress "shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation" the provisions of the amendment. In providing that persons who have completed the sixth grade shall be regarded as literate under any State literacy law, the Congress would be enforcing the equal protection clause of the 14th amendment.

Under article I, section 4, clause 1 of the Constitution the States may prescribe the "times, places, and manner of holding elections" except that "Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations." There are a number of decisions under this section, but none to my knowledge, has ever held unconstitutional an act of Congress regulating the manner in which elections are held. In Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, 366–367 (1932), the Supreme Court indicated that Congress "has a general supervisory power over the whole subject" of congressional elections. Chief Justice Hughes speaking for the Court said:

"Consideration of the subject matter and of the terms of the provision requires affirmative answer. The subject matter is the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives. It cannot be doubted that these comprehensive words embrace authority to provide a complete code for congressional elections, not only as to times and places, but in relation to notices, registration, supervision of voting, protection of voters, prevention of fraud and corrupt practices, counting of votes, duties of inspectors and canvassers, and making and publication of election returns; in short, to enact the numerous requirements as to procedure and safeguards which experience shows are necessary in order to enforce the fundamental right involved. These requirements would be nugatory if they did not have appropriate sanctions in the definition of offenses and punishments. All this is comprised in the subject of 'times, places, and manner of holding elections' and involves lawmaking in its essential features and most important aspect.

"This view is confirmed by the second clause of article I, section 4, which provides that 'the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations,' with the single exception stated. The phrase 'such regulations' plainly refers to regulations of the same general character that the legislature of the State is authorized to prescribe with respect to congressional elections. In exercising this power, the Congress may supplement these State regulations or may substitute its own. It may impose additional penalties for the violation of the State laws or provide independent sanctions. It has a general supervisory power over the whole subject."

In enacting a sixth-grade standard for literacy as regards Federal elections, Congress would simply be exercising its "general supervisory power" to assure that State officials in the performance of their duties under State law also did their duty as regards the United States.

These provisions—the power of Congress to enforce the 15th and 14th amendments and the power of Congress to provide for the manner in which elections are held, plus the "necessary and proper" powers—provide an adequate legal basis for enactment of H.R. 548.

I also commend to the committee for its prompt consideration, H.R. 543. This bill would make it unlawful for hotels, restaurants, theaters, parks, or other public or semipublic places as well as public transportation facilities to discriminate against any member of the Armed Forces of the United States because of race, color, or creed. It subjects proprietors, managers, and employees of such facilities to criminal penalties for discrimination directed against members of the uniformed services.

We have an obligation to protect our service men and women from the insults of racial bias. The necessity for Federal action in this regard does not have to be labored, it is obvious to all.

Mr. Chairman, I am told that 1963 is a vintage year. The 88th Congress has it within its power to make it a vintage year for constitutional rights. Let us pour some new legislative wine into these old bottles.

WATER POLLUTION: A SERIOUS NATIONAL PROBLEM

(Mr. McDOWELL (at the request of Mr. ALBERT) was granted permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, water pollution has become a serious national problem. It is bad enough when people have to resort to buying bottled water in order to get a drink of water free of industrial waste and sediment. But now, we are told by the official West German Institute for Water, Soil, and Air Hygiene, that it has found indications of cancer-producing detergents in the water supply.

Scientists in the Taft Sanitary Engineering Center in Cincinnati have reported on the consequences arising out of the use of such contaminated water.

Senator GAYLORD NELSON, of Wisconsin, is to be congratulated for introducing a bill to set standards that detergents must meet including solubility. His bill takes advantage of the fact that new processes have been developed which would produce soluble detergents. These processes have been pioneered in West Germany where the Parliament had to outlaw insoluble detergents because that nation's principal rivers, including the Rhine, had become piled high with foam.

I include as part of my remarks an article by Marquis Childs on this subject:

SENATOR NELSON OPENS WAR ON DETERGENTS

(By Marquis Childs)

When they returned recently from their recess within a recess a number of Members of Congress reported they found people back home interested not in Laos or Cuba or even in the Rockefeller marriage and how it may affect the presidential race next year but in something much more immediate. That is how they can be sure of getting a drink of relatively unpolluted water when they turn on the tap.

Pollution of the water supply is becoming a serious problem in area after area. In many communities those who can afford it are buying bottled water. They are becoming accustomed to seeing a deposit of sediment from water out of the tap run into bathtubs and dishpans.

This has a direct bearing on conservation and the survival of fish and game. But as hundreds of newly developed chemical compounds are dumped into streams in industrial waste and used with a heavy hand in insect sprays it is a factor of still undetermined significance in the health of human beings. And as compared to the thousands of scientists at work developing new chemicals and pesticides very little is being done about this wholesale pollution of the environment.

A principal source that has been building up during the past 15 years is the chemical detergents used by millions of housewives in automatic dishwashers. Today 4 billion pounds of detergent a year are used. This chemical dissolves in water only very gradually and so, as it is dumped into sewage systems that in turn pour into streams and rivers, it is a more or less permanent cause of pollution.

Senator GAYLORD NELSON, Democrat, of Wisconsin, has put in a bill which would set standards that detergent manufacturers must meet after 1965. New processes are available which at little additional cost would produce soluble detergents. This has been proved out in West Germany which pioneered the chemical detergents. There the Parliament outlawed insoluble detergents after a certain date when it was shown that even principal rivers, such as the Rhine, were piled high with detergent foam.

NELSON, who as Governor pushed through a $50 million conservation program to preserve the great recreation resources of his State, told the Senate that chemical detergents had been found to have polluted the underground water in 64 of Wisconsin's 72 counties. He punctured the idea that this was a State problem which could be handled by the State, pointing out that underground water supplies following mysterious underground routes lead for hundreds of miles in all directions from Wisconsin rivers.

He called attention to the effect of detergent foam in clogging sewage plants. This foam becomes impregnated with a high bacteria count and carried by the wind it becomes an immediate health hazard. As early as 1950 the Wisconsin State Board of Health reported a wall of foam on the Mississippi River in western Wisconsin 15 feet high, 35 feet wide, and 300 feet long. Some years later helicopters had to be used to blow away foam on the Baraboo River in searching for a lost boy.

The official West German institute for water, soil and air hygiene reported last year finding indications of cancer-producing effects of detergents in the water supply. This is, of course only a tentative finding. But it suggests the unknowns in the release of a vast new volume of chemicals in man's environment.

A few scientists in the Taft Sanitary Engineering Center in Cincinnati have been studying the effects of detergent pollution. In a recent report they pointed out how dire the consequences can be as virtually all of this material finds its way into surface and ground water. Since with the population explosion water supplies must be used over and over, the cumulative volume of detergents can be an ever-increasing menace unless it is checked.

Only the more dramatic instances get into the news. In Suffolk County, N.Y., the tap water came out foaming like beer. At one point the Federal Housing Administration refused to insure mortgages because the quality of well water showed the long-term effects of detergents from septic tank effluent.

NELSON, a freshman Senator, is convinced there is a large body of public opinion deeply concerned about pollution of the air and water and ready to respond to leadership seeking to save what is left of the American heritage and to protect defenseless individuals from poisons discharged at random into the environment. In introducing his detergent bill, he spoke of a battle to preserve the simplest basic elements necessary to human survival. This is a line that may have far more political appeal than is realized here.

No. 23 INFORMATION BULLETIN June 19, 1963

The President's Second Message on Civil Rights

In February of this year President Kennedy sent to Congress a message calling for the enactment of a civil rights program which was modest to the point of obvious inadequacy. (See Information Bulletin No. 17). Nevertheless, in neither House of Congress was there any indication that the program or even part of it was likely to be enacted into law. Today, barely four months later, he again sent a message to Congress on civil rights, but proposing this time a more ambitious and far-reaching program. Despite this, the new proposal appears to have much greater chance of passage than the earlier one. The reason for this remarkable development is that, as recognized by the President and the nation at large, in the interim the Negro community has shown clearly that it will wait no more for the justice long overdue and that we are truly faced with a social revolution. The earlier program appeared to have been based upon a hope that it might be accepted, no matter how reluctantly, by the Southern Senators and Congressmen. The present program clearly manifests a realization that any civil rights program will have to be enacted over the opposition of the Southerners in Congress, and that accordingly nothing is to be gained and much lost by offering a totally inadequate bill.

The President's message breathes throughout a spirit of urgency. The revolution will not wait. It would be equally immoral and futile to attempt to halt it. The only choice left to the nation is to determine whether it shall be peaceful or violent. That decision must be made by Congress, for, according to the President, the Judiciary and the Executive have been doing all they can; the default has been exclusively that of the legislative branch of our Federal Government.

The President accordingly asks Congress to enact a comprehensive civil rights bill. Measured by what he called for in February it is a great advance. Measured by the needs of today, it is minimal; less would hardly be meaningful.

The President's program, which he urges be enacted into a single, comprehensive Civil Rights Act of 1963, encompasses the areas of voting, public accommodations, education and employment. In addition it calls for the creation of an agency to conciliate racial disputes, broadening of the functions of the Civil Rights Commission, and the authorization to withhold funds from Federally financed projects guilty of racial discrimination.

There had been some reports that in the field of voting, the President would call for more than what was contained in his February message, as for example, the elimination of all literacy tests as a prerequisite for voting rather than merely providing that the completion of six grades of elementary school education shall create a presumption of literacy. Unfortunately, this has turned out not to be the case; all the President calls for in the field of voting is the enactment of the proposal set forth in the February message. In addition to the presumption of literacy on completion of six years of schooling, the President proposes that: (1) interim relief should be provided by the use of temporary Federal voting referees to determine qualification for registration and voting during the pendency of lawsuits in any county in which fewer than 15% of the eligible Negroes are registered to vote; (2) voting suits shall receive preferential treatment on Federal court calendars; and (3) the law should specifically forbid the use of different standards, practices or procedures for different applicants seeking to register and vote in a Federal election. (The proposal contains no provision for meeting what is perhaps the most serious obstacle to Negro voting -- voter intimidation.)

Public accommodations.

"Events of recent weeks," the President's message states, "have again underlined how deeply our Negro citizens resent the injustice of being arbitrarily denied equal access to those facilities and accommodations which are otherwise open to the general public. That is a daily insult which has no place in a country proud of its heritage -- the heritage of the melting pot, of equal rights, of one nation and one people. No one has been barred on account of his race from fighting or dying for America -- there are no "white" or "colored" signs on the foxholes or graveyards of battle."

The President therefore calls for the enactment, as part of the Civil Rights Act of 1963, of a provision guaranteeing all citizens equal access to the services and facilities of hotels, restaurants, places of amusement and retail stores. The proposal would give the rejected customer the right to obtain a court order against the offending establishment or person. In addition, the Attorney General could sue if voluntary conciliation fails and if the aggrieved party is unable to sue for lack of financial means or because of fear of reprisals.

The Federal Government, the President declares, has both the power and the obligation to eliminate these discriminatory practices first, under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, inasmuch as the practices affect the national economy and the flow of interstate commerce, and secondly under the power conferred upon Congress by the 14th Amendment to enact legislation making certain that no state law permits or sanctions the unequal treatment of any of its citizens.

The February message called only for legislation to provide Federal technical and financial assistance to aid school districts in the process of desegregation in compliance with the Supreme Court's decision. The present program recognizes that this is obviously inadequate. It calls for, in addition, a provision authorizing the Attorney General to bring suit to compel desegregation of a public school district, but only if he receives a written complaint from Negro parents who prove to his satisfaction that they lack the financial means to sue for themselves or fear reprisals if they do so.

This is a very much watered down version of the so-called "Part III", for which civil rights organizations have been pressing. It is the weakest part of the program; first, because it applies only to schools (and public accommodations) rather than to any case in which a person is denied his constitutional rights; second, because it requires what in effect is a degrading "pauper's oath", and third, because it imposes no affirmative obligation on school districts themselves to come forward with programs of desegregation in the absence of a specific court decree in a particular lawsuit. These deficiencies imply an assumption completely inconsistent with the philosophy which otherwise permeates the President's message -- that racial discrimination is not merely a private wrong committed against a specific Negro who alone has cause to complain, but a wrong committed against the whole of our democratic society which the government has not merely the right but the duty to eradicate.

Fair and full employment.

Delinquency, vandalism, gang warfare, disease, slums and the high cost of public welfare and crime are all directly related to unemployment among whites and Negroes alike. But unemployment, the President declares, falls with special cruelty on minority groups. The unemployment rate of Negro workers is more than twice as high as that of the working force as a whole. Employment opportunities, moreover, play a major role in determining whether the right to equality is meaningful. There is little value in a Negro's obtaining the right to be admitted to hotels and restaurants if he has no cash in his pocket and no job.

To meet the problem, the President calls for (in addition to his previous requests for tax cuts to spur the economy and Federal aid to education) additional funds to broaden the Manpower Development and Training Program and to finance the pending youth employment bill, financing of expanded vocational education programs to provide for the teaching of job skills, and for work-study programs for high school youths, particularly in areas with high rates of school dropouts. These and similar measures are needed because even the complete elimination of racial discrimination in employment will not put a single unemployed Negro to work unless he has the skills required and unless more jobs have been created.

Coupled with these economic measures, must be the elimination of racial discrimination in employment. To achieve this, the President calls for enactment of pending Federal fair employment practices legislation, applicable to both employers and unions. In addition, he asks Congress to provide a permanent, statutory basis for the Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, under the chairmanship of the Vice-President, assuring it adequate financing and enforcement procedures.

The Civil Rights Commission.

The President renews the request presented in his February message that the life of the Civil Rights Commission (scheduled to expire at the end of November, 1963) be extended, and that its authority be broadened to enable it to serve as a national civil rights clearing house offering information, advice and technical assistance to any public or private agency requesting it. (The President, however, does not request that the Commission be made a permanent Federal agency.)

Community Relations Service.

Progress in race relations can be more solidly and peacefully accomplished to the extent that legislation can be buttressed by voluntary action. To that end, an agency similar to municipal bi-racial human relations committees is needed on the Federal level. Such an agency would work with the local committees, providing them with advice and assistance and working independently in those cities which lack local committees, to help ease tensions and resolve interracial disputes. The President therefore calls for authority to establish an independent Community Relations Service which would work without publicity and keep in confidence all information imparted to it. Its function would be to provide a means of communication; it would be an instrument, not of compulsion, but of conciliation and reason.

Federally financed programs.

Simple justice, the President asserts, requires that public funds, to which all taxpayers of all races contribute, should not be spent in any fashion which encourages or subsidizes racial discrimination. Direct discrimination by government is unconstitutional; but indirect discrimination through the use of Federal funds is just as invidious. It has been proposed by many (including the Civil Rights Commission itself) that Federal funds be withheld or withdrawn from any project in which discrimination is practiced. This proposal the President finds too extreme. Its universal application would often penalize those who least deserve it without ending discrimination. It would mean the death of programs urgently needed by Negroes as well as white.

All the President's message requests is a single comprehensive provision making it clear that the Federal Government is not required, under any statute, to furnish any kind of financial assistance to any program or activity in which racial discrimination occurs. This would not automatically result in punishing an area for the discrimination that occurs in it, but it would clarify the authority of any administrator with respect to Federal funds or financial assistance and discriminatory practice.

(What the President is apparently seeking to do is to establish a statutory base for the power to withhold Federal funds from projects in which discrimination is practiced, but not requiring that the power be exercised in every case where such discrimination is practiced. The decision whether or not to cut off Federal funds or impose a condition of non-discrimination in order for Federal funds to be allocated to a project, would be made on an ad hoc basis by the particular Federal administrator.)

Simultaneously with the delivery of the message, Senator Mansfield, majority leader, introduced the Administration's bill to put it into effect. The measure does not include an FEPC provision, the President simply having in his message expressed continuing support for pending FEPC bills. The provisions for funds to establish job training, adult education, etc. are also to be presented in separate bills.

S. 1731 opens with a statement that discrimination on grounds of race, color, religion or national origin is incompatible with the concepts of liberty and equality to which our government is dedicated. The elimination of such discrimination is therefore declared to be the policy of the Civil Rights Act of 1963.

Title I of the bill, dealing with voting rights, is identical with the bill (S.1283) introduced in April to carry out the election provisions of the President's February message.

Title II is entirely new, containing a ban on discrimination in hotels and motels that furnish lodging to transients including guests from other states, places of public amusement which exhibit movies, shows or athletic exhibitions that move in interstate commerce, and retail establishments whose goods and services are in a substantial degree provided to interstate travelers or whose goods have moved in interstate commerce or whose activities affect interstate commerce.

Title III deals with desegregation in public education, and contains (in a modified form) the old "Part III" provision for suits by the Attorney General to compel desegregation. Title IV establishes a Community Relations Service to assist communities in the peaceful resolution of racial disputes.

Title V extends the powers and functions of the Civil Rights Commission. Title VI states that no law shall be interpreted as requiring Federal financial aid to any program wherein discrimination is practiced. Title VII authorizes the President to establish a Commission on Equal Employment Opportunity to prevent discrimination by firms having contracts with the Government.

Jan. 9 - 88th Congress opened.

In return for keeping the membership of the ~~Senate~~ Rules Committee at 15, the liberal bloc capitulated on the return of the 21-day rule for release of bills favorably reported by House Committees and a seven-day rule for bills returned from House-Senate conference.

Vote on membership of House Rules Committee 235 - 136 (50 of 98 Dixicrats in House voted with majority for retaining 15 members).

A Republican amendment to increase Republican membership from five to six was defeated 249 - 183.

Senate postponed action on antifilibuster moves until after Jan. 14.

Jan. 14 - Sen. Anderson offered middle-of-road (S Res. 9) resolution that would allow three-fifths of senators voting to put time limit on debates.

Sen. Humphrey offered substitute motion to let Senate impose debate limitation by vote of majority (51 of 100 members).

Sen. Miller introduced identical amendments to both proposals to require that cloture could not be invoked unless the approving vote included a majority of members of each party.

Russell objected, which postponed bills for one day.

Jan. 15 - Southern senators began filibuster; Senate in session less than 6 hours.

Jan. 30 - Sen. Mansfield submitted a preposed agreement for a vote on Jan. 31 on a motion to table the liberal bloc's pending constitutional claim that they have a right to alter rules by a straight majority. (Humphrey's substitute motion). (Mansfield's original porposal, modified because of southern opposition, would have permitted a straight vote on constitutional question itself.)

Jan. 31 - Senate voted to table Humphrey motion 53 - 42. Senate adjourned until 2/4.

Sen. Anderson's proposal now comes up for discussion (three-fifths); technically the filiguster continues

Feb. 5 - Humphrey sent to Senate desk a round-robin petition signed by 51 Senators favoring some strengthening change in rules (Rule 22). The petition avoided commitment to any specific antifilibuster rule. (signers listed, attached)

Feb. 6 - By vote of 92 - 5 motion to table antifilibuster proposals was defeated by unlikely combination of northern liberals and southerners.

Feb. 7 - On petition to invoke cloture (debate on Anderson proposal) Vote of 54 - 42 against, after 4 weeks of filibuster (18 days last session) Senate adjourned until Feb. 11. Liberals forced roll call on adjournment, losing 64 - 33. 18 Democrats and 1 Republican were able to kill rules change, and thus civil rights legislature.

Feb. 28 - President Kennedy's Civil Rights message to Congress. He urged Congress to pass legislation

1 - Voting: to ~~legix~~ expedite voting suits in Federal courts and to let temporary referees register Negroes while suits pending, and (to apply to federal elections only)
to prohibit use of different tests or procedures in registering voters, such as discrimination in administering tests or qualifying examinations or disqualifying for minor errors; specify that a 6th grade education constitutes "presumption of literacy".

2. Schools: to provide Federal financial and technical aid to school districts that are desegregating; delete "separate but equal" phrase from law governing land grant colleges.

3 -CCR: to extend life of CCR for "at least 4 more years and to expand its role by statute so it could serve as "a national civil rights clearing house providing information, advice, and technical assistance to any requesting agency, private or public.

He promised strong executive action in all civil rights fields: antidiscrimination provisions in government contracts, civil service employment; full equality in use of national parks and recreational areas. Noted that 13 states have ratified anti-poll tax constitutional amendment and urged other states "to take prompt action on this matter."

Aftermath of filibuster bitterness:

charges that V.P. Johnson responsible for failure of liberals to win rules change; Southern Democrats in cahoots with western Democrats in a deal to block civil rights bills in exchange for protection of 27½ per cent oal depletion allowance; Be Democratic leadership may have used committee assignments to punish Democrats who fought change of rules.

March 28 - Republicans Javits (plus Keating, Case, Fong, Scott, Kuchel, Beall -- and Saltonstall on CR Commission portion only) introduced civil rights bills:

1. make CCR permanent
2. to prohibit public accommodations discrimination by hotels, motels, or other public places engaged in lodging and interstate commerce
3. authorization for damage suits and for Atty-Gen to initiate injunction suits
Javitts 4. eliminate "separate but equal" from Hill-Burton hospital construction act.
Kuchel 5. school desegregation bill to require all public schools adopt within 180 days a desegregation plan and put at least first step into effect in next school year.
Case 6. Three bills aimed at eliminating discrimination in employment
Keating 7. voting rights bill
Scott 8. Two housing bills
(Javits principal sponsor of the above bills on justice)
~~Muller~~ 9

Rept. Muller proposed two bills in House:
HR 543--to prevent discrimination in public places and public transportation against members of Armed Fordes; HR 548--to protect right to vote in federal elections.

(See Joan Grant article and quotes from Dist. Court Judge J. Skelly Wright, attached)

May 14 - Sen. Javits abandoned effort to tack on to pending feed grains bill a rider to give Atty-Gen. right to sue in civil rights cases.

May 3 - Rep. Fitts proposed five House bills to: empower Civil Rights Commission or Atty-Gen. to eliminate discrimination in schools, housing, boting procedured, banking and insurance, public accommodations, employment and unions; permit Justicd Dept. to protect persons endangered or harassed because of their participation in civil rights movement; make CCR a permanent agency with power to investigate discriminat~~ion~~ory practices and obtain court order to stop discrimination.

May 24 - Committees of House and Senate at work on variety of civil rights measures. MORE THAN 90 civil rights bills have been introduced in House. Hearing in progress before Judiciary Committee.

Celler, chm. of committee, said confident of House passage of bill to: 1) extend CCR for four years; 2) establish 6th grade education as base for literacy test in voting; 3) appointment of federal registrars in any community showing 15% of ~~eligiblexNegroxvoters~~ eligible Negro voters prevented from registering.

Also, considering old 1957 Section III giving Atty-Gen. authority to ~~xxxxx~~ initiate injunctive proceedings to prevent civil rights deprivations in voting, housing, employment, and use of public accommocations--and any other areas.

SENATE: two principal bills being considered in Senate C. R. Subcommittee are: 1) sixth grade literacy test; 2) extension of CCR

May 23 - Dodd and Cooper sponsored two civil rights bills:
1) granting initiative to Atty-Gen to sue to prevent discrimination in school attendance and in use of public accommodation.

Celler said he will close current hearings on C. R. legislation on June 13.

Feb. Equal Employment Opportunity Act (H.R. 405) now before submommittee of House Education and Labor Committee.

THE U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

February 28, 1964

M E M O R A N D U M

SUBJECT: The Civil Rights Bill

This memorandum was prepared for Commission, staff and state advisory committee use in response to many recent inquiries from committee members and Members of Congress.

In this memorandum we summarize the main provisions of the Civil Rights Bill as passed by the House of Representatives and which is now pending in the Senate. The main allegations advanced in opposition to the legislation are mentioned and discussed briefly.

TITLE I - VOTING

The 1957 and 1960 Civil Rights Act sought to guarantee to all citizens the right to vote without discrimination as to race or color and authorized the Attorney General to commence court action to prevent persons from interfering with the right to vote. However, the Commission on Civil Rights found in 1963 that there are still at least 100 counties in 7 States where qualified Negro citizens are denied the right to vote by being forced to meet standards not applied to white citizens. Title I is intended to cope with problems encountered in the implementation of these earlier Civil Rights Acts.

With respect to elections held for the purpose of electing Federal officials, the bill would:

a. prohibit the imposition of different standards for Negroes and whites seeking to register and vote,

b. prohibit the denial of the right to vote because of immaterial errors or omissions,

c. require that any literacy test employed as a qualification for voting be administered in writing and a copy of any individual's test be available on request,

d. establish a rebuttable presumption that any person who has completed the 6th grade is literate.

With respect to any voting proceeding commenced by the Government, the Attorney General or the defendant may request the appointment of a three-judge court to hear the case initially. Appeals would be taken to the U.S. Supreme Court. The Attorney General would not have authority to register any voters.

Amendments: Title I was amended twice on the floor of the House with the effect that now defendants as well as the Attorney General may request the appointment of a three-judge court. Also persons who have completed the 6th grade in an English language school in Puerto Rico will be presumed to be literate. This provision originally applied only to the States, territories and the District of Columbia.

TITLE II - DISCRIMINATION IN PLACES OF PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS

Discrimination would be prohibited in specific places of public accommodation whose operation affects interstate commerce or whose practices of discrimination are supported by State action. An example of the latter would be State or local laws requiring proprietors to exclude or segregate Negro customers. The public accommodations covered include hotels and motels, restaurants, lunch counters, gasoline stations, theaters and staduims or other facilities which are part of an establishment covered by the bill.

The provision would be enforced by civil actions brought by the persons discriminated against or by the Attorney General. The Attorney General could use Federal, State or local public agencies to secure voluntary compliance before beginning the court proceeding.

The civil rights bill would not make persons or businesses licensed by a State or city subject to the Act by virtue of their license. Nor are all businesses offering goods and services to the public covered. Only those establishments specifically listed in the bill or physically part of a listed establishment would be subject to the Act. (The bill would not prohibit racial discrimination in barber shops, beauty parlors and many other service establishments, retail stores, bowling alleys and other places of recreation unless such places serve food. It would not cover hotels or lodging houses which have less than six rooms for rent in a building occupied by the proprietor.) Merely operating under a State regulation would not make an establishment subject to the Act.

It has been suggested that the public accommodation section would be a vast extension of Federal control and that it is unconstitutional. However, businesses open to the public are already subject to many Federal, State and local regulations (e.g., anti-trust laws, zoning ordinances, health and sanitation standards) designed to protect the public and business itself. Also, the proposed legislation prohibiting racial discrimination by certain businesses serving the public is similar to statutes already in existence in 30 States. These statutes have been held constitutional.

Amendments: Discrimination "supported by State action" was redefined by the House to mean discrimination or segregation carried on under color or any law, statute, ordinance or regulation; or carried on under color of any custom or usage required or enforced by public officials; or required by action of the State.

Finally, the Committee version of the bill made it unlawful to incite, aide, or abet any person to discriminate against another. The House deleted this section, but left in tact the prohibitions against intimidation, coercion and retaliation.

TITLE III - PUBLIC FACILITIES

The Attorney General is authorized to institute civil actions against any publicly owned or operated facility (such as a State owned park) whenever he receives a complaint of discrimination. Such facilities are required by the Constitution not to engage in racial discrimination, but many still do discriminate.

He is also authorized to intervene in any action seeking relief from the denial of equal protection of the laws on account of race, color, religion or national origin.

Amendments: The Committee version of the bill made the United States liable for court costs in any proceeding under this Title, and the House added "reasonable attorney's fees" to these costs.

TITLE IV - PUBLIC EDUCATION

The U.S. Office of Education is directed to conduct a survey on the availability of equal educational opportunity. It is authorized to render technical assistance to school districts in the implementation of desegregation plans, to arrange training institutes for school personnel and to make grants to school boards to employ specialists for in-service training. These plans have been required by law since 1954 when the Supreme Court ruled that enforced racial segregation in public schools violates the Constitution. This provision is intended to assist school boards which wish to comply with their constitutional obligations.

The Attorney General is authorized to institute civil actions upon receipt of complaints alleging the continuance of school segregation.

It has been alleged that the U.S. Commissioner of Education "could influence the transfer of children from one school to another . . . . until racial balance exists." The civil rights bill gives no authority to the Commissioner of Education to require or influence the transfer of children.

Amendments: The House redefined "desegregation" to make it explicitly clear that it does not include the assignment of students to public schools in order to overcome racial imbalance.

Another amendment provided that besides school boards, States, municipalities or school districts, other governmental units might apply for technical assistance provided that the unit is legally responsible for operating public schools.

TITLE V - COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

The life of the Commission on Civil Rights is extended for four years and in addition to its present functions of investigating denials of the right to vote and infringements of equal protection guarantees, and appraising Federal policies, the Commission is directed to serve as a national clearinghouse for civil rights information and to investigate general allegations of voting frauds not related to racial discrimination.

Amendments: The Committee version of the bill made the Commission a permanent agency, but the House limited its life to four years. In addition, the House specifically prohibited the Commission from inquiring into or investigating fraternities, sororities, private clubs or religious organizations.

TITLE VI - FEDERALLY ASSISTED PROGRAMS

Each Federal agency which administers a program of financial assistance by grants, loans or contracts is directed to require the elimination of discrimination under the program.

Action of a Federal agency effectuating this requirement might include the termination of or refusal to grant assistance. If such action were taken, it would be subject to review by the courts.

This Title has been attached as an extension of Federal control beyond that presently exercised as part of the normal supervision of Federal expenditures.

The Supreme Court has ruled that the Constitution prohibits the Federal Government or its instrumentalities from discriminating because of race. Other Federal courts have ruled that private or public agencies receiving Federal financial assistance cannot deny the benefits of the program to persons because of their race. Title VI of the civil rights bill simply states these rulings as a principle supported by Congress. It says in effect that when Federal tax monies are collected from all citizens regardless of color the benefits flowing from Federal expenditures of these monies should be available to all citizens regardless of color. For example, this Title would require:

> Hospitals constructed with Federal funds to serve all patients without regard to race, color or national origin;

State employment agencies entirely financed by Federal funds to refer qualified job applicants to employment opportunities without discrimination;

Elementary and secondary schools constructed and maintained by Federal funds to admit children without regard to race, color or national origin;

Colleges and universities receiving Federal funds for the construction and operation of research centers to admit students without discrimination.

It has also been alleged that this section would apply to farmers and to homeowners, implying that they will be "subject to Federal Control." Actually, the bill simply means that when Federal money is made available to help farmers it must be available to Negro farmers as well as white farmers without racial discrimination. It means that when the Federal government makes funds available for the construction of homes, the homes must be offered to all eligible persons without regard to race.

Amendments: The procedures to be followed in the administration of this Title were amended by the House to require that (1) the President approve all implementing rules and regulations, (2) a hearing be held before compliance steps are taken, and (3) Congress be notified 30 days before funds are denied or discontinued to a program.

Another amendment makes clear that this Title would not apply to Federal programs which insure or guarantee loans by private institutions. The Housing Executive Order remains unaffected by this amendment.

TITLE VII - EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY

An Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is created to receive or initiate complaints alleging discrimination by employers in industries affecting interstate commerce with 25 or more employees or by labor unions or employment agencies whose activities affect interstate commerce. The Commission initially would seek to eliminate any discriminatory practices found by conciliation and persuasion but where these efforts fail is authorized to bring civil actions in which the courts would review the facts de novo. If the court finds racial or religious discrimination, it would order the discriminating employer, employment agency or union to treat all persons on the basis of their merit and ability rather than on their race, religion, national origin or sex.

It has been alleged that employers could be told by Federal officials "whom they shall hire, fire, promote and demote, and how they shall handle their employees," that employers could be required to maintain a work force which is balanced along racial or religious lines, and that the rights of employees within their company could be destroyed.

The civil rights bill does not give the Federal government these powers. It only requires that employers, labor unions and employment agencies treat all persons on the basis of their merit and ability and without regard to their race, color, religion or national origin. Employers subject to the bill are free to hire, promote or fire anyone they want provided their action is not based on the person's race, color, religion or national origin. And, under the bill, it would be as unlawful for an employer to discriminate against a white applicant because of race as it would be if he discriminated against a Negro.

Amendments: The House extended the coverage of this title in two respects: (1) sex is now within the prohibited types of discrimination; and (2) retraining and in-service training were added as areas in which there can be no discrimination. The rest of the amendments were largely limiting in nature. Atheists and Communists were excluded from coverage, and religious institutions of learning were allowed to use "religion" as an employment criterion. The Committee bill provided that no union or employer would be subject to coverage during the first year after enactment, only those with 100 or more workers during the second year, fifty workers the third year, and 25 or more during the fourth and succeeding years. The House modified this by adding another year and a 75-worker level to the graduated coverage, postponing coverage of employers of 25 or more till five years after enactment.

Title VII was further amended by several procedural provisions. In order to initiate a complaint, the Commission must now have reasonable cause to believe a violation has occurred. The Committee bill had empowered the Commission to bring a civil action before exhausting their informal techniques if circumstances warranted, but this provision was deleted by the House. The investigative powers of the Commission were clarified and modified to the extent that it may now inspect records of and examine only those persons being investigated or proceeded against. The Committee bill had authorized such action whenever it might add to the enforcement of the title. Regulations or orders by the Commission may now be prescribed only after a public hearing. Government agencies must still furnish all relevant information to the Commission, but the House limited this requirement to information that can be disclosed legally.

An entire section relating to employment practices of Federal agencies and contractors with the government, which was essentially a restatement of an existing executive order, was deleted from the bill. Certain clarifying amendments were also passed.

TITLE VIII - VOTING STATISTICS

The Secretary of Commerce is directed to conduct a survey of persons of voting age by race, color and national origin and to determine the extent to which such persons have registered and have voted, in such geographic areas as recommended by the Commission on Civil Rights.

This Title was not amended by the House.

TITLE IX - REMOVAL IN CIVIL RIGHTS CASES

The order of a Federal court sending a civil rights case back to a State court shall be reviewable by appeal.

This Title was not amended by the House.

TITLE X - COMMUNITY RELATIONS SERVICE

This entire Title was inserted in the bill on the House floor, after having been deleted by the Judiciary Committee. It establishes a Community Relations Service in the Department of Commerce to provide informal assistance to persons or communities requiring help with civil rights problems. The Service is limited to a Director and six employees.

TITLE XI - MISCELLANEOUS

The last title in the act contains necessary miscellaneous provisions. Appropriations are authorized to carry out the act, and a separability clause provides that the rest of the act will be unaffected if any portion is invalidated. Another section preserves existing remedies under Federal law.

Amendments: A new section was added by the House to insure that the provisions of the act are not construed as "occupying the field" of civil rights legislation. State laws in this area are to remain in force unless inconsistent with the act.

CONCLUSION

The civil rights bill pending before the Senate would not, as has been alleged, deprive people of their personal liberties. It would prevent discrimination because of race, religion, or national origin or sex. And it would not even prevent all forms of discrimination. It prohibits discrimination by government officials in education and voting; discrimination by large employers and unions in their hiring practices; discrimination by business establishments which operate in interstate commerce and are open to the general public; and discrimination by institutions such as universities, schools and hospitals which give service provided by Federal funds. The bill would certainly not prohibit a homeowner from deciding whom he wants to invite to his house, or a private club from restricting its membership on the basis of race.

Contrary to allegations, the bill does not deny anyone's constitutional rights. In fact, its major provisions are designed to secure rights which are guaranteed by the Constitution but which have been denied some citizens. The constitutionality of the major provisions of this legislation is supported by bar associations, eminent lawyers and law teachers throughout the Nation.

NEW SIT-IN BRIEF TO SUPREME COURT As requested by the Supreme Court, the Solicitor General of the U.S. has submitted a new brief to the high court involving five sit-in cases arising in Maryland, South Carolina, and Florida. These cases raise the question whether private discrimination, when actively supported by a State's criminal process, constitutes State action under the Fourteenth Amendment. In its earlier brief the Justice Department had suggested that these cases be decided on narrow grounds, that the sit-in convictions were invalid since the States had not given adequate warning to the violators that their conduct was illegal. The court sought, however, the Government's position on the broader constitutional question.

In the recent brief, the Government has taken the position that, "for a State to give legal support to a right to maintain public racial segregation in places of public accommodations, as part of a caste system fabricated by a combination of State and private action, constitutes a denial of equal protection of the laws."

The argument is based on the proposition that the States involved in these cases have a history of official discrimination against Negroes. The brief claims that racial discrimination in public accommodations is part of "a community-wide practice of stigmatizing Negroes an inferior caste" and that the States have shared in creating this history and pattern of segregation. The Government argues that the State's direct involvement in the sit-in cases is based upon three propositions: (1) the State is involved in the arrest and prosecution of the sit-iners'; (2) the State is involved by its failure to purge itself of its prior part in establishing the system of segregation; (3) the State is involved by the traditional acceptance of responsibility for regulating public accommodations. The first proposition of State involvement in arrests and prosecution looks to the theory of the Court in Shelley v. Kraemer. There the court held that judicial enforcement of a restrictive covenant on the sale of land constituted State action within the Fourteenth Amendment. The Government limits the applicability of Shelley by noting that the case applies only to arrests and prosecutions arising out of a sit-in, that is, where the alleged trespass occurs at a public accommodation traditionally regulated by the State and for which, therefore, it is partially responsible.

It should be noted that by taking this approach the government's brief does not reach the broader constitutional question as to whether any prosecution arising out of an attempt to enforce segregation in public accommodations is constitutional. By showing that there existed an established pattern of segregation for which the State shared responsibility, the government was addressing itself only to the instant cases, all of which arose in Southern States. Left unanswered is the question whether it is necessary to show an established pattern of segregation in order to deem unconstitutional any prosecution enacting from the sit-in situation.

The dates are those in which the law was first enacted; the underlining means that the law is enforced by a commission. In addition to the above, the following cities in States without pertinent laws have enacted antidiscrimination ordinances: Albuquerque, N. Mex. (housing); Ann Arbor, Mich.[1] (housing); Baltimore, Md. (employment); Chicago, Ill. (housing); El Paso, Tex. (public accommodations); Kansas City, Mo. (public accommodations); Louisville, Ky. (public accommodations); Madison, Wis. (housing); Oberlin, Ohio (housing); Omaha, Neb. (employment); St. Joseph, Mo. (public accommodations); St. Louis, Mo. (public accommodations and housing); Tacoma, Wash. (housing); Toledo, Ohio (housing); University City, Mo. (public accommodations); Yellow Springs, Ohio (housing); and Washington, D.C. (public accommodations and housing).

[1] Alaska was admitted to the union in 1959 with these laws on its books.
[2] Hospitals are not enumerated in the law, however, a reasonable interpretation of the broad language contained in the public accommodations law could include various health facilities.
[3] The law appears to be limited to business schools.
[4] Hospitals where operations (surgical) are performed are required to render emergency or first aid to any applicant if the accident or injury complained of could cause death or severe injury.
[5] In 1963, the Governor issued an executive order requiring all executive departments and agencies whose functions relate to the supervising or licensing of persons or organizations doing business to take all lawful action necessary to prevent racial or religious discrimination.
[6] The law exempts 11 counties; one other county has until November 1964 to decide whether it will accept coverage.

[8] The statute does not cover housing per se but it prohibits persons engaged in the business from discriminating.
[9] The statute reates to vocational, professional, and trade schools.
[10] In 1962, a Washington lower court held that a real estate broker is within the public accommodations law.

VARIOUS CLAUSES OF CIVIL RIGHTS PROPOSALS POINT WAY 4-8-64 Metro Herald

Hotels, Restaurants, Theatres, Press, Public And Private Schools Under Federal Control?

(EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the 3rd in a series of articles on the proposed civil rights bill now before the Senate of the United States. Not many details of the bill have been published by the daily Press. These series of articles were prepared by a group of Congressmen, headed by Georgia's E. L. (Tic) Forrester. Mr. Forrester is a member of the House Judiciary Committee and has made perhaps the most comprehensive study of the bill by sections of any man in Washington. In these articles each section is given detailed study and interpreted as the author's of the bill have not done for the American public.)

Hotels, restaurants, and theatres — Places of "public accommodation" do not cater by custom to one race in preference to another solely from proprietary preference. People are in business to make money and in certain areas they have learned, or have reason to believe, it is more profitable to serve only one race or another. In other areas, proprietors have learned it is more profitable to serve all races, indiscriminately. A host follows the customers of his community else he suffers economically.

To force him to abandon his practice, to run counter to prevailing opinion, is to injure his business and his property. He does not, and he cannot, set custom. He follows it or suffers.

Under the provisions of this bill, the proprietor's right to decide whom he will or will not serve, as that decision pertains to race, color, religion, or national origin, is stripped from him (title II). Moreover, if a customer proves objectionable, the owner can have him removed from his premises only at peril of being in violation of the race laws. For, under this act, the proprietor, if challenged, must prove he did not remove the objectionable customer because of his race, but because of some other reason. This is a perversion of basic principles of our laws . . .

How can a restaurant operate successfully if its owner is not given freedom of choice in the selection of waiters, chefs, and cashiers? Although a restaurant serves, and advertises as its specialty, genuine southern dishes, under this bill the owner could not hire only Negro chefs if covered by sections 601, 602 or title VII. (See Labor Standard, p. 12.) He could not, even though the success of his business depended on such chefs; even though his patronage was built upon the belief the food was being prepared by Negro chefs whose culinary art with "southern" specialties is world renowned. He could be forced instead to hire in a "racially balanced" manner — so long as the potential employee had a modicum of skill — else be in violation of law. And a modicum of skill, it need not be added, is insufficient to attract clientele to a restaurant whose reputation is build upon the culinary art of southern Negro chefs.

The Press — Race, as the first criterion of employment for newspapers, periodicals, radio and television, applies under this bill, as well as for other elements of our commerce. If a job applicant can write and there is an opening and if he is of the race called for to balance the makeup of the staff, that person must be employed in preference to someone of another race.

What such employment practices would do to the character of the newspaper or program is immediately apparent to those who earn their living in the world of mass media. Yet that is the sense of this bill. The bill grants the power to make it mandatory that the staff of a newspaper be thoroughly integrated, racially and religiously, else the owners are in violation of Federal law.

If the owners of a television station prefer an announcer of a certain race to enunciate its commercials, it is denied that choice. Announcers, as well as commentators, actors, and supporting staff, must be raically balanced, despite the fact that the use of members of a certain race may, demonstrably, cause diminished sales to both station and sponsor.

Even so, this destruction of the right of free choice, serious as it is, is not the most fearsome feature of this bill it applies to the press.

Title II, section 203, says: "No person shall * * * incite or aid or abet any person to do any of the foregoing," i.e., deny or attempt to deny any person any right or privilege described in the title.

Read that language as you will, if this becomes the law it means that no editor could with impunity editorialize in opposition to its provisions.

If a citizen takes a position in direct opposition to some provisions of this title and a newspaper writes an editorial in support of that position, indeed, urges other to take similar stands, is that newspaper inciting, or aiding, or abetting? It would seem so (sec. 203 (a) (e)).

The fact of the matter is this: If a person stands in a public square or before a civic club and advocates that segregation is best for either race and urges that it be maintained — and his stand is editorially supported by a newspaper — both would be in violation of Federal law and both would be subject to fine and imprisonment (sec. 202, 203 (a) (e)), if they continue to exercise freedom of speech and of the press. Under such a circumstance, what becomes of the right of free speech? Or freedom of the press? Of course, this violates all constitutional concepts.

Teachers and Schools — Public and Private — The proposed legislation ultimately would result in total Federal control of the education processes in the United States.

Under provisions of this bill, the President and his appointees in Federal agencies would have the right to dictate pupil assignments in local schools and to approve the faculties (secs. 601, 602, 711 (b), title IV). The alternative would be the loss of all Federal aid (sec. 602). The child who is given lunch through Federal grant must also study under a federally approved faculty. This applies to every school, public or private, benefitting from programs involving Federal aid.

The power contained in this bill to cut off Federal funds is not merely a negative power. Those who have already accepted Federal funds can be compelled, in various instances, by foreclosure, injunction and blacklisting, to meet the current Federal standards (secs. 601, 692, Executive Order 11063).

The bill gives the Attorney General the power to institute school integration suits, not only against individuals but against States and local governments as well (sec. 407). This action gives to one man a power which has never before existed; previously the Attorney General could only intervene in private suits. This new power needless to add, can affect the rights of local school boards where no parents or pupils have filed any suits. Under this power the defendents could be deprived of the right of trial by jury. In any contempt actions arising out of U.S. suits, local school officials would be tried by the very judge whose order was allegedly disobeyed.

ACLU ASKS SUPREME COURT TO REVERSE "BALANCING" THEORY IN FIRST AMENDMENT CASES

The United States Supreme Court has under consideration an appeal from the American Civil Liberties Union that the court reverse its position of "balancing the competing private and public interests at stake" in cases involving the First Amendment. At the same time the high court was asked to establish a new rule of "cogency" in determining whether Congressional investigating committees can require witnesses to disclose information concerning political affiliations.

The argument was set forth in a friend of the court brief filed by the ACLU. The brief called for a reversal of the 1960 contempt of Congress conviction of Edward Yellin, a graduate engineering student, who had declined to answer questions put to him by the House Committee on Un-American Activities on the grounds that his rights under the First Amendment were being violated.

The civil liberties organization urged the Supreme Court to upset its rulings in the Barenblatt, Wilkinson and Braden cases in which the Court said that a witness' right under the First Amendment not to answer questions by the HUAC as to his Communist associations, must be balanced against the public's need to maintain national security. The high court ruled that in this situation the public's need outweighed the individual's First Amendment claim. "We respectfully submit," the ACLU stated, "that the underlying concept of a 'balance' of interests is fallacious, partly because even if balancing were appropriate the scales are unduly weighted if one considers the issue to be one of public versus private interest."

The ACLU emphasized it was not urging "dogmatic assertion of absolutes" and situations can be "envisioned in which unrestricted freedom of expression might result in the denial of another basic right guaranteed by the Constitution, such as the right of a fair trial."

After noting that the protection of the First Amendment of "the right to remain silent about affiliations, political, religious, or otherwise" must be affirmed in the light of various Supreme Court decisions over the years, the ACLU asked the Court, "Is that right protected against inquiry by all government agents, and if not, against which?"

A difference must be drawn, the brief asserted, between the compelling of answers in a law suit and in an inquiry by a legislative committee. In the former, it continued, the public interest is served in the administration of justice which is superior to the public interest in free association and the right not to disclose. The ACLU questioned, however, whether the public interest in all inquiries by legislative committees was so great as to outweigh its interest in free association.

The ACLU reminded that the purpose of bodies such as the House Un-American Activities Committee is to recommend legislation, not to establish facts about specific people or occurrences. When a legislative committee has already gathered enough material for its purposes from willing witnesses, the brief said, the "cogency" of a recalcitrant witness' testimony must be considered. Only if this testimony is considered absolutely essential for legislative purposes, should the answer be compelled, it said, or punishment inflicted.

Pointing to the "dangers of the Communist conspiracy" is not a sufficient excuse, the ACLU noted. While these dangers may justify the formation of a Congressional investigating committee, it added, they are "a far cry" from being sufficient to require disclosure of political affiliations from unwilling witnesses. The "cogency of the need for the particular answers requested, not the importance of the general subject under investigation" is what must be born in mind, it said. "For what a court will do if our suggestion is deemed acceptable would be to study the record, not only with regard to the particular witness, but the entire record relating to the background, to see what information the Committee had obtained and was generally available. Ordinarily enough information for legislative purposes is gathered from willing witnesses. That certainly has been the case with the House Un-American Activities Committee. Only if a study of the whole record shows a 'cogent interest' in obtaining answers to the particular questions put to the recalcitrant witness should answer be compelled -- or punishment inflicted."

In the Yellin case, the Committee had asked questions relating to membership in the Communist Party and "colonization" of the steel unions by the Communist Party. The hearings, held in Gary, Ind., were public, a previous request for a hearing in an executive session having been denied by a Committee staff member.

The ACLU brief noted that Yellin's attorney at the trial sought to establish that the Committee already had so much relevant material when it questioned Yellin that "its interest in answers to the questions put was trivial."

The government's contention, the ACLU added, that "the inquiry was necessary because the Committee knew nothing about the activities of the Communist Party in Indiana is also beside the point. Indeed, the claim is disingenuous in the light of the many pronouncements about the Communist Party which have emanated from Congress. For the issue is not, as the government would have it, whether petitioner could offer material for 'new investigation' but whether there was 'cogent' need for it in view of what was already known. And of that there was no evidence whatever."

Yellin refused to answer the committee's questions on the grounds that they interfered with his freedom of speech, belief and association. He was indicted and convicted of contempt in 1960. The U.S. Court of Appeals upheld the conviction. After initial argument last year, the Supreme Court ordered reargument this fall.

At the time of the Committee hearing, Yellin was a senior at the Engineering School of the University of Colorado. He later received a fellowship grant at the University of Illinois. In March, 1961, he received a loan-grant from the Ford Foundation and a grant from the National Science Foundation. After speeches in Congress by HUAC members attacking the NSF grant it was revoked.

the great personal and social ills of our day to concentrate wholly or primarily on one's status before a judgmental God in the life to come, it sounds hollow and harsh. Many would prefer hell to life in heaven with a God who is made to appear unconcerned about persons in the here and now and exclusively concerned for the restoration of his own offended dignity. Many have come to feel that a God in whom belief is not comprehensive and emancipating and healing is hardly worthy of the devotion of one's life.

Southern Baptists do recognize the "there-ness" of the Christian message, and they intend to be loyal to it, though their fundamental orientation is subjective. This recognition is one of the contributions they could make to the whole church if they were more closely allied with it. On the other hand, they need to see that their emphasis on particular facets of the Christian message stems partly from the fact that those facets were relevant to the outlook, needs and fears of the frontier-rural "old south." Reformulation of the message would not be a tampering with the eternal gospel, as they are likely to see it, but actually a step required by the nature of the gospel itself. And besides, such reformation has good Southern Baptist precedent.

At present the most educated guess would be that during the next two decades the Southern Baptists will be moving in a reactionary direction theologically, becoming more doctrinaire in temper. But what will happen once the new breed of laymen and pastors enters many key leadership positions defies prediction. The outlook and tone may change under the influence of progressive leadership; on the other hand, the liberal spirits, unable to remain and retain their integrity, may eventually affiliate with another Baptist body or another denomination.

Perhaps the Southern Baptist vocation in this age, so free to discard traditional outlooks, is to be reactionary. In such an age a reactionary agency can serve providentially. As I noted above, Southern Baptists might serve the universal church well by overemphasizing the objectivism, the givenness of the gospel at a time when relevance is claiming wide attention. But I cannot believe that a reactionary course is what the Lord of the church would enjoin the Southern Baptists to follow.

Why the H.U.A.C. Should Go

Ten reasons why the continued existence of the House Committee on Un-American Activities is detrimental to the nation's health.

HAROLD E. FEY

✦ THE HOUSE of Representatives should relieve of further responsibility its standing Committee on Un-American Activities. In practice, although not by specific mandate from the House, the principal activity of the Committee on Un-American Activities is to oppose communism and in particular communist subversion. This purpose is a useful one and deserves to be carried out effectively. The House committee, however, is performing this function so ineptly that it weakens and confuses the forces in our government and in our society which strengthen democracy. It should therefore be retired and its object pursued by more appropriate means.

The patriotism and sincerity of the members of the House committee are not in question. Neither should doubt be cast on the right of Congress to investigate by means of its committees any matter which has a bearing on the constitutional function of Congress, which is to enact legislation. Since the nature and methods of the communist conspiracy against the free world constitute such a matter, it is highly important that the government and people of the United States be accurately informed about it. But the members of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, operating under a mandate which Congress has a right to convey, are ineffective and maladroit in their efforts. In the committee's long history its members have developed a pattern which provides little ground for hope that their ideas or methods will improve. They should therefore make way for instrumentalities which make better use of the taxpayers' money.

There can be no doubt that a major element in the instability of the international situation stems from the efforts, both threatened and actual, of the communist powers to spread their doctrine and their political domination by force or subversion. Against these efforts the United States and other free nations are obliged to maintain a balance of military power. But ideas, even bad ideas, cannot finally be defeated by force. In the words of Richard S. Leghorn, chairman of the National Planning Association's committee on security, the communist threat can be reduced most effectively "through measures which tend to promote the evolution of communist countries toward societies compatible with our basic national political goal."

with stories of external threats. We as a nation can encourage freedom by reducing threats to the minimum necessary to keep power balanced, by working for disarmament with inspection, by making it reasonable for communist powers to distribute to their people more of the products of their work, by encouraging exchanges of persons and goods, by stepping up the volume and quality of information concerning the nature of American life and the scope of our national purposes. When communist nations become "have" nations they become less revolutionary and imperialistic, less inclined to destroy or subvert, more open to "enforced, competitive peace under law and justice," as Mr. Leghorn says.

Our main reliance for security from domestic subversion lies in the willing, informed and participating loyalty of American citizens. Loyalty is many-faceted, but at its core it is voluntary personal identification with other persons in a living community whose traditions are understood and believed, whose present purposes are shared and promoted and whose objectives inspire the cooperation of all. Loyalty cannot be coerced. It is a faith which is drawn out by the faith of others, an aspiration which shares in the common hope, an affection which blooms only in an atmosphere of trust and unity.

This is the first point at which the House Committee on Un-American Activities fails. Since "exposure and punishment is the aim of this committee and the reason for its existence," as Justice Black said in his dissent in the Barenblatt case, it cannot and does not create loyalty. A policy which seeks to curb subversion and encourage loyalty by such acts of coercion as "exposure" to public shame, "pursuit" resulting in loss of employment, punishment without due process of law, is subject to serious question on grounds of morality as well as intelligence.

The last Congress abandoned the effort to create loyalty among students by economic coercion as exercised through student loans. The present Congress should abandon the effort to create loyalty among citizens by the coercive tactics followed by the House Un-American Activities Committee. Loyalty is a good thing. We shall have more of it if we stop trying to create by coercion that which is by nature voluntary.

If Congress abolished the H.U.A.C. as a standing committee, the House judiciary committee would still be responsible for checking on enforcement of laws and Congress would still be free to authorize congressional investigations when and where needed. Indeed, the House should debate the advisability of such investigations and should publicly authorize them if they are to be held. Its handing over to H.U.A.C. majority vote—five members of a committee of nine—all the decisions as to the subjects of investigation and the timing of such probes is an unwise delegation of House responsibility.

If there were reason to believe, for example, that communism had infiltrated the churches, the House debate preliminary to a decision whether to enter into an investigation would itself inform the public as well as the House concerning the reality and the seriousness of the threat. If the entire House were to be involved in making such decisions, there would be less politically motivated timing of investigations and less jockeying for positions on ad hoc committees, for there would be less opportunity for self-promotion at public expense than obtains with regard to a standing committee. Finally, there would be less likelihood that the quest for truth would become twisted by the vested institutional interests which collect around standing committees. The personal ambition and organizational imperialism, the bureaucratic inflexibility and self-perpetuation that frequently characterize such committees would be discouraged if investigations were made the special responsibility of the Congress which authorizes them.

I

A second reason why the House of Representatives should abolish its Committee on Un-American Activities is that the House has never been able to define what it wants the committee to do. Its terms of reference are so ambiguously stated that it is impossible to define the requirement that testimony be pertinent. The committee now has virtually unlimited authority. As Chief Justice Warren said of the authorizing resolution of the H.U.A.C. (in his decision in the 1957 Watkins case):

> It would be difficult to imagine a less explicit authorizing resolution. Who can define the meaning of "Un-American"? What is that single, solitary "principle of the form of government as guaranteed by our Constitution"? . . . No one could reasonably deduce from the charter the kind of investigation that the committee was directed to make. . . . Unless the subject matter has been made to appear with undisputable clarity, it is the duty of the investigative body, upon objection of the witness on grounds of pertinency, to state for the record the subject under inquiry at that time and the manner in which the propounded questions are pertinent thereto.

If it is objected that too narrow a definition of purpose would handicap the committee, the answer is that the present lack of precision constitutes a greater handicap. Has it never occurred to the committee that one reason many witnesses who appear before it give ambiguous and evasive answers is that they do not know why they have been summoned or what their rights are in the situation? Irving Ferman, in his contribution to the procommittee book The Committee and Its Critics, writes:

> Because of the extremely broad language of the mandate to investigate un-American propaganda given by Congress to the H.U.A.C., a witness appearing before it may not be able to decide clearly whether the Committee has the power to ask a particular question, much as he may doubt the point. Persistence in refusing to answer a question may subject him to citation for contempt by > Congress, in the absence of any line of legal reasoning which would lead to a test of the relevancy of the disputed question to the mandated function of the Committee. He must answer at his peril. (p. 250)

The witness is equally jeopardized by silence.

The House should abolish the Committee on Un-American Activities because it is impossible to redefine its mandate in such a way as to avoid transgression of the proper functions of the judiciary committee. Redefinition would necessarily reduce the functions and scope of the committee, and thereby increase the importance of the question as to whether this standing committee is needed. Abolishing a committee which has never had a clear mandate but which has built a tradition and a staff on an assumption of unlimited competence and authority would be easier than continuing the committee on its present basis or trying to define and limit its operation.

II

A third reason for Congress to retrieve the authority it has alloted the H.U.A.C. is that by so doing the House could move toward development of better methods of acquiring information necessary for writing legislation—or for forming fair judgments on the efficacy of government departments charged with responsibility for enforcement of laws, particularly those against subversion.

The characteristic method by which the House committee has worked is through detailed inventory of particular cases. Its policy of exposing individuals indicates that it believes it should examine communists one at a time in order to decide what sort of legislation against subversion is needed. The logic of this method serves to perpetuate the committee that uses it, since it can never get all the facts until it has examined all communists who can be found, then re-examined those who may have changed their minds. Congress does not proceed in this manner in dealing with legislation concerning offenders of any other sort. By following such a policy the committee gives the impression that everybody who appears before it must be a communist, a communist sympathizer, a former communist or a communist dupe. Careers have been undermined by nothing more than a summons to appear before the H.U.A.C.

Special investigating committees appointed by the House when need arises would not be bound to follow the procedures which are characteristic of this standing committee. So that the legislative judgment might be informed, these committees would welcome expert advice—advice that would generally be freely available to such committees without resort to compulsion. British royal commissions obtain cooperation in investigating the most difficult issues. Like many congressional committees, these royal commissions call witnesses and receive their opinions and recommendations without impugning their loyalty or jeopardizing their status or employment. Persons who come before them are not held up to suspicion, disrespect or harassment; on the contrary, their rights are respected and protected.

III

A fourth reason why the House should recover the authority it has delegated to the H.U.A.C. is that by doing so it would strengthen the faith of Americans in themselves, in their laws and government and in particular in the Congress as a free and representative legislative body. To justify its existence as a standing committee H.U.A.C. has contributed, whether intentionally or unintentionally, to an atmosphere of fear. Partly through its influence, many Americans believe that communism is winning the cold war, that our young people are easy "dupes" for communist "machinations," that the entertainment field and the teaching profession are teeming with traitors, that labor unions and college professorships offer hideouts for treasonous activity, that the Protestant ministry harbors communists or communist sympathizers. One result is that extremist organizations flourish as never before in our history. Fear and suspicion are sufficiently prevalent so that the way is prepared for demagogues who pursue personal ends by fomenting panic.

We need to listen again to the voice, now regrettably stilled, of the late Judge Learned Hand:

> I believe that that community is already in process of dissolution where each man begins to eye his neighbor as a possible enemy, where nonconformity with the accepted creed, political as well as religious, is a mark of disaffection; where denunciation, without specification or backing, takes the place of evidence, where orthodoxy chokes freedom of dissent; where faith in the eventual supremacy of reason has become so timid that we dare not enter our conviction in the open lists to win or lose. Such fears as these are a solvent which can eat out the cement that binds the stones together; they may in the end subject us to a despotism as evil as any that we dread; and they can be allayed only in so far as we refuse to proceed on suspicion, and trust one another until we have tangible ground for misgiving.

Congress can and should give the country an example of how to proceed on trust by refusing to initiate probes until it establishes the need for them in public debate and by decision of the whole body. It should also deny H.U.A.C. permission to proceed in this divisive field on the basis of a mere majority of five in a committee of nine.

The way in which a committee can, without intending to do so, contribute to widespread fear and panic in the country is illustrated by the H.U.A.C.-sponsored film Operation Abolition. Intended in the first instance as a report to the House in substantiation of the committee's claim for new appropriations, this controversial film has reportedly been seen by 15 to 20 million people. Irrespective of the authenticity of particular statements or the order of its episodes, the film's general effect has been to stir up dissension in hundreds of communities, to arouse resentment and disappointment among students and young people, to deepen dismay among teachers and others who seek to foster intelligent participation in civic life. Granting that the H.U.A.C. did not necessarily intend all the disruptive effects of this film, such an acknowledgment does not diminish the judgment that spreading dissension and dread at a time when the country needs confidence and unity is a blunder of first magnitude and a further proof that Congress should confine its activities to gathering information concerning needed legislation and passing such legislation.

IV

A fifth reason why the House of Representatives should terminate the H.U.A.C.'s mandate is that the type of loyalty probe conducted by the committee no longer serves the national interest. The administrative agencies of the federal government have, under prodding from the H.U.A.C., worked out their own battery of loyalty tests for government employees. They have set up safeguards which make what is regarded as the necessary compromise between individual rights and national security. In the opinion of former U. S. Attorney General Francis Biddle, "Loyalty probes create confusion, suffering and the disunity of suspicion." Be that as it may, we have regularized this form of civic agony, and loyalty procedures have been established at great cost as a factor in government service.

It would be wrong and mistaken for Congress to ask the executive or judicial arms of government to extend loyalty tests to the entire population. It would be even more tragically wrong and mistaken for the legislative branch of the government to extend through H.U.A.C. a role for which it is not equipped by law, temperament or function. Yet if H.U.A.C. does not contemplate proposing legislation to make loyalty tests universal, why does it continue its preposterous procedure of probing the loyalty of individual citizens?

The objection to generalized loyalty tests is that they tend to bring into question the basis of loyalty which is freedom of choice. Says Alan Barth in The Loyalty of Free Men: "The loyalty of free men must be freely given, which is to say, that those who give it must be genuinely free to withhold it. Nothing is more fundamental to freedom than that this choice be a real one." The presumption of loyalty is a valid and precious element in our free society. Loyalty probes by government agencies bring this presumption into question and introduce elements of doubt, suspicion, fear and coercion. They also give rise to resentment over injustice when such probes are conducted without adequate safeguards for individual rights. Free-ranging probes of citizen loyalty, conducted by a committee whose original mandate is uncertainly defined and whose procedures are difficult to predict with accuracy, do more harm than good and should be terminated. Wrote Telford Taylor in Grand Inquest (1952):

> Loyalty committees have become a sort of irregular and irresponsible security police force, operating on a mounting scale which is rapidly approaching an overt and acknowledged inquisition. They exert the power of office and the pressure of publicity to inflict severe punishment, outside the due and regular processes of criminal law, and increasingly resemble the special peoples courts established by the Nazis to execute the 'healthy feeling of the people' and in Communist countries to enforce Party standards of individual behavior and attitude. Perhaps the most sinister feature of these events and circumstances is that they are inducing a serious decline, even in government circles, of respect for law and the processes of justice. (p. 280).

Sixth, the H.U.A.C. should be discharged as a standing committee because it has become a divisive force at a time when American life needs to experience the full unity inherent in an order dependent upon "the consent of the governed." Although it has not so intended, the House committee has exaggerated and deepened divisions between segregationists and integrationists, between labor and management, between parents and educators, between students and law officers, between people and Congress. The tensions and disturbances which are increasingly related to H.U.A.C. hearings are not a good sign. If the only objection to the hearings is that they offer communists an opportunity to show their dislike for the committee, and the committee members an opportunity to show their dislike for communists, they would not be a serious matter. But others than communists become involved. Some of these others probably are dupes, as the committee charges. But still others are driven to protest because they do not like to see government officers engaging in procedures of doubtful legality, serving as dividers and troublemakers in the community, giving opportunities to apostles of discord to raise rows, encouraging extremists of the right as well as the left to engage in public brawls and disruptions, diverting attention from the great issues of domestic and foreign affairs by exaggerating out of all reasonable proportion the threat of a small communist minority.

Some may counter that H.U.A.C. enjoys wide public support and that such support is not consistent with the charge that the committee has developed into a symbol of division. There can be little doubt that the committee does have wide support, but some of the reasons for that support should give Congress pause. The H.U.A.C. has such support because it has convinced multitudes of Americans (1) that subversion is widespread in our government and in our nation; (2) that subversives cannot be dealt with by existing law, democracy being essentially a vulnerable form of government; and (3) that only H.U.A.C. has the power and the will to "dig out," to "expose," to "pursue" and otherwise punish communists or other subversives.

In other words, the public has been misinformed concerning the loyalty of our citizens, the nature of the national danger and the strength of our democratic remedy, and the peril to the nation involved in the legislative arm's violation of the principle of separation of powers.

Seventh, the House of Representatives should withdraw the mandate it has given the H.U.A.C. in that doing so would be a step toward strengthening freedom of speech and association in the United States. These basic freedoms, established in the First amendment, stand in serious danger because of the extremity to which anticommunism is being pushed. There is no doubt that communists would deny freedom of speech, assembly and the press in this country if they had a chance. They have done so elsewhere. But they do not have that power in this country, and please God will never have it. On the other hand, we their opponents have the power, and if we are not careful we do harm to freedom by the means we use to protect it. At least four justices of the Supreme Court now believe that the Un-American Activities Committee's operations violate the First amendment. Justice Black, in his dissent in the Wilkinson and Braden cases, said:

> The result of all this is that from now on anyone who takes a public position contrary to that being urged by the House Un-American Activities Committee should realize that he runs the risk of being subpoenaed to appear at a hearing in some far-off place, of being questioned with regard to every minute detail of his past life, of being asked to repeat all the gossip he may have heard about any of his friends and acquaintances, of being accused by the committee of membership in the Communist party, of being held up to the public as a subversive and a traitor, of being jailed for contempt if he refuses to cooperate with the committee in its probe of his mind and associations, and of being branded by his neighbors, employer and erstwhile friends as a menace to society regardless of the outcome of that hearing. With such a powerful weapon in its hands, it seems quite likely that the committee will weather all criticism, even though justifiable, that may be directed toward it. For there are not many people in our society who will have the courage to speak out against such a formidable opponent. If the present trend continues, this already small number will necessarily dwindle as their ranks are thinned by the jails. Government by consent will disappear to be replaced by government by intimidation because some people are afraid that this country cannot survive unless Congress has the power to set aside the freedoms of the First Amendment at will.

An illustration of the H.U.A.C.'s divisive effect is to be found in its relation to the Protestant churches. Here the committee has been identified with and used by extreme fundamentalists against persons and organizations of mainline churches. This development first became apparent in the public hearing given Methodist Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam. Sections of the front rows in that hearing were occupied by men identified with the American Council of Christian Churches, a small organization of fundamentalist congregations and splinter denominations. Again, at the San Francisco hearings which resulted in the Operation Abolition film, among the passholders invited by representatives of the committee were seven or eight ministers of extremist views. The latter have faithfully repaid their obligation by issuing statements supporting the committee's version of what went on and endorsing the film report of the event.

Moreover, the committee has often referred in terms of hostility to the National Council of Churches. A particular instance is the committee's 1961 publication The Truth About the Film "Operation Abolition," which, without quoting in its entirety at the outset a statement carefully drawn up by the General Board of the National Council on February 22, 1961, declared that it is "a statement which, without any justification whatsoever, makes vicious insinuations against the committeee" (Part II, page 50).

Eighth, the mandate of the H.U.A.C. as a standing committee should be withdrawn because the impression is widespread, whether justified or not, that the committee manifests a dangerous tendency to use state power for the purpose of silencing its critics. Two of the dissenting judges in the Wilkinson case, Douglas and Black, argued "that this case involves nothing more nor less than an attempt by the Un-American Activities Committee to use the contempt power of the House of Representatives as a weapon against those who dare to criticize it." Yet Wilkinson went to prison. It is a major point of criticism of the committee that it attempts to treat its critics as subversives. Its reaction to the San Francisco students who protested against its hearings is a case in point. In the film Operation Abolition the whole country has been given an opportunity to observe that the committee believes that all those who would criticize its work are communist-inspired.

But the principal opposition to the committee is not communist-led or communist-inspired, and an attempt to identify this opposition with communism simply proves the point. The American Civil Liberties Union is not now and has never been on the attorney general's list of subversive organizations, yet its 1960 biennial conference approved a resolution, which its board of directors later adopted, making elimination of H.U.A.C. "a prime order of business." In testimony before the Democratic and Republican platform committees in 1960 the A.C.L.U. maintained that the committee had sapped the strength of the First amendment by engaging in trial-by-publicity rather than allowing security questions to be raised where they belong—in court rooms where in a full trial a judicial judgment could prevail. The New York Times, the Washington Post, the St. Louis Post Dispatch and the San Francisco Chronicle—to name only four newspapers which have called for withdrawal by Congress of the H.U.A.C. mandate—are not communist publications.

As to religious leaders, anyone who would call the following men communist reveals his own ignorance or animus, although each has publicly called for the abolition of H.U.A.C.: Reinhold Niebuhr, Paul Tillich, John A. Mackay, Howard Schomer, Walter Russell Bowie, John C. Bennett, James Luther Adams, Sumner F. Walters, Edgar A. Love, Malcolm E. Peabody, Clarence E. Pickett, John Nevin Sayre, Walter G. Muelder, Harry Emerson Fosdick, John Haynes Holmes, Henry P. Van Dusen, Walter M. Horton and Galen R. Weaver. The list could be extended. It is no answer to say that since communists also seek the recall of the H.U.A.C. as a standing committee, these men are "dupes." These men are not influenced by communists except negatively. On the question of abolishing H.U.A.C. they have made up their minds independently, on sound religious and democratic grounds. The fact they have publicly stated their position, knowing they would be exposed to charges of guilt by association, is proof of their high sense of civic devotion.

The ninth reason why standing committee status should be ended for H.U.A.C. can be stated briefly. In a general sense the committee has served to miseducate the public about the norms of dignity, self-limitation and restraint which it has a right to expect an agency of government to follow when dealing with individuals. H.U.A.C. has convinced many loyal citizens that they had better stay out of the reach of any congressional committee. It has made others think they can use H.U.A.C. to grind their private or organizational, their sectarian or ideological, axes to harass their opponents. Neither of these views is commensurate with the high purpose and the dignity which a committee of the U.S. Congress should cultivate, or the respect it should command.

Finally, the committee should be terminated as a standing committee because it operates at the fringes of constitutional power. Its legality is marginal and so is debatable, as evidenced by the 7-5 vote of the 12 appellate judges who participated in the decision in the Barenblatt case, as well as by 5-4 decisions in the Supreme Court. It would appear that since the committee continues to stand just inside legality, it should exercise forbearance and not seek to push its legal power to the utmost. What is barely legal is not necessarily wise, even in pursuing communists. The trouble the H.U.A.C. has caused the courts seems not to impress the committee's members; it should impress the House of Representatives.

To summarize: The House Committee on Un-American Activities has contributed to the understanding by the American people of the character and purposes of international communism, but this task is now being taken over by other agencies and is being done in a more orderly and responsible way. The committee has stirred into action the law enforcement agencies concerned with domestic communism but has often antagonized the justice department in so doing. It should retire from attempts at enforcement and leave the field to those to whom enforcement is entrusted by law.

The credit due the committee for passage of the Internal Security acts of 1950 and 1954 is being assessed in the courts. Until it is fully tested, nothing further is to be gained by enactment of additional laws of similar character. Also, until the courts speak it is premature to render judgment on whether H.U.A.C. has served this country well or ill by promoting such laws.

H.U.A.C. practices—personalizing its attacks; considering persons who are "identified" as communists, no matter by whom, to be guilty until proved innocent; referring to such persons thereafter as "identified communists"; prejudicing the standing of people so that a fair trial is difficult or impossible; usurping grand jury functions by "indicting" people publicly—all such practices should be abandoned.

In government the committee has helped downgrade federal service by encouraging the normal bureaucratic tendency to mediocrity, by discouraging initiative, courage and imagination. It has hindered recruitment of scientists and capable leaders, has discouraged persons interested in the teaching profession and government service by making these fields special objects of suspicion.

VI

The H.U.A.C. preoccupation with fighting communism in its myopic way has deflected attention from our main task, which is to eliminate communism by changing the social and economic soil in which it grows. The committee encourages those men whom John Nuveen, a Chicago banker and former ambassador, calls "the well meaning Americans who panic at the idea of one communist book in a library, who think that one communist teacher in a university can infect the whole institution, who unconsciously ascribe to communism a potency which it does not deserve and at the same time deprecate the strength and virtue of democracy."

Thomas Jefferson gave advice which sounds strangely radical today but which is still worth considering: "If there be any among us who wish to dissolve this union or to change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it." If today we dread to allow dissenters to stand undisturbed, it is partly because the Committee on Un-American Activities has come so near to putting out the light of reason, has curbed and hampered the operation of intelligence by the promulgation of excessive and unreasonable fears. The House of Representatives should withdraw the mandate of this committee.

LIBERTY'S UNFINISHED BUSINESS

How conflict in many fields underlines the need for progress in civil liberties.

By Alan Reitman

The ferment marking American life in the 1960s underscores a civil liberties maxim that tension generated by historical events creates pressures on the Bill of Rights which can lead to major gains for individual freedom.

Daily headlines describing the conflict of the Negro civil rights revolution is one spectacular evidence. The stream of demonstrations which gives vitality to this drive, not only is advancing significantly the goal of full equality but is also adding new strength to such central First Amendment rights as freedom of speech, association and assembly, and stimulating their use in promoting other social causes as well.

This link between conflict and progress is shown in another major civil liberties area, due process. The public debate now raging over crime-prevention and control points up sharply methods used by police which far too frequently violate such basic constitutional rights as the prohibition against illegal search and seizure, and the need for prompt arraignment and right to counsel. This failure to obey constitutional guarantees has required the Supreme Court to curb many of these practices, reminding us that only by protecting the rights of the most despised are the rights of the innocent equally safeguarded.

Similarly, the dream of the Great Society and one long overdue step being taken to realize that dream, the anti-poverty program, has made the public aware that equal protection of the law hardly has been applied to the poor. And we are witnessing a beginning step to correct this inequality.

We are living in an era where the cry for more personal freedom is being heard and these gains typify the expanding borders of such freedom. But there is never an automatic guarantee that our civil liberties are secure. There is plenty of unfinished business for liberty.

In a period of high employment the Negro labor force is 25 percent unemployed, a figure which parallels the total national unemployment levels of the 1930s Depression, indicative of the need for continued economic growth, job training and education that must be done before Negro workers can reap the benefits of this social revolution. Ironically, government power, always regarded as the arch foe of the civil libertarian, is now recognized as a strong ally and partner in the battle against racial discrimination.

The anti-discrimination campaign, long focused on the plight of the Negro, will have to enlarge its sights to include other Americans who have also suffered unequal treatment because of color.

High on the list are the "first Americans," the American Indians whose constitutional rights are too often infringed because of their special status as members of tribes, which subjects them to tribal judicial procedure that falls far short of due process. Legislation recently introduced in the Senate following the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights' lengthy investigation seeks to place on the tribes the same limitation and restraints that the Constitution imposes on the federal government. Even more necessary is an affirmative recognition of explicit rights, including availability of free legal counsel to indigent Indians.

Such a fundamental area as the right to vote—and to have each ballot count equally—will require renewed vigilance as a new Dirksen amendment and other devices in Congress and state legislatures aim at circumventing the Supreme Court's reapportionment decisions based on the "one man, one vote" principle. The right of franchise needs to be extended even further, to millions of Americans who cannot cast their vote even in Presidential elections because their move from state to state disqualifies them under rigid voting residency laws.

The civil rights revolution's impetus to greater use of First Amendment rights is leading to new challenges in another civil liberties area, academic freedom.

Enlarging on the nation's traditional protection of teachers' freedom to include student rights, this issue assumes a new level of importance with the openly-expressed desire of a student generation to do something to change the society from which it feels alienated. This desire mirrors a change in civil liberties activity, from one of defensive response to government intrusion on personal freedom to affirmation of individual rights.

In addition to protecting intellectual thought in our colleges, a vital source of creative thinking on social problems, exposure to and exercise of these rights can make today's student a fully-participating member of tomorrow's democratic society. With the rapid growth of educational institutions and the thousands of young people enjoying a college education—now and in the future—there is a rare opportunity for developing people who can assume the responsibilities of democratic citizenship because they have experi-

The complexities of today's social issues require more than ever that the public have access to full information about these issues, including how government and non-governmental organizations propose to deal with them. A shrinking world in which mobility and communication are so rapid only heightens the public's need for information and understanding. Yet the problem of government news management, under which sensitive or unpopular information on government operations is hidden, remains unsolved. The continuing disappearance of newspapers, through mergers, threatens to squeeze out the variety of editorial opinion which can stimulate public expression and thinking on social questions.

In television, the newest form of communication, the question is whether the Federal Communications Commission will continue its present course of strengthening diversity on the air. Its recent decision openly criticizing two Jackson, Miss., stations for discriminating against Negroes and civil rights programs and thus failing to observe the FCC's "fairness doctrine" is an important step, even though the commission stopped short of ordering a hearing at which the charges could be openly heard. Congressional and industry pressures on the FCC will certainly be felt, if the air waves are opened to a full spectrum of political and social dissent, especially in election years.

This agency will need strong support to strengthen its authority, without dictating program content, to have publicly-granted franchises present fair and balanced programing. Achievement of true diversity on the air may even require government participation, paralleling the boost given the civil rights campaign by government action. We may have to re-interpret the First Amendment to mean an affirmative obligation on the part of government to keep the public fully informed, for example, through financial aid to educational television.

The recognition that a sub-society of the poor exists, despite America's affluent society, means that new programs must be adopted to assure that economically-deprived Americans receive an equal measure of justice before the law.

Progress has been recorded through the Supreme Court's pace-setting Gideon v. Wainright decision requiring states to provide counsel to all indigent defendants in criminal cases; the Criminal Justice Act of 1964 should improve the quality of legal representation for similar defendants involved in federal cases by providing funds to pay for such necessary services as investigative costs,

No better example of the gap between rich and poor exists than the right to bail, so often an illusion for the latter, but experiments in 40 American cities are showing how the community can be guaranteed the appearance of defendants at trial without taxing meager family resources; legislation to liberalize federal bail requirements is now before the Congress.

Yet the battle to assure victims of poverty due process and equal treatment is far from over. Provisions for legal services in the Office of Economic Opportunity's anti-poverty campaigns have stirred a hornet's nest in the legal profession because of the OEO requirement that the poor themselves play a participating role in any program that affects them. Lawyers' complaints that only professionals can truly deal with legal problems affecting the poor does not offset the correctness of the OEO policy. It merely sharpens the issue with which bar associations, legal aid groups, and others concerned must grapple. The maze of ordinances and laws that entrap persons challenging rat-infested housing and other slum conditions requires expert and dedicated legal representation.

In a related social welfare field, the mentally ill, there is growing recognition that vital civil liberties issues are at stake. Persons committed to institutions without an adequate opportunity to challenge the decision, criminal defendants sent to mental hospitals for indefinite periods—without ever facing trial—and lack of fair hearings in release of the mentally ill raise first-rank due process problems.

The specter of automation is no longer a figment of science-fiction imagination but a reality, and a machine-run society can deeply invade civil liberties. Hearings before the Senate Constitutional Rights and Administrative Practice and Procedure Subcommittees have described dramatically the invasion of privacy which new technology can produce. Such devices as lie detectors, wiretapping and other forms of electronic surveillance infringe the spirit and letter of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against illegal search-seizure.

The agenda of civil liberties unfinished business does not end with the pressures that life in the 1960s creates. Basic problems that always confront the civil libertarian remain, with some new wrinkles. Censorship has been set back by Supreme Court decisions shackling the pre-censorship power of official film review boards.

Other battles must still be fought, such as the proposed federal commission to determine "noxious and obscene" material, a term which courts and juries differ on widely across the country; well-motivated efforts of private pressure groups, abetted by zealous prosecutors and police who extra-legally coerce news dealers from carrying objectionable books and magazines; legislation authorizing state agencies to classify films as suitable for showing to youth and adult audiences. Wherever the seed of censorship is planted it can sprout in other places to limit freedom of expression.

Reminders of the 1950s, that black period of civil liberties history when loose charges and smears of Communism frightened people into stultifying conformity, are still entrenched. Institutionalized McCarthyism, taking the form of loyalty oaths, continuation of the House Un-American Activities Committee, security hearings without proper due process safeguards, rigid controls over passports and the right to travel, remains a major challenge. The fact that so many of these abuses are deeply imbedded in our governmental structure, national, state and local, and rarely reach the point of headline attention, only increases the difficulty of extracting them.

The perennial conflict goes on between law-enforcement agencies charged with gigantic responsibility in preserving public safety in today's period of great social unrest, and those who value constitutional guarantees as the mark of the democratic, civilized society. Supreme Court decisions have strengthened such fundamental rights as the right to counsel—which must be timely provided if it is to be effective, the privilege against self-incrimination, prohibitions against improper searches and use of force to obtain confessions, arousing deep resentment in police circles and among the public. "Handcuffing our police" is the accusation hurled at the high court.

An intensive educational drive is needed to explain that the maintenance of constitutional rights is not a threat to law enforcement but an ally. A society which by mistreatment disrespects the dignity of man which these rights represent, breeds disrespect for the law itself. When police and prosecutors—the symbols of law—use improper methods to win convictions, they are encouraging the citizen to act in the same way.

As urban tension increases, additional strains will be placed on the police. To instill greater confidence in the community they ought not, as they presently do, turn a deaf ear to the demand for independent review boards, composed of outstanding citizens, which can impartially review charges of police malpractices. The review board mechanism can provide an outlet for the deep-felt grievances of minority groups and also serve as an unbiased forum where the policeman himself can be heard.

Is all of liberty's unfinished business the responsibility only of the professional civil liberties worker and the social reformer? Not at all. The average citizen has a vital stake in preserving and extending democratic liberties, for they are an integral part of the system under which he and his family live.

If he truly believes in democracy and wants to see it grow he should strike to accelerate achievement of these rights. This can be done first by supporting organizations directly working in the field. Secondly, by learning more about these rights and their relationship to contemporary events.

Thirdly, to keep in mind the indivisibility of all rights, that by protecting the freedom of speech, due process or equal treatment of the non-conformist or unpopular person or group, we really are binding tighter the fabric of liberty which protects everyone else's freedom. And finally, to remember that civil liberties are only as good as they are used, that they atrophy unless exercised. Liberty belongs to all of us and should be used by everyone.

Alan Reitman, associate director of the American Civil Liberties Union, has been active in the civil liberties movement for many years. He was also involved in labor's political action efforts in the 1940s.

the strategy of

The important differences between protest and civil disobedience.

By William L. Taylor

Civil disobedience is a term that has been bandied about a good deal in connection with protests against racial injustice. It is obvious that not everyone who uses the phrase means the same thing. Segregationists tend to use 'civil disobedience' as a catch-all phrase to cover any protest against the practice of racial dicrimination. But civil rights advocates may disagree even among themselves about what they mean when they talk about 'civil disobedience.'

One aspect of civil disobedience is a willingness to accept the penalty.

This willingness to accept the penalty is based upon a principle crucial to the philosophy of civil disobedience—that the violation of unjust laws is justified by the fact that these laws themselves violate a higher law, which may be called moral law, natural law or divine law, depending on the point of view of the interpreter.

But not every violation of law is an act of civil disobedience.

If a violation is committed under a claim of legal right with the intention of seeking redress in the courts, it can hardly be termed civil disobedience. In fact, under our judicial system, it is frequently necessary to violate the law in order to vindicate one's legal rights.

By this test, sit-ins in places of public accommodation, the pioneer technique of the contemporary protest movement, were not acts of civil disobedience. The great majority of the sit-inners did not plead guilty; they acted under a claim of legal right, or at least, of immunity from prosecution for their acts.

Similarly, it would be grossly inaccurate to characterize many of the street demonstrations and marches to protest discrimination that have taken place as acts of civil disobedience. For the most part these protests have been marked by restraint; they have been peaceful and orderly.

protest

The protestors, far from violating any law, have been exercising their rights of free speech, free assembly and freedom to petition for a redress of grievances, all protected by the Constitution.

There have been, however, random activities by civil rights groups which have not been conducted under any claim of legal right or immunity.

When demonstrators physically block the access of trucks to a New York construction project in protest against the discriminatory practices of management and unions; when they rearrange the shelves of a California supermarket in protest against employment policies; when they sit down on the Triborough Bridge during rush hour—it is generally acknowledged that they are acting in defiance of admittedly valid laws and not pursuant to any constitutional right or immunity. Are these then acts of civil disobedience?

Reverend Martin Luther King says that civil disobedience is the violation of unjust laws—laws which are "out of harmony with the moral law of the universe." On the other hand, he says, the devotee of nonviolent social action feels a "moral responsibility to obey just laws."

Gandhi defines civil disobedience more broadly to encompass not only a refusal to obey bad laws, but also a violation of laws which work no hardship where the breach "does not involve moral turpitude and is undertaken as a symbol of revolt against the State." But in Gandhi's view, such resistance is justified only in a corrupt or tyrannical state.

What then is civil disobedience? Is it possible to have true civil disobedience in a society in which unjust racial laws are almost always unconstitutional also?

Two situations may warrant closer examination. The first is the technique of school "boycotts" in the North to protect against de facto segregation and second-class education.

The theory of the boycotts must be that while compulsory attendance laws are valid, it is unjust to use them to compel children to attend schools in which they receive unequal and inferior education. . . . But in practice, most school "boycotts" have not really been boycotts at all, but one-day stay-outs, designed to protest substandard educational conditions in a dramatic way.

Thus, whatever one may think of their wisdom in particular circumstances, these "boycotts" have been more closely akin to exercises of free speech and assembly than to acts of civil disobedience.

The second situation involves the violation of court injunctions in the South. Increasingly, Southern officials have resorted to local courts to obtain orders prohibiting all forms of protest and demonstration, including those clearly protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution. It is clear that these injunctions violate the Constitution and that ultimately they will be dissolved in the courts of legal appeal.

The issue is whether protestors have a legal obligation to obey these injunctions until they are overturned. There are conflicting theories in American law on this question.

. . . There is no escaping the fact that a philosophy of disobedience implies that the rule of law is bankrupt, and that each man should be the judge of his own case.

To say this in no way suggests that man must resign his conscience or forfeit his right to revolution against a despotic government. It merely says there are principles of forbearance that qualify Thoreau's observation that "the only obligation which I have a right to assume is to do at any time what I think is right" and that he was seriously wrong in saying that "Law never made man a whit more just". . . .

Now, my postscript. During the past year, we have witnessed the enactment of sweeping civil rights legislation, the election by an overwhelming margin of a President committed to securing civil rights through law over a candidate who opposed the 1964 legislation, and the events which gave rise to the strong voting bill recently enacted. At once, these dramatic events have vindicated the techniques of the protest movement and rendered some of them obsolete.

Many of the overt rules and practices of discrimination are being swept away. The nation, North and South, is facing the more intransigent problems of jobs, education and housing.

In these areas, poverty, deprivation and discrimination combine to present social problems which do not yield readily to dramatic protest and demonstrations. In these areas despair and frustration have given rise to lawless activity, to demonstrations which promote social disorder and to riots.

So, finally, by distinguishing among protests which are legally protected—those which may be termed civil disobedience and those which are simply lawless—we may help to define better the obligation of government.

If civil disobedience in a Ghandian sense ever comes to the United States, it will be a protest not against a national government so strong and tyrannical that it enforces unjust laws, but so weak that it is unable to enforce its just laws.

It may well be that one contribution those who work directly with the poor and the victims of discrimination can make is not to stifle protest, but to stimulate it and help channel it to constructive ends. For the issue before all of us is whether the conditions for equal justice can be established by all the legitimate techniques available to a free people, rather than by those which are symbols only of despair, revolt or lawlessness.

THE VANISHING RIGHT OF PRIVACY

Ever since man first learned to communicate with his fellows, somebody not included in the conversation has been trying to listen in.

The difference today is that the motive for eavesdropping has changed from idle curiosity to an all-consuming desire to know everything you do or even think. And the stakes are about as high as you can go. On the line are your personal dignity, your good name and reputation, your job.

Big business, big government and big education are all in on the act.

Do you work for a living? Own an insurance policy? Carry a credit card? The file on you is growing.

Ever use the telephone? Members of your own family or your employer may be listening to every word you say by means of a completely harmless-looking item called a telephone extension. It is without question the most widely used eavesdropping device in the world.

Beyond that, the bugging business is so brisk that it now honeycombs the nation's communications network. A professional estimate made

Your privacy is getting less private all the time in the electronic era.

By Lee White

in May 1965, for example, reveals that the city of Miami, Fla., has as many as 10,000 telephones tapped at any one time.

But even wiretapping—universal as it has become since the early 1940s—accounts for only a portion of the surveillance in commerce, in government, in everyday life that is infiltrating and destroying privacy from the cradle to the grave.

The super-snoopers are collecting information about millions of private citizens by the use of a wide variety of sophisticated techniques, including personnel questionnaires, polygraphs (the so-called lie detectors), hidden microphones no bigger than a sorority pin, tape recorders that look like a pack of cigarettes, two-way mirrors, peep-holes in the most unexpected places, cameras and spy-glasses that see as well in the dark as in broad daylight, the mail watch, penetration of secret places by laser beam, computers—and dozen of others.

All of this may make privacy totally obsolete in our own lifetime.

When George Orwell's "1984," gave us a new and frightening prediction of things to come, just four years after World War II ended, the public did take notice. "Big Brother Is Watching You" kicked up such a storm of discussion that any prognosticator could see it would have a profound effect on at least one full generation of Americans.

Yet the fact is that today, when "somebody" really is watching most of the time, the public seems unaware of or indifferent to what is happening.

The arrest by computer of a housewife in New York who failed to pay up after getting a ticket for passing a red light, got the circus treatment in the tabloids, but at least one sober editorial noted the resemblance to Orwell's nightmare.

And somewhere, already, they may be watching Big Brother.

The situation does have its amusing side—for example, the Internal Revenue Agent who couldn't answer satisfactorily a question about his use of the super-snooperscope: Was he watching the suspect on the roof of that house, or the nude sunbathing of the suspect's wife? But it's really not funny.

Vance Packard made a valiant effort to arouse public indignation with his book, "The Naked Society," published just a year ago.

Packard's picture of a reasonably successful family in a typical city of the Land of Liberty, 1964, showed that by telescoping time just a bit, these examples of surveillance could all be happening simultaneously:

While Mom is trying on a new dress in a department store, her every move is being watched via closed-circuit television.

Dad, a junior executive at the company where he works, is being watched by an undercover agent who seems to be just another employee but is in reality a private detective; the company wants to keep tabs on its key subordinates. At the same time, Dad's bank account is being investigated by an insurance company because Dad recently applied for an insurance policy on his personal property.

Meanwhile, young John is taking a lie detector test as part of applying for a job as a salesman.

Photos: John Burwell

Some of the snooping devices in all-too common use, complete with an infra-red spy glass and various forms of concealed microphones

This is supposed to probe his honesty, his possibly dangerous habits, and his manliness. And at still another location, John's college professors are being interrogated about the boy's political opinions. All of this will go into a lifetime record.

Now here is a direct quote from the book:

"Daughter Mary, sweet girl, is still only a sophomore in high school. She is in the classroom struggling with a 250-item questionnaire. It asks her to reveal whether her parents seem to quarrel a lot, whether they have ever talked to her about sex, and whether she is worried about menstrual disorders. If Mary's parents happen to hear about this probing, they would be denied any information as to her various responses and how they were scored."

This vivid dramatization of a growing trend in American society faded almost at once into the dark stacks of the public library.

Hardly anybody noticed it except a few of the "sick" comics who milked it for gags. And even the gags never got off the ground.

Obviously, the public was not up in arms about the loss of its privacy. As a matter of fact, it would be easy to build a case for the existence of a new breed of citizens who actually enjoy life in the goldfish bowl.

Among those who make up this new breed might be mentioned the teenagers who swoon over the Beatles (in front of the camera), ladies who identify with the "housewives" in TV commercials for soap, etc., voluntary participants in the "Candid Camera" television program, and all of those who have been corrupted by the presence of wiretap and eavesdropping equipment installed for "legitimate" purposes.

Now, it is over the use of the word "legitimate" that the real dialogue has begun.

As a basic part of its current investigation of invasions of the privacy of individuals by government agencies, Senator Edward V. Long's Judi-

What the well-equipped snooper uses for listening to other people's conversations ciary subcommittee is seeking to define, according to the New York Times, "the admittedly thin line that might separate legitimate law enforcement activities from unconstitutional snooping."

There are strong differences of opinion on the subject.

Law enforcement officers point to court action upholding convictions where mail surveillance provided vitally-needed leads to criminal activity including fraud, espionage, sabotage, organized gambling, racketeering and smuggling of drugs.

Specific examples: the Frank Costello income tax case, the capture in Mexico of a rapist-murderer, health insurance frauds that victimize elderly persons.

On the other hand, Judge Archie Dawson of New York termed the mail watch reported on Roy Cohn as "shocking," and the American Civil Liberties Union joined in the uproar caused by the revelation at Cohn's recent trial.

Defending wiretap for "selected targets" in the war on crime, Chicago Superintendent of Police W. W. Wilson said that the higher-ups in the Cosa Nostra, the syndicate, "or whatever name you choose to call it," are, under our present law, given complete immunity in their oral and telephonic communications.

Thus the only persons who are charged with crimes are the minor figures in the rackets, according to Wilson: "the lowly policy runner, the prostitute, or the narcotics pusher, all of whom are at the bottom of the ladder."

He points out that wiretapping is not unconstitutional. Even if it were, he maintains, "the Constitution does not make any of our rights absolute. Our homes are our castles but they are not immune against search and seizure—only against unreasonable search and seizure. And so it should be with our telephone communications."

Writing in the Christian Science Monitor, Superintendent Wilson posed a clear choice:

1) Put court-authorized wiretapping on the side of the prosecution, or

2) Recognize organized crime as a fact of life in the United States "for which society must continue to pay a frightful cost in life and property and ever-mounting insurance rates."

Answering for those who want more, not less privacy, Senator Long said, "Our country was not founded that its citizens might be spied upon at the whim of a government bureaucrat.

"Our Constitution was not framed by men who doubted the value of personal liberty.

"Our vast continent was not tamed and settled by persons who wanted to weigh every word of their every conversation against the possibility of its being overheard by official ears."

Feeling that the gain to be won by the legalization of wiretapping would never offset the loss of personal liberty, the Missouri Democrat concluded:

"Wiretapping for domestic law enforcement should be prohibited."

Organized labor is firmly committed to a policy of outlawing telephone tapping—except in matters of national security—and on a wider front is waging a determined battle against snooping on workers by employers in the personnel office, in the plant, and off the job.

So far the most effective means of forcing management to draw back on the use of peepholes and hidden cameras has been instant retaliation in the press and solid membership resistance to such practices, when discovered.

When members of Communications Workers of America found a hidden camera in the men's room of a telephone company building in New York, they promptly filed a grievance—and also called the New York Times. Result: no more hidden cameras.

In Baltimore, according to UAW Solidarity, management of the Chevrolet plant installed a closed-circuit TV surveillance system, with cameras all over the plant.

"They installed the cameras," UAW Vice President Leonard Woodcock recalled, "but the union chairman called up the UAW GM Department and said, 'What are we going to do about it?' We at the international said, 'Are your people prepared to fight?' He said, 'Yes, they are.'

"We said, 'Call a membership meeting and then go in and tell management—and we will tell Chevrolet here—that when the cameras go on, the plant goes down.' At this moment the cameras have not gone on."

The American Newspaper Guild found that Hearst management on San Francisco papers was monitoring telephone calls made by classified advertising employees. Admitting the charge but arguing that monitoring was "a constructive tool" of supervision, management refused to stop the practice. This and other developments in California have brought about one of the most heartening developments in the unions' concerted attack on spying and snooping of all kinds.

On July 27, 1965, the Public Utilities Commission of the State of California ruled that management could no longer listen in on monitoring, service observing and training equipment, without notifying those under observation of that fact.

This means that telephone company supervisors, classified newspaper sales supervisors, and all other management persons who use monitoring equipment, must "beep" at regular intervals or "by clearly, prominently and permanently marking each telephone instrument" indicate it may be monitored.

To all who have had dealings with supervision in labor-management affairs, the California Commission's instructions—to mark each instrument not only clearly, but clearly and prominently, as well as permanently—will remain a classic of its genre.

Sen. Edward V. Long (D. Mo.) examines a wristwatch microphone device

In another world altogether, the world of the supermarket where a good deal of the worker's income is spent, the peeping-tom techniques are eroding what's left of our average citizen's privacy.

"Heaven knows, the American consumer has for years been the object of an unrelenting scrutiny that measures everything from his salary to his saliva, from his pulse to his purse, from his libido to his liver," complained Marya Mannes.

"Now they've got a secret eye camera that checks up on your pupil dilations. A fellow looks at a package of Fig Newtons, say, and if he likes Fig Newtons, his pupils dilate, and if he doesn't, they contract."

It would seem that there is no place left to hide.

And if the citizen's right of privacy is, as Louis D. Brandeis said, the most comprehensive of rights as well as "the right most valued by civilized man," there is much to be done to protect it.

That is, by those of us who don't mind being overheard—and recorded—in defense of the First, Second, Fourth, Fifth and Ninth Amendments to the Constitution.

HUAC AN OUTMODED INSTITUTION

A Congressman's look at the record of the House UnAmerican Activities Committee.

By Rep. Don Edwards

One wonders what the reaction would be if Britain were to adopt a "Committee on Un-British Activities." It would seem a most un-British thing to do, and certainly amusing.

Our own Committee on Un-American Activities also has its amusing aspects, and too many of us have brushed it aside as a curious eruption on the tough hide of our democracy—one that will go away in good time just as the Palmer Raids subsided eventually and Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin got his come-uppance when he took on the U.S. Army. It is easy to ignore the inherent danger to our constitutional liberties and sense of fair play as long as the targets are Communists, "radical" professors and students, and other disruptive members of our society. The fact is that the rights and liberties of all Americans are bound to the rights and liberties of each American, no matter how misguided or obnoxious his beliefs, associations, and preachments may be.

Although Congressmen enjoy a good joke occasionally, there are objections to the House Un-American Activities Committee which are so fundamental and constitutional that I believe it is the duty of Congress to set its own house in order and not wait for the Supreme Court to save us from our follies.

HUAC was created as a standing committee by a very close vote in 1945. At that time, Majority Leader John McCormack said: "If this amend-begun and held at the City of New-York, on Wednesday the fourth of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty nine

Congress of the United States

THE Conventions of a number of the States, having at the time of their adopting the Constitution, expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added: And as extending the ground of public confidence in the Government will best secure the beneficent ends of its institution

RESOLVED, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two thirds of both Houses concurring, that the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, all or any of which articles, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, to be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the said Constitution, viz.

ARTICLES in addition to, and amendment of, the Constitution of the United States of America, proposed by the Congress, and ratified by the Legislatures of the several States, pursuant to the fifth article of the original Constitution.

Article the first. After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution, there shall be one Representative for every thirty thousand, until the number shall amount to one hundred, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress, that there shall be not less than one hundred Representatives, nor less than one Representative for every forty thousand persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to two hundred, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress, that there shall be not less than two hundred Representatives, nor more than one Representative for every fifty thousand persons.

Article the second. No law, varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives, shall take effect, until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

Article the third. Congress shall make no law, respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Article the fourth. A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed.

Article the fifth. No soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Article the sixth. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Article the seventh. Excess bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. No person shall be subject to be twice tried for the same offence. Nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. Nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Article the eighth. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

Article the ninth. In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of common law.

Article the tenth. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Article the eleventh. The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people of the United States.

Article the twelfth. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

ATTEST.

Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

John Adams, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

John Beckley, Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Sam. A. Otis, Secretary of the Senate.

Article the third..... Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances ment is adopted, as far as I know, it will be the first time in history of this body that a committee of this kind was ever established as a permanent or standing committee." Since then there has never been a serious threat to the existence of the committee from the House of Representatives itself.

HUAC's legislative score, during its 20 years of life, is considerably less impressive. To date, not a single conviction under the legislation it formulated has been upheld in the Supreme Court.

The Committee spends over $300,000 a year running "show-off" hearings and keeping up voluminous files of unverified information. These files have been used, according to The New York Times, by anti-Negro agencies in Alabama. The director of the House Un-American Activities Committee, Francis J. McNamara, has stated that the staff replied to 3,800 requests for information from Congressmen in 1962 alone. On July 29, 1963, the Congressional Record contained 30 pages of material inserted by a Member of Congress from the committee's files. The material purported to prove that the NAACP was subversive. It suggests that the NAACP is infiltrated with Communists. Among the NAACP leaders whose reputations for loyalty to this country were besmirched are such distinguished Americans as A. Philip Randolph, Dr. Robert C. Weaver, Dr. Ralph Bunche, Solicitor-General Thurgood Marshall and Clarence M. Mitchell.

HUAC's basic mandate from the Congress is to investigate "subversive and un-American propaganda," in itself an infringement on the First Amendment. But what it actually does, besides building files from dubious sources, is to investigate people, not propaganda, for the purpose of exposing them to the general public and the press, as subversive. The press is often informed in advance who has been subpoenaed, a violation of committee rules. At HUAC hearings, the ordinary protections one has in a court of law are all but absent.

Punishment of an American citizen by bringing him before a Congressional committee "for the purpose of exposure" is a legislative trial and is unconstitutional, under Section 9 of Article I, which prohibits bills of attainder. A bill of attainder is, in effect, a judgment of guilt and punishment by a legislative body rather than in a court of law.

Yet we permit HUAC to punish citizen after citizen for prior actions, opinions and associations which are not crimes, but which the committee considers distasteful. Witnesses are called and subjected to publicity and exposure, in effect convicted by a legislative committee of associations or ideas which are not crimes but which the committee feels are punishable regardless. Loss of reputation and job follow as news of the legislative trial is spread on the front pages of the newspapers.

I do not want to leave the impression that it is hopeless to expect the House of Representatives to act regarding the committee, or that we must wait for the Supreme Court to proceed case by case to correct the abuses of this arm of the Congress. More and more, our highly respected newspapers, church organizations, and other groups are calling upon the Congress to put an end to HUAC.

I suspect, too, that the excesses of the Radical Right in vilification of such people as Chief Justice Earl Warren and Dwight Eisenhower have awakened to their responsibilities as citizens those who had been silent so long as the super-patriots were denouncing egg-heads and liberals as un-American and willing tools of the Kremlin.

Unfortunately, some critics of the committee took comfort in the announcement that HUAC would investigate the Ku Klux Klan. They may hope that HUAC will now go after the Radical Right with the vigor it has heretofore reserved for causes on the left. It is ironic that if there is one institution that is peculiarly "American," it is the Klan. We can't blame the Klan on the Soviet Union.

The point is that acts by Klansmen—or Communists, or anyone else—which threaten the rights and lives of other American citizens, should be punished. But their right to speak openly their misguided, and in some instances loathsome views, cannot be restricted without imperiling the liberties of us all. Investigation by the House Un-American Activities Committee, or any other committee, of the KKK is not what is needed. What is needed is the enforcement of the law against members of the Klan or any other group who deprive people of their civil rights by threats, intimidation, bombing, and murder. New federal laws are needed to protect the civil rights guaranteed in the Act of 1964 and in the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Rep. Don Edwards (D, Calif.)

The proper committee to draft this legislation is the Committee on the Judiciary where both of these historical acts were drafted. That committee, composed of 35 lawyers, has never gone about the country garnering headlines by "sensational exposés" of people the FBI knew about all the time.

I am convinced that a substantial majority in the House of Representatives is opposed to the existence of the House Un-American Activities Committee and would welcome the transfer to the Committee on the Judiciary of all matters affecting the internal security of our country.

What the House of Representatives needs in order to act is a more vocal support from those back home. We owe it to ourselves and to our heritage to do better by the First Amendment.

The 89th Congress made important gains in changing rules which allowed a handful of powerful men to bottle up needed legislation year after year. I hope that the 90th Congress on opening day will remove another outmoded institution which demeans and belittles the Congress, by abolishing HUAC.

Don Edwards is the Democratic Representative from the Ninth District of California. He is national chairman of Americans for Democratic Action.

Bill's Provisions

The Senate's bill would provide coverage for hospital and nursing-home care, home nursing visits and outpatient diagnostic services for persons 65 and over. It also would give a $7 monthly raise to persons on Social Security rolls. The $4.2 billion cost of the proposed benefits would be financed by an increase in the Social Security tax from 7.25 per cent (on a wage base of $4,800) to 10.4 per cent (on a wage base of $5,600)—half to be paid by the employe, half by the employer.

Administration leaders conceded there was little chance the House would approve the amended version in its entirety but they hoped bargaining would lead to a compromise retaining some medicare features. The main opposition comes from a coalition of conservative Republicans and Southern Democrats, with Representative Wilbur D. Mills, Democrat of Arkansas, the key man. Mr. Mills, who firmly opposes Social Security financing of medical care, is chairman of the Ways and Means Committee which originated the House bill and his endorsement is vital for House approval.

Whatever the bill's fate, it is likely to be a major issue in the Presidential campaign. President Johnson made that plain when he hailed the Senate's vote on medicare as a victory "for all Americans." Senator Goldwater, on the other hand, in voting against the proposal, called it a "most significant step" toward making Social Security a relief and charity organization.

The Social Security bill was the most important of several taken up by Congress last week in its drive to wind up the session so members can hit the campaign trail. Among other actions was House approval of the $6.4 billion, three-year extension of the Food for Peace program.

Major bills still pending, besides Social Security, are a rider to the foreign aid bill that would delay further reapportionment of state legislatures and a proposal for aid to the depressed Appalachia region.

Toward Medicare?

The advance of medical science has brought a general lengthening of the life span. Today there are 18 million Americans over 65 years of age, constituting nearly 10 per cent of the population with the percentage rising yearly. A major problem for those in this age group is that their medical expenses rise at the very time their income declines. Often this creates severe financial hardship for them or for younger relatives who contribute toward their support.

Over the last 15 years many attempts have been made in both houses of Congress to enact proposals that would put medical care for the aged on some sort of systematic national basis. The Kennedy and Johnson Administrations have pressed the matter. But all such proposals have been blocked by those who contend that a Government-sponsored "medicare" program would be a step toward socialized medicine.

Last week, when Congress reconvened after a 10-day recess for the Democratic National Convention, the Senate broke the logjam. On Wednesday it voted 49 to 44 to provide health insurance for the aged under Social Security. The proposal was included in a bill which also called for a boost in Social Security cash benefits. The Senate approved the over-all bill Thursday 60 to 28 and sent it back to the House where it faced a tough fight. The Senate's bill was an amended version of one passed by the House July 29—without medicare.

Majority in Profession Favor Coverage, Physician Says

TO THE EDITOR:

Extension of Social Security coverage to self-employed physicians, included in the omnibus Social Security bill approved by the House Ways and Means Committee and passed by a vote of 388 to 8 by the House of Representatives, was knocked out of the bill by the Senate Finance Committee and was not restored by the Senate, despite vigorous efforts by Senators Dodd, Ribicoff, Clark and others.

Our only chance to obtain this insurance protection, which now covers every group except physicians, lies with the Conference Committee which will meet the week of Sept. 14 to iron out differences between the House and Senate versions.

Indisputable evidence that the majority of this country's physicians want to be included under Social Security lies in official polls conducted by state medical societies and in surveys by the Honest Ballot Association. These reveal that Social Security coverage is favored by a substantial majority of doctors in nineteen states and is opposed in only eight states. More than 60 per cent of the physicians in private practice in this country practice in the nineteen states which registered a majority sentiment.

No Evidence From A.M.A.

The House of Delegates of the American Medical Association does not represent the viewpoint of the nation's physicians on this issue. The A.M.A. has never offered evidence to substantiate its repeated assertion that physicians do not want Social Security. Repeated requests by many state medical societies for a national poll on this issue have been turned down year after year by the A.M.A.

Since it is clear that the majority of physicians want coverage, there is no reason why we should be the only self-employed professional group to be excluded. Even in the medical profession, approximately 35 per cent of our colleagues are covered by virtue of employment in group practice, in the armed forces, or as salaried employes.

Widows and orphans of doctors do not receive the monthly Social Security checks which other widows and orphans receive. If forced to give up practice because of illness, physicians find themselves and their families faced by serious financial need. And many doctors are unable, for financial reasons, to retire when they want to.

Aid to Needy

Contrary to myth, doctors are subject to the ills, accidents and misfortunes that befall other mortals. We have received scores of letters from physicians in both rural and urban communities documenting these facts. In addition every state medical society and many of the larger county medical societies maintain aid associations whose sole function is to afford financial help to needy physicians and their families.

When the doctor falls on hard times, he does not want to accept charity, from his medical society or from other sources. He wants to enjoy as a right, as do all other Americans, the protection and benefits of insurance under the Social Security system.

ECONOMICS

Can the doctor do better?

He's overworked, and there aren't enough of him. Economists are wondering if his profession is organized most efficiently to meet rising demand for health care

The affluent U. S. is getting some of the best medical care in the world—and well it should.

The nation's annual health bill will come this year to more than $35-billion—almost 6% of gross national product. And in 1963 private patients and their insurance companies spent $5.9-billion on doctors' bills alone—nearly 8% more than in 1962, a not untypical rise for this sector.

The money went to some 180,000 private practitioners, who—with 40,000 salaried doctors, another 40,000 interns and residents—constitute a medical corps that is at least as good as any in the world.

For years, economists considered health outside their mainstream of interest. But with the growing investment in health—and the growing concern with welfare problems generally—they have begun in recent years to take a fresh look at what the country is getting for its medical dollar. Their research is backed by the Ford Foundation, the federal government, and universities.

Hard job. The task is not a simple one for economists. They often come to the field with biases that are difficult to shed. Medicine is so complex institutionally that economic propositions used to explain other markets sometimes don't work.

Most economists studying the subject so far have been asking one basic question—whether U. S. medicine is doing as good a job as it could. Among their reasons for asking:

- People are living longer now, yet life expectancy in the U. S. still runs three or four years behind that of several European nations (chart, above).
- Infant mortality rates in the U. S. are higher than in 10 other countries—Sweden, Denmark, the Netherlands among them—and are improving more slowly than in any of them.
- Some minority groups fare poorly. For U. S. Negroes in certain areas, the chance of surviving birth is only half as good as it is for whites in families of roughly the same incomes and education.

Economists agree there can be no simple explanation of why the U. S. lags behind less wealthy nations in some of these vital statistics. But they feel it is important to try to find out why the U. S. isn't using its capacity and its affluence to best advantage.

I. The doctor shortage

The first point always brought up is the nation's shortage of doctors.

Unlike most economic markets, which react to shortages by pushing prices up and thus encouraging new suppliers to enter the field, the health care market reacts slowly and uncertainly. The new supplies in this case must come from medical schools, and these aren't expanding very fast.

Actually, the number of doctors per capita has held steady at about 136 M. D.'s per 100,000 persons for more than 20 years. But the demands on these doctors have multiplied. For example, patients in the 1930s saw the doctor 2½ times a year; now they go at least twice as often.

Money going to physicians has rocketed—from 1940 to 1963, consumer spending on private practitioners rose 206% in constant dollars. But the number of practicing M. D.'s in this period rose only about 49% (chart, above).

The result has been poorer service: crowded waiting rooms, less time spent by the doctor on each patient, and the gradual disappearance of house visits, night calls, free telephone consultations, and office chats.

Getting worse. The outlook is for even greater pressure on the medical profession. Seymour E. Harris, Harvard professor emeritus who now heads the economics department at the San Diego campus of the University of California, explores this prospect in a recent book, The Economics of American Medicine.

People have more money, more insurance, and more medical knowledge, Harris says. They are less isolated in rural living. People are living longer and need increased medical attention.

Heavier work load. To the dismay of their wives and children, doctors have met the increased demand by working themselves harder. According to Medical Economics magazine, their work week is stretched to 58 hours, on the average; their patient loads have more than doubled from 50 visits per week in 1930 to 123 visits now for each doctor.

Economists aren't sure that this sort of productivity gain produces better health. Some countries with fewer doctors per capita than the U. S., such as Sweden with 92 doctors per 100,000 persons and the Netherlands with 111, have better records than the U. S. on infant mortality and life expectancy.

Of course, a nation's health is not entirely the doctor's doing. The Swedes and the Dutch may be healthier for other reasons. Populations of many smaller countries are more homogeneous, economically and ethnically, says Grant M. Osborn, director of the American Medical Assn.'s Dept. of Medical Finance & Economic Research.

But many economists think the U. S. ought to be able to squeeze more health value out of its doctors.

More efficiency. Harris suggests that group practice programs such as the Kaiser Foundation Health Plans or New York's Health Insurance Plan would help raise the doctor's productivity without sacrifice of quality. The AMA, which at first opposed group plans, is conducting a new study of group practice with, according to Osborn, "a completely open mind."

Victor R. Fuchs, director of a study of productivity in the service sector of the economy for the National Bureau of Economic Research, suggests "a better matching of skills and needs" might help. In some countries, he points out, specialists' talents are carefully rationed out. In the Netherlands, for example, 70% of babies are delivered in the home, mostly by midwives who have only three years of hospital training.

In the U. S., money rather than need usually calls the doctor into action. The most difficult delivery may be performed by a general practitioner without enough skilled assistance in an ill-equipped Southern Negro hospital while a highly skilled specialist concerns himself with routine deliveries for high fees in a top-notch New York maternity hospital, with only a brief tour of clinic duty.

AMA economist Osborn admits that talents may be misapplied. But, he asks, "What other profession manages to work at top efficiency all the time? That's one of the prices of freedom." He's convinced that this freedom produces better medical care than "some sort of omniscient planner who would hurt initiative by trying to match needs and skills for all doctors and patients."

II. Lopsided distribution

The doctor scarcity, say economists, is intensified by the exodus of 40,000 physicians from private practice. Of course, these doctors, in universities, hospitals, laboratories, corporations, and public health agencies, contribute to American well-being. But they don't help the private patient in today's crowded waiting room.

In 1930, about 7% of all doctors were outside private practice; now about 15% are, and economists think the trend will intensify tice by the abundance of medical research programs supported by the federal government. Others shy away from the ordeal of building up a private practice and of investing heavily in equipment. Some find their consciences pain them in making a living from the misfortunes of other people.

Harris says also that the modern doctor's Cadillac image frightens some idealists into lower-paid but secure salaried posts.

Geography. Even the doctors who stay in private practice don't always go where they are most needed. Some states, such as New York and Massachusetts, have about 180 doctors per 100,000 persons; others, such as Mississippi and South Dakota, have only about 70.

The AMA, says Osborn, encourages doctors to go where they are most needed. But, he adds, "It's up to the community to make an attractive offer so the doctor will come."

Specialists in particular are concentrated in big cities, where they have enough interesting cases to keep their skills from rusting and where they are stimulated by contact with others in their field.

Harris thinks federal funds distributed under the Hill-Burton Act, aiding local hospital construction, may bring more specialists to rural areas if the new hospitals attract enough patients to use their talents. If not, rural areas will have to continue relying on the local general practitioner, the busiest doctor in the country. He works longer hours, sees more patients, and has a faster-growing income than any specialist.

Vanishing species. GPs are spread fairly evenly in city and country, but there are nowhere near enough to go around. And the supply is dwindling in this age of specialization. In 1931, there were 97 GPs per 100,000 persons; now, only 40. Johns Hopkins University economist Herbert E. Klarman thinks they may disappear entirely.

"You can tell med students anything you want about general practice and its virtues," Klarman says, "but they still don't want to go into it." Klarman's book, The Economics of Health, commissioned by the Ford Foundation, will be out this year.

He doesn't think the internist or pediatrician will fill the GP's shoes. "These specialists," he says, "don't want to play the family doctor role any longer than necessary to build up a specialty practice of their own."

The GP is also at a professional disadvantage. He can go into practice with only one year's internship while the specialist often must struggle through five or six more years of residency. As a result, the GP has low prestige in the profession, especially in big city hospitals where his privileges are cut to make room for the specialist.

"Less training means less know-how," says a young surgical intern in a New York hospital. "And it also means more time to make money. That's why the GP's motives and his talents usually are suspect."

To improve the training of GPs and help their prestige, the AMA has asked hospitals to devise new two-year training programs for the family physician.

III. Filling a vacuum

Some experts suggest that the nation's 12,000 doctors of osteopathy could help ease the medical shortage. These doctors, who study scientific medicine as well as manipulation, have gained status in recent years from state medical societies, though not from the AMA itself.

Many quasi-doctors, from chiropractors to midwives, owe their public demand to the fact that people needing medical care can't get enough attention from real doctors, economists say. Personnel on the outskirts of medicine have multiplied much faster than physicians since the 1940s, though this is partly due to new technology.

Some physicians don't seem to mind. "God bless the chiropractor," says a surgeon. "He keeps a lot of hypochondriacs off my neck."

AMA economist Osborn isn't convinced it's a simple matter of substitution in an emergency. "Some people are brought up in cultures where the chiropractor is the cure-all," he says. "If there were 50 doctors in the area, such people wouldn't go to them."

Kentucky has a wider choice of financing plans for new industrial plants than any other state. Loans for building construction are available from the State, and also from The Business Development Corporation, a private corporation. In addition, cities may finance new plants through municipal revenue bonds or general obligation bonds. Also, there are more than 100 local development corporations who are prepared to furnish developed sites or provide financial aid for construction.

mist who is a key Goldwater adviser, blames the doctor shortage directly for the proliferation of quasi-doctors in the U. S. And, a sharp critic of the medical profession since the 1940s, he holds the AMA largely responsible. The AMA, he says, is "perhaps the strongest trade union in the U. S.," with a stranglehold on the supply of doctors.

Friedman cites state licensing laws that require doctors to have graduated from AMA-certified schools and trained in AMA-approved hospital programs. He would like to do away with state licensing laws altogether. The free market, he is convinced, could have done more for U. S. health than AMA has done. Few economists—and few consumers would go this far. The AMA, of course, defends its power as a quality control and takes prime credit for eliminating the medical quackery of the 1800s.

IV. More medical schools

Last year, Congress took a step toward breaking the bottleneck in the supply line by setting up a three-year $105-million program of grants for medical school construction. Until now, the number of AMA-approved schools has expanded slowly. In fact, before AMA's purge began, there were 162 professed medical schools in 1906; in 1930, there were only 76 AMA-approved schools. Now there are 87.

Existing schools have expanded, yet in recent years about 20% of all newly licensed M.D.s in the U. S. were imported from abroad. Since shortly after World War II, AMA and public health officials have been at odds about whether or not there was a serious shortage of doctors. Until last year, AMA arguments that all was well have handicapped efforts to provide federal funds for new schools, which cost from $25-million to $40-million to build and equip.

AMA economists still argue that there is no general doctor shortage. But they foresee it as a possibility if the output of medical graduates is not increased.

The AMA did oppose last year's action of Congress in setting up a $61-million loan program for medical students, as unnecessary government intervention. It supported the "bricks and mortar" grant-in-aid plan for schools, however.

New schools. According to the Assn. of American Medical Colleges, the government construction program should help provide 11 new schools by 1968, plus expansion and modernization of existing schools. This will provide 600 to 1,000 first-year places for students, on top of today's 8,700 places. The AAMC estimates that 4,000 new places, half of them from expansion of existing schools, will be needed by 1975, just to keep the same number of doctors per capita.

V. Having it good

Meanwhile, the doctors have it good—so good that they are in the top 1% of the income distribution list, with lifetime earnings far ahead of such professionals as dentists and lawyers [BW Sep.28'63,p148].

Harris and Friedman argue that doctors owe much of their affluence to the profits of scarcity. (In 1962, according to Medical Economics, the doctors' median income, after costs and before taxes, was $24,300). But W. Lee Hansen, a staff member for the Council of Economic Advisers, prefers to look at doctors' incomes in the light of their costs of education and their loss of potential earnings during training.

Hansen estimates that doctors in 1956 made 12.8% on their educational investment, compared with 11.6% for all male college graduates, including everyone from poets to corporation presidents.

Most economists pooh-pooh the notion that medical students sacrifice income when they are in their 20s. They say earnings in the 40s more than offset any losses. Besides, medical schools are heavily weighted with students from high-income homes, and many doctors marry wealthy or working wives. The financial sacrifice of doctors in training also guarantees social prestige, a return on investment that Hansen neglects.

Making still more. As economists see it, there's more to the rise in doctors' income than the increase of fees in a scarcity situation. They cite the higher number of patients served by each doctor and a better record of bill collection, to which Harris attributes 43% of income growth since the Depression.

It's true, too, that doctors are getting higher fees for the same service. Harris estimates that this factor has contributed 23% to the physician's improved position since the mid-1930s. During the war and early postwar years, doctors' fees rose only half as fast as general price levels; since 1949, about twice as fast as the over-all Consumer Price Index but not as fast as services generally and far less than hospital costs.

Doctors' share of the total health care dollar has fallen from 30.1¢ in 1932 to 25¢ in 1963—up a shade from 1962.

Harris thinks doctors are reluctant to raise fees, though less reluctant in the past few years. The shortage of GPs, says Harris, has pushed their rates up faster than those of surgeons; obstetricians' fees have also been pushed up by pressure from the baby boom.

Varied prices. One built-in element in the medical profession is price discrimination, which economists detest. Doctors can charge different fees for the same service; the patient can't fight back.

"You just can't resell an appendectomy," one economist puts it. Doctors don't advertise, and they don't compete publicly, so the market has no way to establish a single price for a single service, as it tends to do for haircuts or shoeshines.

The prevalence of health insurance, however, is affecting prices. Bulk buyers of medical service, such as the government, Blue Shield, or group service plans, encourage uniformity of fees. But the habit of charging what the traffic will bear hasn't entirely vanished.

Motives. Reuben A. Kessel, University of Chicago economist, thinks the money motive can explain all institutions and practices in the medical profession, from sliding fees to AMA's great influence. But other economists aren't so sure it's all a matter of money. Stanford University's Kenneth J. Arrow, for example, points out that most doctors don't discriminate enough in their fees to maximize profits anyway. They don't because of personal scruples, insurance programs, and the occasional fear of scaring away business.

And, of course, doctors still practice charity. New Medical Materia magazine estimates that in 1960 they gave away $658-million in free care.

Arrow offers his own key to the doctor industry's performance—"the prevalence of uncertainty."

In any transaction of course, buyers know less than sellers, but in the doctor-patient relationship the stakes are considerably higher. And the risks to the patient are greater.

Today, a patient at least knows that his M. D. graduated from an approved school and trained in an AMA-endorsed hospital program, that he is probably in the local medical society and perhaps also in a specialists' group, keeping up to date on medical knowledge. If he's on a hospital staff, he can't escape scrutiny of his colleagues.

AMA control and the consequent shortage of doctors are the price that consumers have paid for these guarantees. End

Welfare Commissioner Says U.S. Aid Is 'Drop in Bucket' in Meeting Problem

Pov. Prog

By MARTIN ARNOLD

Staggering under a load that increases by nearly 5,000 persons a month, New York City is fighting what at best is only a holding action against its welfare problems.

For the problems are the product of urban poverty across the land, and such poverty cannot be successfully attacked without massive Federal assistance, the city administration emphasizes.

Welfare is now the city's third-largest expenditure, exceeded only by schools and debt retirement.

Welfare Commissioner James R. Dumpson said in an interview yesterday that "if we are really serious about antipoverty and reducing our welfare rolls the $900 million-plus in the [Johnson] Administration's antipoverty bill, is only a small drop in the bucket."

300,000 Children Aided

Mayor Wagner has been equally blunt. The cost of the antipoverty program is "beyond the capacity of the city," he said recently, warning that New York must seek more Federal and state aid for such imperative needs as immediate improvement in education, housing, job training and jobs.

There are 501,131 persons here, or 6.2 per cent of the city's population, receiving some form of public assistance. About 300,000 are children, living in crowded slums, playing on garbage-littered streets. Their clothes are usually shabby; milk and meat are rare luxuries.

The welfare rolls list only "cases," not "families," for there is no other appropriate way to record the aid given to a woman who has had five children by five different men; to a child deserted by his father; to parents of youngsters who drift from corner to corner and who often sleep in doorways and on stoops.

Known as 'Little Dynamo'

Thus, the 501,131 persons who were receiving some sort of welfare aid as of Sept. 30, when the last tabulation was made, represent 200,649 cases, which were granted a total of $37,338,837 in September. A year ago it was $5.4 million less for the month.

The man in charge of trying to alleviate this mounting misery is Mr. Dumpson, a slightly built man who moves quickly and speaks slowly and who, despite the critics of welfare, is known for his zeal in guarding public funds from waste.

Mr. Dumpson has been nicknamed "Little Dynamo" by his fellow workers because of his long work hours. He has been Welfare Commissioner since 1959.

A self-assured, confident man who at 55 dresses in conservative, blue pin-striped suits, he looks more like a bank president than a harassed social service director. He said, however: "I've just come from my doctor and he fears I have all sorts of stomach ailments.

"I told the Mayor that a man should only hold this job about five years, and I'll probably leave it soon. I want to live, not get sick."

He sees "no end in sight" for welfare departments or welfare payments. His is not an agency that can put itself out of business by succeeding like, for example, the city's Rent and Rehabilitation Administration. Rather, it is more like a municipal middleman between the poor and survival and is almost wholly dependent on other agencies to find a cure for poverty.

The welfare department has become throughout the country a municipal whipping post. Here and elsewhere, there is a vast category of cases in which persons who are on public welfare somehow find the money to buy expensive fur coats; addicts who use their welfare payments for narcotics; and even some persons who get welfare checks while they hold good jobs.

Lowest Rate in U. S.

Mr. Dumpson is not disturbed by this. New York, he said, has the country's lowest rate of ineligible persons on its welfare rolls. Those who are ineligible are continually being weeded out, he said.

"Even among the number we have, many are getting welfare because a staff member, newly trained, doesn't understand the procedure or the law," he said. "Many others go to the wrong department and are put on the rolls. A surprising number are not getting as much as they are entitled to under the laws."

Of those who get some sort of welfare aid here—for food, rent or medical care—at least 75 per cent are Negroes and Puerto Ricans. Out of an estimated population of 8,090,000 in September, 1,320,000 are Negroes and 675,000, Puerto Ricans.

However, the Welfare Department statistics show that four out of five Negroes and Puerto Ricans here are employed, and that most do not receive even supplemental aid from available welfare funds.

But the welfare figures keep going up. "It's been rising for three years. The figures go up because the birth rate goes up, the population goes up," Mr. Dumpson said.

Flow of the Unskilled

A big cause of the growing

than $10 million—from $475,476,000 to $575,997,000.

In terms of people, about 58,000 more persons received welfare aid last September than in September, 1963; 501,131 as compared with 442,819. The Welfare Department says that its rolls are increasing at the rate of just under 5,000 persons per month.

These persons filter through 23 welfare offices in the city.

They include a tall, overweight, 26-year-old woman with a pretty face and large, warm, brown eyes, three children and no husband. She lives in a three-room apartment, badly in need of paint and floor covering. Her only income is a check for $94 from the city every 15 days.

What she does with that check depends on a variety of things: her thyroid condition, which keeps her overweight; the need for shoes for her children, her rent, her utilities. Each month she also gets 19 packages of food with a retail value of $17.50 from the Federal food surplus program.

Another woman—Mrs. M—receives $3,224 a year from the department for herself and four children. She pays $90 a month for her slum apartment, and she has not had a new dress in 11 years.

Mrs. A, another "case," is 47 and the mother of two. Her husband deserted her two years ago, and every 15 days she receives $99 from the department.

Every two weeks $46 of this goes to her landlord for the rent of a sagging, Lower East Side apartment. She is left with less than $4 a day for food, clothing and the other necessities.

Slumlords Get Money

Much of the criticism directed against the Welfare Department is that a large portion of its for example, a man entitled to $60 a week in welfare has no incentive to get a $50-a-week job. If he did not get such a job, he would get $10 a week in aid. But Mr. Dumpson—up to a point that would be determined—would like the law to allow the man to keep the salary check and a greater part of the welfare contribution.

In housing, Mr. Dumpson would amend the law to allow welfare funds to be used to pay the rents of low-income families in middle-income developments.

Wants Reorganization

He said he would like to see the department entirely reorganized, so that it could undertake more extensive programs to prevent dependency.

Another proposal by Mr. Dumpson—a controversial one—would be the "repeal of all laws that relate residence and 'worthiness' to eligibility for public assistance."

His plan, actually, would not apply to New York. But in many states a person must live in the state for a certain length of time before being eligible for welfare. In addition, he must be considered "worthy" in a moral sense. Thus an unmarried mother, for example, might have a hard time getting welfare funds.

"When I leave this job," Mr. Dumpson said, pointing to the chair in his office, "I would like to challenge all those who have written newspaper articles about welfare to sit in this seat, and I'd say to them, 'You've criticized—you have the job now. What is your prescription for the program?'"

Ricans here are employed, and that most do not receive even supplemental aid from available welfare funds.

But the welfare figures keep going up. "It's been rising for three years. The figures go up because the birth rate goes up, the population goes up," Mr. Dumpson said.

Flow of the Unskilled

A big cause of the growing welfare rolls is the flow of unskilled, poorly educated Negroes from the South to New York and Puerto Ricans from Puerto Rico, although the latter migration is decreasing. The answer to this is better education, better housing and more job retraining, Mr. Dumpson believes. Automation kills off, he noted, the very jobs these people do.

It is hoped in the city Welfare Department that the Civil Rights Act of 1964—as well as the Federal antipoverty program—will help drain away welfare cases by eventually opening up more job opportunities for Negroes throughout the country, particularly in the South.

A total of $244,773,000 was originally budgeted here for public assistance for the fiscal year ending June 30. The City Council later transferred an additional $7,344,000 to the department. For the 1965-66 fiscal year, the department has estimated that the budget for public assistance in the city must rise by about $71 million.

Commenting on continuing criticism of the spiraling welfare costs, Mr. Dumpson said: "Nobody, but nobody, in this country of ours, in terms of our cultural values, has too much respect for dependency.

"Nobody likes to have his tax money used for dependency—for people they don't like. We take care of ourselves, sometimes not even our own families, and we attack people who are dependent, rather than the cause of their dependency."

Allotment of Cost

Of the 501,131 persons who received welfare aid last September, 464,867 of them were getting what is called "direct public assistance" for such basic items as rent, food and clothing. This totaled $32,251,247, of which roughly a third was paid by the city, a third by the Federal Government and a third by the state.

The remaining persons received aid for such items as foster care for children, the money for which comes from the city Controller's office, and for hospital care. These funds come from the Department of Hospitals budget.

The cost for the 501,131 persons of $37,338,837, came to $186.09 a case and $74.51 a person.

In September, 1963, 442,819 persons received public aid here. The budget was $31,911,202, or $176.02 a case and $72.06 a person.

The largest single item in the Welfare Department's budget consists of aid to dependent children—$15,578,660 last September, and $12,564,451 in September, 1963.

An even more stark picture of the Welfare Department's growing problems can be seen in the yearly figures.

Direct public assistance in the budget year ending last June cost $416,630,313, as compared with $339,515,137 for the previous year.

For the same periods, welfare hospitalization costs went from $83,777,074 to $95,236,066, and foster care for children rose from $52,191,531 to $64,131,167.

The total went up by more ago, and every 15 days she receives $99 from the department.

Every two weeks $46 of this goes to her landlord for the rent of a sagging, Lower East Side apartment. She is left with less than $4 a day for food, clothing and the other necessities.

Slumlords Get Money

Much of the criticism directed against the Welfare Department is that a large portion of its aid goes to the support of slumlords.

But, Mr. Dumpson points out, in many cases there is simply no other housing available for welfare cases.

He said: "When new housing is available, a lot of our families simply cannot afford it. When they are relocated while the housing is going up, we often have to place them in apartments that are not under rent control."

And, under the law, the City Housing Authority, which builds and maintains the low-rent public housing here, has virtually run out of funds to build more.

An example of the type of housing in which welfare recipients often live is the Bryn Mawr, a six-story building at 420 West 121st Street near Amsterdam Avenue. Its exterior is practically indistinguishable from other buildings in the area, most of which are inhabited by middle-income families. But the Bryn Mawr has become a magnet for narcotics addicts and prostitutes: —50 arrests have been made on its premises in the last 44 months.

The Bryn Mawr's tenants are for the most part Negroes, and many are on public welfare. But, Mr. Dumpson said, "As long as there is a housing shortage in this city we have to put people where they will be taken."

Dumpson Seeks Changes

Mr. Dumpson has called for a number of changes in the laws and the policies of the welfare program. "We must rethink the soundness of the 'means test' as the cornerstone for eligibility," he said, so that applicants will not be stripped "of all vestiges of self-respect and dignity."

He also urged that a "more realistic" policy for "considering an accounting of income of persons in receipt of public assistance" so that their incentive "to self-support may be strengthened rather than discouraged."

Under the city welfare laws,

Medical ethics

If we summarize ethics as an attempt to achieve the highest good, we are faced with the conflict of the good of the individual as opposed to the use of the individual as a means of achieving good for all. In this problem we are influenced by our democratic concept that the rights and value of the individual are not subordinate to those of the community or state—R. Lee Clark.

Experimentation brings medical progress —but raises serious questions of ethics

By R. Lee Clark, M.D.

THE PHRASE, "experimentation on human beings," has inherently a slightly noisome connotation, even to the individual trained in scientific disciplines. Yet, as the purpose of medical science is to discover and to extend knowledge of the human being, the general problem of such experimentation has been with us since the dawn of medicine as a science.

For many years subhuman species have been used for experiments; however, the ultimate proof of validity has, of necessity, been decided on the basis of results when these same experiments were performed with human subjects. The medical profession therefore has a duty to its members and to the society in which it practices to define the limitations within which human research may properly be pursued.

An adequate code of medical ethics has been in existence almost as long as there has been recognized medical practice, but in this particular era, human experimentation necessitates redefinition of and adherence to certain scientific, legal, and ethical precepts. Eludication of the principles can be obtained by reiteration of much that is traditional, and of clarification of many precepts that are complex and that are still changing.

The ethical code that governs human research must be commensurate with, and relevant to, the human values linvolved. Acceptance of these precepts, therefore, requires examination of at least three major considerations. The first is the exact meaning of ethics, and the second, an interpretation of what constitutes human experimentation. The third and most crucial proposition—what determines medical responsibility in modern research—can be resolved only after analysis of the first two problems.

The concept of ethics

The dictionary explains ethics as "The science of moral duty; broadly, the science of ideal human character, actions, and ends." Even from this succinct definition it is easy to discern that the concept of ethics has twofold implications: a relative or practical aspect. But although adherence to ethics of course necessitates maintenance of belief in absolute ethics [illegible] had an extremely long and inspired history. Insofar as is known, no other people ever have expressed with such clarity and nobility the tenets of the physician's moral responsibility as did the Greeks. The Hippocratic Oath, that "most memorable of human documents," contains the essential ethical precepts of the practice of medicine. The Oath was not drafted as a legal document and it did not set forth punitive measures. It is simply an oath, an exhortation, and its strength and beauty stem from its moral decree.

Even though there have been many additions to the codes of medicine, the Hippocratic Oath has remained a monument to the highest ideals of the profession for which it was first intoned.

Although its concepts have been applicable through the ages, there are nonetheless no explicit injunctions in the Oath that pertain to medical research with human subjects and none is now promulgated by the American Medical Association. However as a direct consequence of the experiments performed on human beings under the National Socialistic regime in Germany, a code to govern human experimentation was developed at the Nuremberg Military Tribunals in 1947. This code is outlined in the following statement by Brigadier General Telford Taylor, Chief of Counsel for War Crimes.

Nuremberg code

"The great weight of the evidence before us is to the effect that certain types of medical experiments on human beings, when kept within reasonably well-defined bounds, conform to the ethics of the medical profession generally. The protagonists of the practice of human experimentation justify their views on the basis that such experiments yield results for the good of society that are unprocurable by other methods or means of study. All agree, however, that certain basic principles must be observed in order to satisfy moral, ethical and legal concepts:

"1. The voluntary consent of the human subject is absolutely essential. This means that the person involved should have legal capacity to give consent; should be so situated as to be able to exercise free power of choice, without [illegible] periments where the experimental physicians also serve as subjects.

"6. The degree of risk to be taken should never exceed that determined by the humanitarian importance of the problem to be solved by the experiment.

"7. Proper preparations should be made and adequate facilities provided to protect the experimental subject against even remote possibilities of injury, disability, or death.

"8. The experiment should be conducted only by scientifically qualified persons. The highest degree of skill and care should be required through all stages of the experiment of those who conduct or engage in the experiment.

"9. During the course of the experiment the human subject should be at liberty to bring the experiment to an end if he has reached the physical or mental state where continuation of the experiment seems to him to be impossible.

"10. During the course of the experiment the scientist in charge must be prepared to terminate the experiment at any stage, if he has probable cause to believe, in the exercise of the good faith, superior skill, and careful judgment required of him that a continuation of the experiment is likely to result in injury, disability, or death to the experimental subject."

Rules similar to those of the Nuremberg Code have been adopted by the American Medical Association and by the Green Committee to govern use of prisoners in research. Since the principles of medical ethics concerning human experimentation have been formally delineated, some attempt must be made to define human experimentation.

All practice may be regarded as experimentation. Each time that a physician treats a patient, there are factors which may be unknown and which may affect the response of the patient to the treatment. If the accepted treatment does not have a beneficial result, the physician may then try another treatment. This is further experimentation. He has not used a new and untried procedure, possibly, but he is applying a treatment to gain an expected result with no assurance of success. It is the [illegible]

Surgeons with a patient—detail from a mosaic over the entrance to Houston's Methodist Hospital. Since no patient is exactly like another, all medical treatment is in a sense experimental.

Outlook

At the direction of King Carlos IV of Spain, his court physician, Dr. Francisco Xavier deBalmes, sailed to the New World in 1803 with twenty-six orphaned children from the city of Caruna, Spain. These children were to be infected in succession, with the live "cow-pox" infection so that "pus" could be obtained from them with which to vaccinate the natives of New Spain. More than 400,000 people were so inoculated in South America alone. The expedition lasted from 1803 to 1812 and largely eliminated the epidemics of smallpox that periodically swept through whole cities and provinces. Orphaned children were used as the carriers of the live virus and were either borrowed or bought from homes or communities and carried with the expedition as long as they were useful—a practice that resulted in saving the lives of hundreds of thousands but was hardly designed with the greatest good of the orphaned children in mind.—R. Lee Clark harm or permanent damage is done to the patient from whom it was withheld. By the same standard, it might be impossible to withhold even temporarily an established treatment for a disease in which life or death or serious aftereffects are at stake. Each trial must be weighed individually.

Shimkin discussed various categorizations of human experimentation. For example, there is one scheme which is based on the patient's role. Participation is classified as (1) passive, when human tissues or products that are sepa- [illegible] sponses to the treatment, and also because their consent may be given under indirect duress due to a possible feeling that failure to consent will be detrimental to their standing in their profession. Civil prisoners may be used if their consent is voluntary and not the result of undue influence, such as the reward of a drastic reduction in sentence. Military prisoners are never to be used. The feeble minded should be considered as subjects under the same restrictions as children. Individuals who may die during the experiment should be avoided, since their death would reflect doubt on the [illegible] petent to undertake and to carry out the experiment. Second, the human experimental subject must understand and voluntarily consent to the procedure, and must not be selected upon any basis such as race, religion, level of education, or economic status. In other words, the investigators and the subjects are human beings with entirely equal, inalienable rights that supersede any considerations of science or general public welfare. Finally, research on human beings is too hazardous and implies too many responsibilities to be undertaken by lone investigators. It should be a group effort supported by a proper consultative body. Experimentation, even on oneself, without such collaboration and consultation seems as indefensible as similar experimentation on another individual.

Until such time as the law establishes limits to "experimentation," the experimenter will be subject to the laws governing "practice." His strict observance of the code of ethics will be his best defense against legal action.

IT IS on the physician and his integrity that we have founded our reliance for the proper conduct of human research and for whom we are dependent for the application of new knowledge to human welfare. This faith is a great inheritance [illegible] after analysis of the first two problems.

The dictionary explains ethics as "The science of moral duty; broadly, the science of ideal human character, actions, and ends." Even from this succinct definition it is easy to discern that the concept of ethics has twofold implications: a relative or practical aspect. But although adherence to ethics of course necessitates maintenance of belief in absolute ethics with an unchanging basic moral code, in the lives of laymen and physicians it is the second nonmetaphysical aspect of ethics that is most often challenged, the relative ethical precepts. The individual may contemplate abstract truth, but in everyday life, specific and urgent problems must be solved by the more practical, relative ethical precepts. In the immediate and concrete situations which William James called "forced options," some action must be taken.

A challenging example of a forced option is that made by William S. Halsted in 1881. At that time, Dr. Halsted's sister was extremely ill after postpartum hemorrhage. According to Halsted's own account, "After checking the hemorrhage. According to Halsted's own account, "After checking the hemorrhage, I transfused my sister with blood drawn into a syringe from one of my veins and injected immediately into hers. This was taking a great risk, but she was so nearly moribund that I ventured it, and with prompt results." This was one of the first instances of direct blood transfusion made in this country, and little was known then of the incompatibility of blood groups. This action attests not only to the skill and courage of William Stewart Halsted but aso to the immediacy of the kind of forced options physicians must take.

Medical ethics, both as a formal system of absolute precepts and as a practical guide of regulating conduct, has ments yield results for the good of society that are unprocurable by other methods or means of study. All agree, however, that certain basic principles must be observed in order to satisfy moral, ethical and legal concepts:

"1. The voluntary consent of the human subject is absolutely essential. This means that the person involved should have legal capacity to give consent; should be so situated as to be able to exercise free power of choice, without the intervention of any element of force, fraud, deceit, duress, overreaching, or right ulterior forms of constraint or coercion; and should have sufficient knowledge and comprehension of the elements of the subject matter involved as to enable him to make an understanding and enlightened decision. This latter element requires that before the acceptance of an affirmative decision by the experimental subject there should be made known to him the nature, duration, and purpose of the experiment; the method and means by which it is to be conducted; all inconveniences and hazards reasonably to be expected; and the effects upon his health or person which may possibly come from his participation in the experiment.

"2. The experiment should be such as to yield fruitful results for the good of society unprocurable by other methods or means of study, and not random and unnecessary in nature.

"3. The experiment should be so designed and based on the results of animal experimentation and a knowledge of the natural history of the disease or other problem under study that the anticipated results will justify the performance of the experiment.

"4. The experiment should be so conducted as to avoid all unnecessary physical and mental suffering and injury.

"5. No experiment should be conducted where there is an a priori reason to believe that death or disabling injury will occur; except, perhaps, in those experimentation. Each time that a physician treats a patient, there are factors which may be unknown and which may affect the response of the patient to the treatment. If the accepted treatment does not have a beneficial result, the physician may then try another treatment. This is further experimentation. He has not used a new and untried procedure, possibly, but he is applying a treatment to gain an expected result with no assurance of success. It is the use of initiative on the part of the physician, with due attention to the welfare of his patient, which has advanced medicine and medical knowledge.

A distinguishing factor between practice and experimentation is the purpose for which they are conducted. Both undertake treatment for the welfare of the patient. But, as pointed out by Ladimer, "The physician accepts patients and is mainly concerned with their welfare; the investigator selects subjects (problems as well as individuals) and while responsive to the patient's interest, is bent on solving the scientific problem. . . . The investigator's basic purpose, as distinct from the practitioner's, is to elucidate and to generalize."

Although we may use purpose as a dividing line, experimentation and practice will overlap in method. And we must question the ethics of applying a new method of treatment, regardless of its purpose. The welfare of the patient must be of primary importance and the purpose of the trial must be to benefit and not to harm him. The activity of the practitioner and the experimenter may differ only in the nature of their interest in the result.

At times, the ethics of a situation depend on what is at stake. For example, in a clinical trial of a treatment for the common cold to shorten its duration, withholding from one patient the treatment which might help while giving it to another may prove the validity of the treatment. At the same time, no great possible to withhold even temporarily an established treatment for a disease in which life or death or serious aftereffects are at stake. Each trial must be weighed individually.

Shimkin discussed various categorizations of human experimentation. For example, there is one scheme which is based on the patient's role. Participation is classified as (1) passive, when human tissues or products that are separated from the individual are examined as by the pathologist or biochemist, (2) late active, when studies on man are undertaken only after prior investigation on animals, and (3) initial active, when certain investigations must be undertaken first, or exclusively, on man.

Other kinds of classification are possible, such as the purpose of the research, and whether such research is basic or applied science.

Types of subject

If an experiment is proposed, it must be weighed against the ethical considerations which have been mentioned. The purpose of the experiment must be well defined, and if there is any risk, the value of it should be assessed by a competent group of scientists. Basic or initial research in the subject should be made on animals when possible, and man should be used only when unavoidable or when necessary for a final evaluation.

Choosing a human subject for the experiment must be done with regard for both the subject and the experiment. Children should never be used, except in extreme cases where the benefit to the child indicates the experimentation is less hazardous than withholding such treatment. The consent of the parents or guardians must be obtained if a child is used. Laboratory personnel and medical students should be avoided as subjects because their knowledge of the study and their association with other subjects will condition subjective re-that failure to consent will be detrimental to their standing in their profession. Civil prisoners may be used if their consent is voluntary and not the result of undue influence, such as the reward of a drastic reduction in sentence. Military prisoners are never to be used. The feeble minded should be considered as subjects under the same restrictions as children. Individuals who may die during the experiment should be avoided, since their death would reflect doubt on the result of the experiment. The best type of subject is one who is mature and capable of understanding the nature of the treatment and the risk involved, and one who gives voluntary consent to participating in the experiment.

In medical jurisprudence, "the treatment of a patient obliges the physician to possess the ordinary knowledge of his profession and to exercise the ordinary skills. Failure to do so, including willful neglect, renders him liable for malpractice." The conduct of practice is governed by state statute and supporting administrative licensing and regulatory bodies. If a question of malpractice arises, the ability and standing of the physician, the accepted methods of treatment for the particular condition and his adherence to them, and the consent of the patient to receive the treatment are considered.

Although the practice of medicine has laws, precedents, customs, and rules for the patient, human experimentation has no specified legal precedents to protect the subject or the investigator. On the other hand, there is an abundance of precedent to indicate that the investigator experiments on man to his peril. According to Ladimer, "court decisions that have involved 'experimentation' have generally been based on issues of nondisclosure or lack of consent, negligence, unfitness, and other improper activity arising in cases of departure from accepted diagnosis, therapy, or other medical practice. These have failed to recognize the important distinction between poor medical practice and legitimate research."

On the matter of consent, Koerner stated, "Under the maxim, volenti non fit injuria, the law says a person has assumed the risk if he knows a given situation is dangerous, has a reasonable opportunity to discover the nature of the risk, has an appreciation of that risk, but still remains in that dangerous situation of his own accord until injured.

What is the law governing new forms of treatment? What are the pitfalls? What should a physician do when he wishes to try out a new treatment, say, for cancer? First, he should make sure the treatment method does not vary too much from accepted medical standards. Then he should explain to the patient and those legally responsible for him all that is known about the method or the material, its mode of action, the fact that there may be reactions not heretofore experienced with it, th erisks involved, and the consequences that are possible. Then the patient or, if he is a minor, incompetent, etc., those legally responsible for him should execute a consent. . . . "

Shimkin's analysis of the various rules shows that they can be reduced to two primary principles: First, the investigators must be thoroughly trained in the scientific disciplines of the problem, must understand and appreciate the ethics involved, and must thus be comlishes limits to "experimentation," the experimenter will be subject to the laws governing "practice." His strict observance of the code of ethics will be his best defense against legal action.

IT IS on the physician and his integrity that we have founded our reliance for the proper conduct of human research and for whom we are dependent for the application of new knowledge to human welfare. This faith is a great inheritance from the past and begins with the gods and demigods of healing of the ancients as exemplified by Imhotep, Aesculapius, and Hippocrates, and passes through centuries of dedicated medical practitioners, teachers, and investigators. The justification of this faith is the first duty of the physician to his patient and his fellow man.

The physician should remind himself of the precepts inherent in that code expressed in the Oath attributed to Hippocrates, "I will follow that system of regimen which, according to my ability and judgment, I consider for the benefit of my patients, and abstain from whatever is deleterious and mischievous."

And further reflection on the dictum, was pronounced by the Father of Experimental Medicine himself, Claude Bernard, who gave this advice: "So, among the experiments that may be tried on man, those that can only harm are forbidden, those that are innocent are permissible, and those that may do good are obligatory."

The physician has the guiding principles of his profession to assist him in the ethical pursuit of human experimentation. In his love of humanity (philanthropia of Hippocrates) and reverence for life (Albert Schweitzer), he will preserve the life and individuality of each patient. While furthering his own knowledge of life and medicine he will make the most of this privileged opportunity by an unbiased appraisal and by a free sharing of the knowledge gained. He will preserve his own integrity, admonished, as was Shakespeare's Laertes, by the precept:

"This above all: to thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man."

Finally we may turn to the words of Christ in speaking to the disciples about their work with the sick, hungry, thirsty, imprisoned and abandoned—words which may be used both as a guide for the conduct of human experimentation and for a limitation of its use:

Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." (Matthew 25:40.)

R. Lee Clark, M.D., wrote the paper, from which the above is excerpted, to help formulate institutional policy for research pertaining to clinical problems at the University of Texas M. D. Anderson Hospital and Tumor Institution (Houston), of which he is director. It was first printed in Transactions of the Alumni Association of the Mayo Foundation. Dr. Clark has been appointed to the President's Committee on Heart Disease, Cancer and Stroke.

Little is known of Hippocrates, the Greek who is called the father of medicine. He was a teacher as well as a practitioner; lived around 400 B.C.

The Hippocratic oath

Hippocrates formulated the first code of medical ethics:

"I swear by Apollo Physician and Asclepius and Hygeia and Panacea and all the gods and goddesses, making them my witnesses, that I will fulfill according to my ability and judgment this oath and covenant:

"To hold him who has taught me this art as equal to my parents and to live my life in partnership with him, and if he is in need of money to give him a share of mine, and to regard his offspring as equal to my brothers in male lineage and to teach them this art—if they desire to learn it—without fee and covenant; to give a share of precepts and oral instruction and all the other learning to my sons and to the sons of him who has instructed me and to pupils who have signed the covenant and taken an oath according to the medical law, but to no one else.

"I will apply dietetic measures for the benefit of the sick according to my ability and judgment; I will keep them from harm and injustice.

"I will neither give a deadly drug to anybody if asked for it, nor will I make a suggestion to this effect. Similarly I will not give to a woman an abortive remedy. In purity and holiness I will guard my life and my art.

"I will not use the knife, not even on sufferers from stone, but will withdraw in favor of such men as are engaged in this work.

"Whatever houses I may visit, I will come for the benefit of the sick, remaining free of all intentional injustice, of all mischief and in particular of sexual relations with both female and male persons, be they free or slaves.

"What I may see or hear in the course of the treatment or even outside of the treatment in regard to the life of men, which on no account one must spread abroad, I will keep to myself holding such things shameful to be spoken about.

"If I fulfill this path and do not violate it, may it be granted to me to enjoy life and art, being honored with fame among all men for all time to come; if I transgress it and swear falsely, may the opposite of all this be my lot."

House Maneuver Planned to Pass Aged Care Bill

By JOHN D. MORRIS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5 — Administration leaders are preparing to invoke a rarely used parliamentary device to assure action by the House of Representatives on health care for the aged under Social Security.

They readily concede that extraordinary measures must be employed to prevent a Senate-House conference committee from deleting health-care provisions from a Social Security bill that has now cleared both chambers in different form.

What they hope to do is win House approval of a motion instructing House members of the conference mommittee to accept a health-care plan in settling differences with the Senate.

The House conferees would be legally bound by such instructions, regardless of whether they personally opposed a Social Security program of health care. The final version of the bill thus would have to include health-care provisions.

The version passed by the House July 29 called for a $1.9 billion increase in annual cash payments to Social Security beneficiaries without dealing with the problem of health care.

The Senate raised the projected increase in cash benefits to $2.2 billion and added a modified version of the Administration's health-care program before passing the bill last Thursday.

Mill's Opposition Is Cited

The impracticability of obtaining an agreement in Senate-House conference on a final bill that retains a health-care plan arises mainly from the opposition of Representative Wilbur D. Mills, Democrat of Arkansas.

As chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, he outmaneuvered the Administration in bringing out a bill that omitted health care in steering it to House passage without a vote on the issue.

Mr. Mills has made it evident that, as chairman of the House conferees, he would do his utmost to delete the Senate health-care provisions. With the four other prospective conferees for the House divided on the issue, 2 to 2, Mr. Mills would prevail 3 to 2.

The Senate conferees, who vote as a separate unit, would doubtless yield, since a majority of them are personally opposed to the health-care plan. They are honor-bound to support the Senate position on issues in conference, but only in the early phase of the negotiations.

The bill is now expected to reach the House floor next Wednesday, when Democratic leaders will ask unanimous consent to send it to conference. An expected objection will put it in the hands of the Rules Committee, which may send it back to the floor some time in the following week with recommendations for a conference.

Floor Wrangle Possible

At that point, according to present plans, Administration forces will seek approval of a motion instructing the House conferees.

Aside from a possibility that such a motion would be rejected by the House, the tactic may provoke a parliamentary wrangle in which a clear-cut test would be precluded.

This is because a minority party, under House rules, must be given the first opportunity to offer an instruction motion. Republican leaders are considering offering and dealing with some other provision of the bill.

If they do, the only way for Administration leaders to obtain a vote on their own motion would be to engage in a highly complicated parliamentary maneuver that would be what is known as a previous question.

To vote on any proposal, the House must first adopt the previous question, and this is usually done in routine manner. But in the present situation, the only way that health-care proponents could kill a Republican motion to instruct the conferees — without precluding a later vote on their own instruction motion — would be to defeat the previous question.

All this would tend to obscure the issue, confounding many House members as well as the public. But Administration leaders say they expect to battle through the parliamentary muddle, if the Republicans make it necessary.

They express considerable hope but not much optimism that they will emerge from it victoriously, and that the House conferees will thereby be legally bound to back the Administration's position on health care for the aged.

Insurance Group's View

In a comment this week on the Senate version of the health care bill, Robert M. Neal, general manager of the Health Insurance Association of America, had this to say:

"The Health Insurance Association of America questions whether the public understands fully what the tax costs would be for the proposed Social Security amendments of 1964, including the medicare provisions as passed by the Senate. It is understood that this measure will be up for consideration by the House shortly and legislative action could be taken as early as Wednesday, Sept. 9.

"Under the Senate measure, Social Security taxes for an individual earning $5,600 or more per year would increase from the present $144 he paid this year to $288 which he would have to pay in 1965 — a $144 increase. In addition, further tax increases are provided so that by 1971, an individual will be paying $291.40 — an increase of $147.20 over 1964.

"Employers would pay similar amounts on behalf of their employes and these sums would probably come either from higher charges on the products or services everyone purchases, or from reductions in employe fringe benefits. The Social Security tax in 1971 would increase to $582.40, a total of 10.4 per cent of the employe's gross salary up to $5,600 a year, shared equally by the employer and the employe.

"It should also be noted that for a married man with two children earning $5,600 or more a year the Social Security tax increase for 1965 of $64 would more than wipe out the entire income tax cut provided for 1965 income, producing for him a total tax increase in 1965 rather than a tax cut. Furthermore, the total Social Security tax increases specified in the Senate bill through 1971 will just about cancel out the entire 1964 and 1965 income tax cuts for such a family man.

"Nor is this by any means the entire story. Our preliminary calculations indicate that tax increases even greater than those provided in the Senate bill would be required to pay for all the health care and old-age benefits specified in the legislation.

"It should be further understood that the Senate bill provides only limited hospital and nursing care benefits. In future years demand would undoubtedly arise for more expensive coverage and liberalized benefits and this could result in still higher Social Security taxes than those in the pending legislation.

"In some European countries, for example, taxes for such social welfare programs approach 20 per cent of total taxable national payroll.

"In view of the probable immediate costs and the probable future costs the public as a whole should have a vital interest in the pending measure."

AMA Reported Under Tax Investigation

CHICAGO (PAI) — Officials of the American Medical Association aren't talking about it, but there are reliable reports here that the Internal Revenue Service is studying its tax exempt advertising in its 13 publications.

The Bureau is interested in tax-exempt magazines published by other tax exempt institutions which publish magazines carrying millions of dollars worth of advertising each year. But attention is centered on AMA headquarters here, believed to represent the largest tax-exempt publisher in the United States.

While the Journal of the American Medical Association is probably its best-known publication, the AMA also publishes other magazines ranging from the 8,000-circulation Otolaryngology to the 800,000 circulation Today's Health, a layman's magazine.

Last year the Journal carried 5,262 pages of ads, well up among the top advertising media in the United States. In 1963, the AMA received more than half of its total income of $22,500,000 from its tax-exempt publications.

The Internal Revenue Service has received complaints from commercial trade magazines that they can't compete with the AMA's advertising rates when they have to pay normal taxes and the AMA doesn't.

Predictions have been made here that the IRS will propose regulations that would impose taxes on such tax-exempt advertising and non-member subscriptions. These would not affect publications of fraternal and veterans' groups.

Your Child

Your Child and His Attitudes

By DONALD M. MAYNARD

Once upon a time there was a father who had no interest in bugs or crawling things. In fact, he didn't like them. To him they were objects to brush quickly from one's clothes, and to avoid when possible. One evening his young son, who was having his first experience with catching fireflies, rushed up to him and asked him to hold a firefly he had just caught. The father's first inclination was to withdraw his hand quickly and to refuse his son's request with an exclamation of disgust and irritation. Fortunately, he caught himself just in time, and gingerly held the firefly in his hand, and then another, and then still another, as the son delightedly continued what was to him a thrilling experience.

It is worthy of note that this young boy continued his interest in all phases of nature, and today, many years later, is carrying on significant research in the field of zoology and teaching in one of the great universities of our land. The father has been grateful through the years that in this every-day, and yet crucial experience with his son, he did not pass on to him his own attitude of dislike for bugs. How easy it would have been for him to transmit the feeling to his son that bugs and crawling things were to be avoided, or to be crushed and killed. And how impoverished the life of the son would have been had the father's attitude been passed on to him.

The purpose of this illustration is to remind us that it is during the formative years of a child's life that many of his basic attitudes are established, attitudes that will do much towards determining whether or not he has confidence in himself, whether or not he has wholesome attitudes towards others and can get along with them, and the kind of values around which he builds his life. As a parent contemplates this responsibility, it is almost frightening.

But it is equally important that we do not let this illustration give us the wrong impression. Important as the parents may be in the formation of children's attitudes, he is not the sole determiner of them. Other people, the child's peers, and his first hand experiences with objects and people in his environment, all influence him. This particular boy, for example, even though he had at first caught from his father a dislike for bugs, might have changed when he discovered that many of his peers were interested in objects of nature. A teacher in the school might have directed him into many interesting contacts with, in this case, bugs, and later on the teaching of science in school might have created an interest in the whole field of zoology. Nevertheless, the influence of parents, especially during the earlier years, is likely to be more important than any other factor.

By the term "attitudes," we are thinking primarily of the feeling that a child or a person has towards objects, events, people, or ideas. It is the feeling aspect of attitudes that is as important. And although it is true that we feel more intensely about some things than others, we think of an attitude as having an intensity of emotion connected with it that leads to a certain type of behavior. Attitudes give direction to our behavior and our lives. If I have a favorable attitude towards someone, I want to be with that person, in my behavior I tend to approach him. If I have an attitude of dislike, I try to avoid the person, and I tend to go away from him. I tend to be favorably inclined toward the ideas of people whom I admire and like; I tend to be critical of the ideas of those whom I do not like or admire.

It is important, then, for you to ask yourself two basic questions: What are the more basic attitudes I want my child to develop? And second, what part do I have to play in the development of my child's attitudes?

The child is not born with attitudes about people or ideas. He is not born with prejudices toward others; he is not born with a deep-seated sense of inferiority. These are attitudes that are acquired, that grow out of his experiences. Because they are acquired, they may either be prevented in the first place, or changed after they have been developed. This, of course, is why you, the parent, have such a significant role to play. Your child is in your care during the formative years when many of the most basic attitudes are created.

As you think of your child and his attitudes, keep in mind the following:

I. Your child, very early in life, learns to behave in ways that bring about the gratification of his needs, some of which are physical, others psychological and social. He discovers that how well they are satisfied depends upon how well he gets along in his interpersonal relationships which, for a small child, means with you, the parent. The behavior that he discovers is pleasing to you becomes associated with certain attitudes. These attitudes consequently influence his future interpretation of his environment and create within him a readiness to act in a certain way.

Your child, for example, has a great need for your approval. If he discovers that whenever he exercises initiative and resourcefulness in his play, or manifests great curiosity about the world of nature and of people, you seem to be a bit irritated and express your disapproval, he may decide that it is better to stifle creative thinking and curb impulses to express himself freely and enthusiastically. He is likely to develop a basic attitude towards life that says life must be lived cautiously, rather than with an adventuresome spirit. In the future, therefore, he responds negatively to creative opportunities.

Again, in his play with his peers it is inevitable that he should run into conflicts and difficulties. This is a normal part of the process of learning how to get along with others. But one evening he comes home and says he has been in a fight, and he speaks disparingly of his adversary. It soon is revealed that the boy is one of another race, or creed. You may not realize it but this may be a very crucial moment in your child's life. How you respond to the situation may determine whether your child develops racial prejudice or exemplifies a feeling of tolerance and appreciation for others. If you, too, speak with contempt for the lad of another race, and encourage your son to feel that he is "no good" or inferior, the seeds of racial prejudice may be firmly entrenched. On the other hand, if you show disapproval of such evidences of racial prejudice, your child's attitude towards others may become one of respect and appreciation. Behavior, you see, helped influence the development of attitudes, which attitudes, in turn, influenced future behavior.

II. Although your child's attitudes may be affected by what you say, other means of communication are likely to be more effective. And of course what you do is more important than anything else. But do not forget that it is important that you offer verbal expressions of approval and appreciation to your child. Do not take for granted that he knows you love him and are proud of him. Tell him so, in no uncertain terms.

Far more important than your words, will be the more subtle means of communication. The smile on your face and the light in your eye as you congratulate your son on something he has done, are far more significant than the words you may utter. And a scowl, or a shrug of the shoulders, or the pursing of the lips when your child shares with you a mediocre report card conveys your disappointment more eloquently than scolding or recrimination. Saying nothing in such a situation may be more devastating to the spirit of your child than the honestly facing of the facts in the situation.

Actions have special significance as you try to help your child develop wholesome attitudes toward religion. You can tell your child that you believe in God, but if in the telling you are unenthusiastic and seem to be expressing shibboleths that you have learned, your child is not fooled. If, in addition, he sees no evidence that you ever pray to God; if you never speak of Him in connection with the ongoing life of the family; and if your grace at the table is purely perfunctory, he soon senses the fact that God isn't a very vital factor in your life. You can take your child to church school and tell him it is good for him, that you went as a child. If you then return home to read the Sunday paper, and do not bother to attend the services of your church, your son will look forward to the time when he is big and can stay home. In other words, your child's attitude toward religion is likely to reflect your own.

III. Your child will tend to assume the attitudes of persons and groups with which he identifies himself. When he is small, you may note that he frequently expresses the attitudes of a beloved character in his favorite story. Later on he tends to emulate the athletic heroes with whom he identifies himself. There is considerable evidence that children who watch television extensively reflect the attitudes of their favorite characters.

In later childhood, and especially during adolescence, your child will be particularly concerned about the approval of those who belong to a special group of which he is a part. Sometimes the expectations and attitudes of these peer groups are quite different from your own. Your child thus finds himself in a quandary. He wants to please you—although this may be news to you—and he also wants the approval of his group. He may find himself vacillating between espousing the attitudes of the group, and those of the home. He may be genuinely concerned as to what is right or wrong, as attitudes are closely related to values. Try to be as sympathetic as possible with him in his predicament. Watch for moments when you can share with him the reasons for your attitudes; give him a chance to express his own viewpoints, and encourage him to make up his own mind.

Recognizing the importance of peer groups upon the formation of attitudes, it is perfectly proper that you should be concerned about the groups to which your child belongs. You will try to provide for your children friends and companions whose basic attitudes you deem to be commendable, although they may not always be identical with your own.

IV. Far less important than the influence of peer groups, is the influence of logical argument, or the acquisition of factual information, although they both have some influence upon attitudes. Encourage your child to think logically and to get the facts that form the basis of judgment and thus of attitudes. Remember, however, that these are not all important. It may be well, also, to remember that the attitudes of your child will not be markedly changed by threats or punishment.

V. Your child's first-hand experiences with his environment help determine his attitudes toward himself and others. A child who is guided into a creative activity in which he achieves something that seems to him and to others to be significant, develops confidence in himself. Happy experiences with those of other races provide a foundation for attitudes of respect and appreciation for them. A role-playing experience in which he tries to feel as others feel, may bring about changes in his attitudes.

VI. Do not forget the influence of the community in which you live upon your child's attitudes. In your efforts as a citizen to see to it that you have honest officials, that your schools and teachers are held in high regard, and that throughout the community there is respect and appreciation for the various racial and religious groups, you will be trying to provide your child with that kind of an environment which will help produce wholesome, worthwhile attitudes.

And these words, which I command
Thee this day,
Shall be in thine heart,

And thou shalt teach them diligently,
Unto thy children,
And shall talk of;

When thou sittest in thine house,
And when thou walkest by the way,
And when thou liest down, and
When thou riseth up.

PRAYER IN UNISON:

Almighty God our Heavenly Father, who has set the solitary in families, we commend to Thy continual care the homes in which Thy people dwell. Put far from them every strain of prejudice, every root of bitterness. Fill them with faith virtue, patience, knowledge, Godliness. Turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to the fathers.

We praise Thee for renewing Age with the company of Youth, Bless their vision of a New Time, grant that they may be strong; that Thy Word may abide in them that they may run a straight race, and not be weary. ...Amen.

"If all the girls in the world took hands,
beginning here with me,
It would make a line exceeding fine that would reach from sea to sea;
If all the boys in the world took hands,
stretching from shore to shore,
It would make a circle of friendliness where wars could be no more."

My family resides in a segregated society, where even to be a "moderate" is to be suspect, and where "One Worlders" are referred to with contempt. From such a situation many people, both white and colored, seek to escape by moving. Every section of our land is faceing its greatest struggle, and its greatest opportunity, at the same time. I want to remain in my community to share the struggle and the opportunity.

... Wherever I am, I try to teach my children, by precept and example, to respect persons as persons, and as children of God.

... We have a globe in our home, and some large maps: one of the United States and one of the world. We have a picture of the flags of the United Nations. Three of our children can associate flags and nations.

... One daughter is a member of the World-Wide Doll Club and receives periodically a doll from some different country, along with an explanation of the customs of that country.

... Our family watches together some TV programs, one of which is the World Series in baseball. Sometimes it is amazing how many different nationalities and ethnic groups are represented by the players. Another program which we see together frequently is the World News Roundup. By this means we travel here, there, and yonder around the world. We become more aware of places and problems, though, than we do of conflicts among persons of other races and backgrounds.

... We sometimes count, and locate on the map, the date lines to the front page of the newpspaer. Our family uses various devotional guides. Occasionally THE UPPER ROOM has a"World Fellowship Number."

Human rights are more basic than states' rights. The state does not create rights; its task is to make fraternity and conditions which support equal rights secure for all its citizens. We can't legislate morality, but we can and should develop and support legislation which encourages and supports morality. There is a natural "consciousness of kind" but it need not be "unkind." Each person, as a child of God, has the right of equal opportunity for full self realization. Intelligence, mutual respect, and co-operation are musts for survival. They are necessary if we are to build a good society, and more necessary still if we are to take seriously the discipleship of our Lord who calls us to prepare the way for the gift of the Kingdom of God.

THE OTHER AMERICA

POVERTY AS A SEPARATE CULTURE

Traditionally, America has been the land of opportunity and mobility. To be an American was to live, regardless of existing circumstances, within the context of a culture of hope. But what happens to people when there is no hope? Today, Mr. Harrington believes, there are many for whom the American dream is no longer true. Their poverty is not a temporary condition: they live outside the patterns of opportunity and mobility.

Mr. Harrington is the author of The Other America: Poverty in the United States and was until recently the editor of New America.

Michael Harrington

"Poor people in the United States of America are different. They can easily be defined in terms of their income. But that doesn't tell you everything about them. Poor people are different in terms of psychology, in terms of a way of looking at the world. Poor people live in a separate culture, in a vicious circle, in a downward spiral. It is not enough simply to change the income of the poor. One is dealing, when one deals with poverty in the United States, with a total problem of a way of life. Therefore, it is a problem that can't be disposed of by the simple expenditure of funds or the material construction of a building. It is a problem that can only be dealt with if we have the ingenuity and the vision to actually break through that culture and offer a new way of life to these people. . . .

"One of the problems of our society is, in many ways, that we no longer see the poor. And, if we are to do something about poverty, the first thing we have to do is to get people to see it; to understand that it is still there; to break through the myth and the fantasy that we live in a society of affluence, where everyone is all right. We live in a society where the development of our cities, the flight from the central city to the suburbs, has removed practically the entire middle class from contact with poverty. Poverty is no longer 'across the tracks' in our society. Poverty is now miles away, segregated . . . and not only in racial terms.

"Therefore, we must get people to see it. We live in a society where we have probably the best dressed poor the world has ever known. We don't live in a society of rags. One of the few things the American poor can get fairly decently is clothes. Therefore, we don't see the poor."

For the first time in history, the poor are a minority. When the poor are a majority, they have a break because everybody has to be concerned with them. But when the poor are a minority it is possible that their plight is worse, because there are fewer of them and it is possible to ignore them. It is possible to run the society, to have the growth and production, to have two-thirds who are happy and content, and simply forget about the rest of the society.

"There are signs that there is a developing consciousness about poverty. We have a Congressional Joint Economic Committee report that states that 32 million Americans, 19 per cent of our population, are poor. That figure is derived by a very modest definition: by setting $2,500 as the income needed for an urban family of four. . . .

"We have a recent report by the Conference on Economic Progress [see Current, July 1962, Readers Service] that estimates that 77 million Americans, that is to say, 40 per cent of the population of the United States, are either poor or deprived; that is to say, live at a level much lower than is necessary for a decent existence by our standards.

"But the point with poverty is not to get involved in a numbers game. . . . Take any one of these figures and you have a scandal. More than that, it seems to me, if anything, the prospect for the poor in our society is a grim one. As things stand now, things will get worse for the poor before they get better. We live in a society where automation is destroying jobs and will destroy more jobs. We live in a society that has already tolerated unconscionable new poverty: in the coal mining areas in West Virginia and Pennsylvania; among automobile workers in Detroit; among packing house workers in Chicago. And the process that has been creating new poor people in the midst of an affluent society is not going to stop. If anything, it is going to accelerate.

"Moreover, we live in a society in the West, among the advanced nations of the earth, that today has the lowest growth rate of any society, and when a trend of that kind develops, it means fewer jobs, fewer new jobs.

"We live in a society that has, among all of the advanced nations, with the exception of Canada, the highest rate of chronic unemployment to be found in the Western world, a rate of unemployment four times greater than that of the countries of the Common Market, for example. You will find no country in Europe with unemployment over 2 per cent. You will find some with less than 1 per cent. And, in the United States, for years now, our unemployment has not dropped below 5 per cent. It is the goal of American policy now to hit a level of unemployment that, if reached, will still be three times greater than that currently prevailing in Europe: a goal we look forward to as an achievement.

"As a result of this automation and unemployment situation, you have . . . one special group that is literally stricken with social havoc: the young people. . . . We know now that these young people, barring considerable changes in our society, are already, . . . at 16, 17, 18 years of age, condemned to be poor for the rest of their lives. This is so because we live in a society whose skill level is moving up and up; yet these young people have dropped out of school. . . .

Yesterday's poor

"Poverty-stricken people form a culture. They have a special plight. In the old days in the United States, in the days of the great immigrant waves, it was possible to live in a slum and not be a slum dweller. Then you were part of a culture of hope, a culture of aspiration, which came from the old country. The slum was the center of a culture, of a religion, of a language—and of hope. There were, in the slums, the intelligent and the not so intelligent. There were those who wanted to break out. There was a mood; the great drama of American society was that the miserable slums at the turn of the century, in the period of immigrant waves, were way stations into the great society. Today that is no longer true.

"Today our slums are peopled by those who weren't part of history when it moved forward, who were rejected by progress. It is peopled internally by migrants and particularly by racial minorities who have problems the like of which no other groups have faced. In these slums, now, the way into society has become much more difficult. It used to be that there was a continuum of skill in American society and a young person who dropped out of school could go into the plant as a laborer and slowly pick up skill and become a machine helper; then take a course at night and finally become a tool and diemaker. In an automated society, that process is over. We now, more and more, have a chasm between those who are highly trained and those not trained at all. Those who, because of their birth, because of the accident of their birth, get the disadvantage of a lack of education and culture and are in a worse position than in any like situation in the history of our country.

"We have understood, more and more, that to be poor is to think and feel differently. George Gallup, in one of his polls, has found that the poor are more pessimistic about everything. The poor think World War III is more likely than do the middle class or the rich. The poor think that depression is likely. The poor think they won't take a vacation next year. The poor, given an option of predicting the future as a function of the present, assume it will be miserable.

"And we now have evidence that is contrary to the myth that the really terribly mentally torn people of our society live in the suburbs, suffering the anxieties of $15,000, $20,000, and $25,000 a year. That is not true. We have evidence from studies in New Haven and from the 'Midtown' studies in New York City that the life of poverty is a life productive of mental disturbances, neurosis, and psychosis: that the poor are not 'the happy savages' of an affluent society but, rather, that the poor are the greatest mental and spiritual and psychological victims of the affluent society—precisely because they are poor. We know the poor live in a vicious circle. They get sick more often, because they live under unhygienic conditions. They stay sick longer, because they don't have the money for the doctor and medicine. As a result of that, they are less capable of facing illness the next time it comes around. There is a downward treadmill that exists in the culture of poverty. . . . Suffice it to say that, in the United States of America, there is not simply poverty as a fact, there is poverty as a way of life.

"In order to approach this problem seriously, we need to think differently. We need to be radical, in the traditional sense of the word: we need to go to the root of the problem. Above all, we need to be comprehensive. If there is anything that is true about poverty, it is that you cannot attack it piecemeal. You cannot simply change one thing about a poor person's life and expect that you have made great progress. That is penny-wise and dollar-foolish—if you want to put it in the most actuarial sense of the word.

"We can build decent housing for the poor. We should. But, if, at the same time that we build a building that is nice, we leave the job situation the same; we leave medical care provisions the same; we leave these people isolated from contact with the great society—then we will have vitiated 90 per cent of what we have done. Because poverty is not simply this factor or that factor or the other—poverty in the United States is the interconnection between these factors. That is what is meant when when we say poverty makes a culture. If one is serious about attacking a culture, then one must think about it comprehensively. . . .

"If we are serious about abolishing poverty, we will understand that the first thing we have to do is bring the people I have been talking about back to society. And, to bring them back to society, we have to integrate them into society." ("Poverty in U.S.A.," Journal of Housing, Dec. 27, 1962) worth, N.Y., in the amount of $77,364. The contract was awarded by the U.S. Army Engineer District, N.Y. Subsequently the contractor submitted a claim for $5,825 additional compensation covering alleged extra work performed in installing 470 feet of 8-inch water distribution main with fittings and valves. The claimant corporation alleged that it was required to do the work by the contracting officer even though it was not required to be constructed under the terms of the contract, since the lease boundary line was not indicated on the pertinent drawing. The claim was denied by the contracting officer, who found that although the lease boundary line was not shown on the drawing, it was shown on a large scale portion of the same drawing and could be established readily on the other drawing by scaling.

The division engineer reviewed the claim and determined that an ambiguity existed in the drawings relative to the new 8-inch water line and that this was misleading to a reasonably prudent bidder and, therefore, the contractor should be compensated for this additional work under the contract.

Subsequently, new negotiations were made between the Corps of Engineers and the Middlesex Corp. and it was agreed that $4,000 was due the contractor. The Army had already allocated funds within $2,400 of the maximum allowable. The contractor was paid this $2,400, leaving a balance due of $1,600.

The report of the Department of the Army indicates that the only reason for not paying this balance was the absence of available funds and that "it would be against justice and good conscience for the Government to accept the work performed without compensating the contractor. Therefore, this Department interposes no objection to the bill."

In view of all of the foregoing, the committee concurs in the report of the Department of the Army and recommends that the bill, S. 1003, be considered favorably.

THIRTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF WOMEN'S LEAGUE OF ISRAEL

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the 35th birthday anniversary of the Women's League of Israel, an organization of 20,000 American women who have made extraordinarily fine contributions to America's interest in Israel and have taken many constructive actions for the benefit of the young people who are making their homes and seeking their opportunities there.

The Women's League has established centers in Israel which have been likened to our own "Y" centers, and at one time were characterized as "a home away from home, located in the spiritual home of all mankind, Israel," by the late Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt, during the course of one of her visits to the Holy Land.

I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a recent editorial by the Seven Arts Feature Syndicate of New York entitled "Memorable Anniversary," which summarizes the fine record of this women's group and lauds its accomplishments.

There being no objection the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORABLE ANNIVERSARY

The three and one-half decades of service to the young people of Israel being marked this year by the Women's League for Israel, which is now observing its 35th anniversary, covers a vital period in the life of the organization.

Since its official founding in 1928, the league has helped close to 50,000 persons in its five Israeli homes—one in Jerusalem, two in Haifa, one in Tel Aviv, and one at Nathanya, where it also mtaintains a training center for the blind.

Headed by Mrs. Ann Cahane-Neiditz as president, the league has accomplished a great deal. It has received and absorbed the newcomers, integrating the many victims of oppression and homelessness, training the handicapped to self-sufficiency, and now, is aiding future Israeli leaders and students from many lands to a university education in an atmosphere of freedom and democracy.

This year the league will complete construction of a new $500,000 three-unit university student center in Jerusalem at the Hebrew University, where it has already built dormitories, a student cafeteria, and donated funds to maintain a chair in sociology.

The league's history mirrors recent tragedies and joys of millions of the Jewish faith. Convinced as early as 1928, that no adequate housing existed for young women arriving to live in the Yishuv (Jewish settlements), the group pledged its resources to provide its first home for women in Haifa.

The tragic massacre at Hebron in 1929, brought the decision from Yishuv leaders that serious measures for self-defense of the settlements were needed. The league similarly decided that its building program must be accompanied by training and integrating facilities for the new immigrants. The Hitler holocaust increased the already speedy tempo of its work.

Its greatest satisfaction came of course with the arrival of the independence of Israel, for the organization had worked hard toward its achievement.

On its 35th anniversary I commend the league for its dedication and accomplishments.

DESEGREGATED HOSPITAL FACILITIES

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed at this point in the RECORD three papers of an article from the American Journal of Public Health, April 1963, entitled "Achieving Equal Opportunity in Use of Medical Service and Hospital Facilities." The papers are by Richard V. Marks, secretary-director, Detroit Commission on Human Relations; the Right Reverend Richard S. Emrich, bishop of Michigan, Protestant Episcopal Church, Detroit; and Dietrich C. Reitzes, Ph. D., deputy director, Commission on Youth Welfare, Chicago, Ill.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACHIEVING EQUAL OPPORTUNITY IN THE USE OF MEDICAL SERVICES AND HOSPITAL FACILITIES

(The need to make health services and facilities available to all regardless of race, creed, or national origin is today accepted as a basic principle of a democratic society. One of our national problems is the fact that this principle has not yet been fully implemented. The following three papers offer the experience of one community, Detroit, in endeavoring to deal with this problem as it affected the Negro population. Certain conclusions are drawn.)

I. THE CATALYTIC ROLE OF GOVERNMENTAL HUMAN RELATIONS AGENCIES

(By Richard V. Marks)

Basic to the medical profession and to a democratic society is the belief that medicine must be available to all men. In the Detroit area, local government has attempted to implement this principle and insure the availability of medical care to all persons regardless of economic status, race, religion, or national origin. We can give service to the financially distressed in public hospitals, but what can a community do to guarantee competent, adequate service to all persons seeking private medical consultation and treatment?

The Mayor's Interracial Committee, Detroit's first intergroup agency, addressed itself to this question early in 1952. In our area, as in many other urban centers, hospital facilities, medical personnel, and training opportunities were generally inadequate, and the problem of servicing the needs of the community's Negro population, which had doubled in one decade, was acute.

Many persons in our community voiced the belief that racial discrimination within the field of medicine was placing minority group members at a disadvantage and that this inequity must be eliminated. The occasion of our city's first study of hospital facilities, resources, and needs in relation to our total population became the focus around which these community concerns were expressed. When the study of needs was complete and a plan for using Federal funds in conjunction with the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act was initiated along with the raising of $19 million in private construction funds, the issue of "who" would participate became a question of communitywide significance.

This was clearly a situation which deserved the attention of the medical profession and the city's intergroup agency. The Mayor's Interracial Committee and its successor, the Detroit Commission on Community Relations, were assigned a responsibility "* * * to promote good will, and to cultivate responsibility for the common welfare." It "shall seek to correct situations * * * endangering the peace and welfare * * * or to be unjust and discriminatory." It shall do these things "* * * through negotiation and conciliation."

In fulfilling its responsibility, the commission attempts to find community solutions to community problems and depends upon civic leadership and support in these undertakings. With the belief that discrimination in health services is unjust and causes dissatisfaction and tension in the community, the commission created citizens' committees.

The Medical and Hospital Study Committee was created in 1952, under the sponsorship of the Mayor's Interracial Committee, and accepted as its responsibility the task of surveying the racial factors in the field of medical training, service, and the facilities for the care of the ill in the Detroit metropolitan area. The factfinding activities of this committee were completed in 1956 with the publication of the Medical and Hospital Study Committee's Reports.

A second citizens' committee, the Advisory Committee on Hospitals, was established in 1957 to implement the recommendations of the study committee and seeks to correct unfair practices outlined in the original study.

The importance of the committee approach in solving community problems has been monstrated many times over, and the success of any committee program is dependent upon its personnel. It was the intent of the commission to bring together representative citizens of good will who had an appreciation for the problems to be studied and a desire to work toward a resolution.

Leaders in many fields have brought not only status to the program of the study committee and the advisory committee, but dedication to the goal of achieving nondiscrimination in all phases of medicine and hospital operations in Detroit. The varied interests in our community represented on the committees included business, labor, church, community (including minority groups) and professional, medical, nursing, and hospital leaders. With singleness of purposes, the membership reviewed racial factors in hospital policy and practice and explored logical and efficient means for eliminating discrimination based upon race, creed, color, or national origin. Persons were asked to serve who were involved in the problem and in its solution. At the outset they were chosen for committee membership on the basis of their recognition that a racial problem did in fact exist. Their job became one of honestly setting forth the facts and finding avenues of solution.

Within the framework of their general assignments, the committees functioned as autonomous groups, with complete freedom to shape their own policies, define the scope and form of the study, and the contents of their reports.

In the sequence of committee activity, the study was first defined through the selection of six specific areas for investigation. The survey itself was designed to determine the extent of the problem in each of these areas.

Institutions were asked to state policy governing selection of personnel and trainees in the areas of nurse training, medical training, medical staff, nursing staff, and nursing service, and hospitals indicated their bed assignment policies. Data, furnished and in some instances interpreted by hospitals and other training institutions, illustrated current practices in the areas under study. The committee in subgroups and as a whole analyzed all available information to determine if the patterns, as they emerged in the various categories, suggested the exclusion of or segregation of minority group members.

The study committee discharged its full responsibility in 1956 with the reports of findings, conclusions, and recommendations for the clarification and implementation of nondiscriminatory policies.

As a result of committee conferences, the State Office of Hospital Survey and Construction, in 1958, required a declaration and guarantee of nondiscrimination from all recipients of Federal funds. In 1960, the Detroit Area Hospital Council publicly supported our community goal and urged all member hospitals to adopt statements of nondiscrimination similar to the one suggested by the State agency. The Metropolitan Detroit Building Fund for Hospital Construction has also indicated a willingness to include a clear policy requirement in all contract agreements. Each report of the advisory committee marks a step toward the achievement of our eventual goal and recognizes the adoption of and demonstration of a nonrestrictive policy within a category of institutions. Thus in 1957, progress with the college nursing schools was reported; in 1958, the report of medical schools was issued; and the committee report of enrollment policies of hospital nursing schools was made public in 1959.

The committee began the resurvey of individual hospitals offering medical training programs in 1959. Here again, significant progress has been made as a result of lengthy negotiations. One major medical training hospital has not only adopted a satisfactory policy but has agreed to implement this policy through a program of informal recruitment of qualified Negro medical school graduates.

In none of its negotiations has the committee advocated the revision of professional standards; the emphasis has been upon the application of these standards without regard to race, creed, color, or national origin.

Detroit's redevelopment project application for the medical center area provided a situation for accelerating our community goal of equal opportunity in medicine. The chairman of the advisory committee and commission staff participated in conferences, convened by the mayor of Detroit, to discuss and resolve the community controversy arising over the use of Federal and city funds for the expansion of institutions charged with the practice of discrimination. In early 1961, the four hospitals within this area, all offering medical training programs, submitted declarations of commitment to a policy of nondiscrimination in all phases of their operations. Not all these hospitals are moving ahead "with deliberate speed." At least one of these hospitals is acting on its pledge with such reluctance as to endanger the entire program.

The business of changing established practices in our society is slow. Such attempts meet with organized and individual resistance. The progress we have made, however, strengthens our position as we meet new situations.

Next steps in our program include contact with Blue Cross-Blue Shield and the medical society to ask for their active endorsement of democratic practices within the profession, continued conferences with hospitals offering medical training opportunities to urge a clearly demonstrated policy of inclusiveness, and contact with hospitals not offering training on the matter of staff appointments and bed assignment policies.

Detroit has benefited greatly through the operation of its citizens' committees. Outstanding persons have given of their time and influence to become knowledgeable in the area of medicine, to plan a realistic corrective program, and to carry out this program with determination. These committees have successfully interpreted the concerns of the community to hospitals and other institutions and have helped the community understand better some of the administrative and professional problems within the field of medicine.

Over the past 9 years, Detroit has been investigating itself to define the real problem in the area of discrimination in medicine and attempting to correct practices which are unjust and which create tension in our community. Our goal is as worthy of support and conscientious effort today as it was in 1952 and the problems which remain are as great a handicap to our city and the medical profession as the ones now behind us. We are grateful for the opportunity to discuss and describe our methods and techniques in the belief that our success can be duplicated in other American communities.

II. ACTIVITIES OF THE CITIZENS' ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON HOSPITALS OF THE DETROIT COMMISSION ON COMMUNITY RELATIONS

Background

The medical and hospital study committee was created in 1952 for the purpose of reviewing racial factors in hospital policy and practice and recommending logical and efficient means for eliminating this problem in our community. The committee was sponsored by the mayor's interracial committee, predecessor of the present commission on community relations. Staff services for the study committee were provided by the interracial committee. Following its review, the study committee, composed of 35 distinguished citizens representing all aspects of Detroit's community life, issued six reports on the major phases of hospital and medical services: nurse training and employment; medical training, including medical schools and internship and residency training programs; medical staff appointments; and bed utilization and assignment practices in 47 Detroit area hospitals. In its reports, the committee dealt only with the scope of the problem; it did not single out any hospital or institution by name. The medical and hospital study committee completed its work in the summer of 1956, when it submitted its reports of findings and recommendations to the Detroit Commission on Community Relations, and thus to the public.

The study committee found some serious problems in the areas studied. For example: only two of the nine hospital-affiliated nurse training schools had any record of consistent enrollment of qualified Negro students. Only 4 of the approximately 20 hospitals offering internship training had any record of accepting Negro interns. Comparatively few of the 170 Negro physicians in Detroit held staff appointments in the voluntary nonprofit hospitals. Except for governmental hospitals, patient segregation in wards and semiprivate rooms was the prevailing pattern.

Advisory committee on hospitals

In 1957, the commission on community relations created the present advisory committee on hospitals to implement the recommendations made by the study committee. Its goal is that Detroit lead the Nation in achieving a completely nondiscriminatory, equal opportunity system of medical and hospital practice. The 20 members of the committee are leaders in business, labor, medicine, nursing, and the religious and civic life of the city. Staff services for the committee are provided by the commission.

The advisory committee has approached the problem on three levels: (1) The individual hospital or institution; (2) hospital planning and funding organizations; and (3) governmental action.

Achievements

1. On the level of individual hospitals, the advisory committee concentrates its attention on one category of hospitals or institutions at a time. Thus the 2 schools of medicine, the 2 colleges of nursing, the 7 hospitals now offering nurse training, and the 10 additional hospitals offering internship and residency training programs have been resurveyed as groups by the committee. Where necessary, negotiations have been undertaken with the administration and board of trustees of institutions whose practices have been found to fall short of the standards enunciated by the study committee. When the resurvey and negotiations are satisfactorily completed for the institutions in a category, the advisory committee submits its report on the institutions to the commission on community relations. At this time, the committee reports become public information.

Following this procedure, the advisory committee has reported that the Schools of Medicine at Wayne State University and the University of Michigan and the Schools of Nursing at Mercy College and Wayne State University have demonstrated their openness to all qualified students. The report on the seven hospital-affiliated schools of nursing stated that six had satisfactorily demonstrated nonrestrictive policy and practice in admission to the schools. The board of trustees of the seventh hospital assured the committee that the enrollment of its school of nursing would reflect an inclusive pattern of admissions at the earliest opportunity. Subsequent to the publication of the committee's report that school enrolled its first Negro student nurse.

The committee is presently resurveying and conducting negotiations with hospitals offering internship and residency training programs. The committee is now concentrating its attention on negotiations with the major teaching hospitals in the Detroit area. Progress is slow, partly because of the unavoidable lag between the making of a policy decision and the demonstrated implementation of that decision, and partly because of reluctance on the part of some institutions to recognize any responsibility for the solution of problems called to their attention, or, in some cases, to recognize the existence of such problems. To date, no hospital has been certified by the committee as being free of discriminatory practices in all phases of its operation.

2. On the level of hospital planning and funding organizations, the advisory committee has concluded an agreement with the Michigan Office of Hospital Survey and Construction that, pursuant to its obligations under Federal law, no hospital would receive public funds for the construction of any facility unless it could provide guarantees that it was either operating without reference to race in the service of people, or could guarantee and covenant that it would so operate. The State office developed a model resolution of nondiscriminatory policy whose adoption is required of hospitals seeking funds under the provisions of the Hill-Burton Act. This resolution states:

"That the Board of Trustees of ——— Hospital does hereby certify that all phases of the operation of ——— Hospital shall be without discrimination against individuals or groups of individuals on the basis of race, creed, color, or national origin and that the administrator of ——— Hospital is hereby directed to take such action as is necessary to assure that ——— Hospital shall in fact be so operated."

Following this action by the office of hospital survey and construction the advisory committee called the resolution to the attention of the governing bodies of the hospital planning and coordinating agency and of the major fundraising organization, urging their endorsement and adoption of the policy resolution. Following exploratory discussions with members of the advisory committee, the executive committee of the Greater Detroit Area Hospital Council, Inc., adopted a resolution recommending nondiscriminatory policy and practice by member hospitals, and further recommended their adoption of the above resolution. The hospital council serves as the planning and coordinating agency for 70 member hospitals in the Greater Detroit area.

Similarly, at the advisory committee's suggestion and following discussions and negotiations with the committee, the allocations committee of the Metropolitan Detroit building fund moved to incorporate the resolution in its statement of principles and in its contracts with fund recipients. The building fund is a private organization which raises funds for hospital construction and expansion through the contributions of businesses, foundations, and individuals.

3. Early in 1960, the chairman of the advisory committee was invited to assist in the resolution of the community controversy which arose in regard to the medical center redevelopment plan. This urban redevelopment proposal calls for the clearing of some 200 acres in the heart of the city, and the development of a center for medical research, education, and service. At the Detroit Common Council's hearings on approval of the plan, three organizations endorsed the project as worth while, but would not permit the project to proceed until the practices of racial discrimination charged against three of the four hospitals, which would form the nucleus of the center, were corrected. At the suggestion of the chairman, the nondiscriminatory policy resolution quoted above was submitted to the boards of trustees of the four hospitals and adopted. This action was accepted by all parties, and the common council, on receiving the chairman's report of the action, approved the plan.

The events reported here represent significant progress toward the advisory committee on hospitals' goal of a completely nondiscriminatory, equal opportunity system of medical and hospital practice in the Detroit area. However, much work remains before that goal is fully realized.

III. THE DETROIT EXPERIENCE IN THE NATIONAL PERSPECTIVE

(By Dietrich C. Reitzes, Ph. D.)

Supply of medical personnel

An increasing U.S. population requires increases in the supply of trained medical personnel. This is particularly true for the Negro population of the United States. Without implying that Negroes should be taken care of by Negro physicians, it can be shown that, to a large extent, the medical care received by Negroes in this country depends upon the number and quality of Negro physicians. The number of Negro physicians in this country is inadequate. Negroes constitute approximately 10 percent of the entire U.S. population. Negro physicians, however, constitute only 2 percent of all U.S. physicians. Physician population ratios show that there are 132 physicians for every 100,000 population, but there are only 20 Negro physicians for every 100,000 Negro population in this country.

Without an increased effort to do something about this problem, the situation will not improve. While there has been an increase in the number of Negroes attending medical schools, particularly in predominantly white medical schools, Negro students still represent only about 3 percent of the total enrollment in medical schools. Less than 200 Negroes graduate from all medical schools a year. In regard to advanced training of Negro physicians, there has been an improvement. Negro physicians who are certified by the American Specialty Boards have increased 400 percent since 1947 to a total of 369. Yet, even with this increase, only 0.6 percent of all board certified specialists are Negroes.

Patterns of racial integration in medicine

Medical Schools

Today, the shortage of Negro medical students is due primarily to a shortage of qualified Negro applicants to medical schools rather than discrimination on the part of medical schools. This shortage, in turn, is due to:

(a) Discrimination at levels below the medical schools. This means the general problem of discrimination in our society and discrimination in educational opportunities at the lower levels.

(b) The opening up of other professional opportunities for qualified Negroes.

Internships

At the present time this provides no problems for Negro graduates of medical schools. Under the old ghetto system a Negro medical graduate was forced to serve his internship in one of about 10 approved Negro hospitals or go without, save for occasional openings in big northern hospitals like Bellevue in New York City and Cook County in Chicago. Today, under what is called the matching plan, nearly all Negro medical graduates receive acceptances for internship at two, three, or even more hospitals, so that during the last several years the graduates of Howard and Meharry alone have been distributed to about 55 hospitals for their internships. Most of these hospitals have been in the North or West, but some, like the hospitals of the University of Texas and t Medical College of Virginia, have been in th South.

These increased internship openings have resulted chiefly from the fact that there are about 5,000 more approved internships than medical graduates annually. More liberal attitudes, however, have also been a factor.

Residents Training

Essentially, the same situation prevails here as regards to internships.

Advanced Training

The major problem in this area is to find qualified Negro physicians willing to do advanced work beyond board certification. National Medical Fellowships, Inc., which provides scholarships and fellowships for Negro physicians discontinued its program of advanced fellowship simply because there were not enough applicants.

Hospital Staff Appointments

There is general consensus among physicians and medical educators that the most important single factor which determines the kind of medical care that physicians can provide is the opportunity that physicians have for continued education through hospital affiliation. Since private patients are admitted to hospitals through their physicians, the accessibility of hospital beds to Negro patients is related to these appointments of Negro physicians. This is the area in which the problem of racial discrimination in medical care is greatest across the country.

Factors affecting integration in medicine on the community level

In 1956, we conducted a survey in 14 communities across the United States on the patterns of integration in medicine. In comparing the 14 communities, we found that in each the situation regarding integration in medicine was unique. Nevertheless, it is possible to isolate some of the key factors which make up the patterns.

The uniqueness of each community is the result of the particular way in which these key factors combine to form a particular pattern. The component parts of the pattern tend to be very similar. The main factors which we isolated were the following: (1) the presence and importance of predominantly Negro hospitals; (2) the presence of influential persons and groups actively interested in integration; (3) the existence of opportunities for Negro physicians to establish professional contacts with influential white physicians; (4) the strategy used by Negro physicians in obtaining hospital appointments; (5) the supply of well-qualified and well-trained Negro physicians; (6) the professional relationships among Negro physicians with particular emphasis on referrals; and (7) the general patterns of race relations in each community.

Of the seven factors no single factor was consistently related to the degree of integration found. This was so because in any given community the importance and significance of any of the above factors was greatly influenced by particular characteristics of the other factors in that community.

Implications of the Detroit experience

In Detroit the developments regarding integration in medicine demonstrate the significance of community awareness of the problem, professional contacts between white and Negro physicians, the interest of influential persons in integration, and action by Negro physicians in bringing about a higher degree of integration in medical facilities.

The relative attractiveness and promise of Detroit for Negro physicians was reflected in the fairly rapid increase in the number of Negro physicians since 1946: The 160 Negro physicians in 1956 represented an increase of 21.2 percent. Of this number 52.6 percent were under 50 years of age. Only in Gary, Los Angeles, and Indianapolis was a higher percentage of physicians under 50 years of age. In regard to training, Detroit with 17 board-certified Negro physicians was tied with Philadelphia for fourth place among the 14 communities we studied.

Community awareness

The previous papers have already clearly indicated a high degree of community awareness in Detroit which was focused on the problem of integration in medicine, as demonstrated in the Medical and Hospital Study Committee and the followup committee. Thus, Detroit provides an excellent example of the effectiveness of this approach.

Contacts between white and Negro physicians

The contacts established between white and Negro physicians were among the most important aids to achieving staff appointments at predominantly white hospitals in Detroit. A study of the 25 Negro physicians having such appointments indicated that 15—or 60 percent—had either attended the 2 medical schools in the Detroit area or had spent their internships and residency periods in predominantly white hospitals in Detroit. At these hospitals, they established professional relationships with white physicians which were directly responsible for their appointments to the hospital staffs.

In other cases, professional contacts established in governmental and predominantly Negro hospitals led to affiliations at predominantly white voluntary hospitals. For example, one Negro physician was helped in securing affiliation at a white hospital by staff members of this hospital with whom he had worked at the Veterans' Administration hospital. In another case, close professional relationships between the staffs of a white and a Negro hospital led to the appointments of at least three Negro physicians to the staff of the white hospital. In this instance, the superintendents and medical directors of the two hospitals were close personal friends; some of the key men at the white hospital also served on the staff of the Negro hospital; the chief pathologist of the white hospital conducted most of the meetings for the staff of the Negro hospital; and furthermore, the Negro hospital often used the laboratory of the white hospital.

In another case, a Negro physician was able to get a desired affiliation with a predominantly white hospital as the result of working with an influential staff member of this hospital at the Detroit Receiving Hospital. Still another Negro physician desiring affiliation with a specific hospital deliberately accepted an appointment at a clinic because this clinic was also serviced by important physicians from the hospital with which he desired affiliation. This technic proved successful, and after 2 years the Negro physician was able to get the appointment he wanted.

There was also a number of instances in Detroit where affiliations were secured because a Negro physician had studied or worked under white physicians of high prestige in other communities. We also found instances where Negro physicians on a staff were instrumental in getting other Negro physicians appointed.

In general, we found in Detroit that the majority of appointments to hospital staffs required that somebody on the staff be actively interested in pushing the application. A white hospital administrator made this point:

In every case where a Negro has been accepted he has been screened very carefully, and there was always somebody on the staff who had personal knowledge of the individual concerned and would speak up for him. It would be very difficult for a Negro to be put on the staff if he had not had previous contact with the white physicians already on the staff.

Interest of influential persons

In view of the prevalence of professional contacts between Negro and white physicians, there were comparatively few white physicians or administrators who appeared to be especially active in promoting integration. We encountered, however, two instances where integration in specific hospitals was clearly the result of the interest of key persons on the staffs.

In one case, the hospital was a very large one. Negro physicians on the staff pointed out that their appointments were directly due to the interest taken in their cases by the administrator. This particular person had been interested in integration for many years, but he felt that it should be encouraged by persuasion and education, rather than by determination of policy on his part. Consequently, his effect on integration in hospital appointments developed only slowly and required the operation of some of the other forces that have been discussed.

The other case concerned a medium-size, predominantly white hospital. A number of interviewees stated that the integration in staff appointments was the direct result of the personal interest in integration taken by the chief of staff of this hospital. He initiated the recruitment of qualified Negro specialists and insisted that they be given staff appointments. In this he also had the support of several of the department heads and thus was able to overcome the initial resistance of many white staff members.

Action by Negro physicians

The actions taken by Negro physicians in Detroit in order to achieve integration were an extremely important component of the Detroit experience.

Negro hospitals

The presence and the relative importance of Negro hospitals in a community are significant in two ways: they indicate the degree of integration in the community and they influence the integration process.

Predominantly Negro hospitals were absent in the six communities which had the highest degree of integration as measured by our index of the percentage of Negro physicians having appointments at predominantly white hospitals. These communities were: Gary, New York, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, Indianapolis, and Boston. Detroit, where Negro hospitals were relatively unimportant, was in seventh place, and the communities with important Negro hospitals followed.

Our data indicate that the presence of Negro hospitals influences the process of integration in two ways.

First, that Negro hospitals can provide a focal point for the self-segregation of Negroes. Such a hospital provides a place where Negro doctors can hospitalize their patients and thus reduces the doctors' needs to become affiliated with predominantly white hospitals. Furthermore, a predominantly Negro hospital provides a physical facility where Negro physicians meet, and this, in turn, can easily lead to the formation of a strong Negro ingroup, which may even resist integration.

Second, the presence of Negro hospitals reduces the pressure on white physicians and hospital administrators to admit Negroes to staff positions at predominantly white hospitals. The absence of Negro hospitals, on the other hand, puts strong pressure on whites to make some provision for the needs of Negro physicians and patients.

At the time of study in 1956 Detroit had three predominantly Negro hospitals which were approved by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals. These three hospitals had a total of 324 beds. In the total situation of medical services for the Negro community and hospital affiliations for Negro physicians, the three Negro hospitals were not significant either in the actual services they provided or in their influence on the actions of the Negro community. This is illustrated by the fact that an attempt to enlarge one hospital and make it a focal point for Negro physicians failed because of the lack of community support. There was no indication that the three Negro hospitals influenced integration in other Detroit hospitals either positively or negatively.

REPORT OF PANEL ON MENTAL RETARDATION

The panel created by President Kennedy to study the problem of mental retardation has published its report, "A Proposed Program for National Action To Combat Mental Retardation." The report defines mental retardation as "a group of complex phenomena stemming from many different causes, but one key common characteristic found in all cases is inadequately developed intelligence." Except in the very young, mental retardation can be distinguished from mental illness by the fact that it is usually present at birth or begins in childhood, whereas mental illness usually occurs after there has been normal development.

Severe mental retardation is frequently associated with organic defects and is usually fairly evenly distributed throughout the population regardless of socioeconomic status. On the other hand, mild mental retardation which constitutes the bulk of the cases can seldom, with our present biomedical technics, be associated with specific organic defects and cases are heavily concentrated in low socioeconomic income groups.

Some of the measures needed to combat mental retardation cited by the panel are: (1) more research regarding the causes of retardation and in methods of care, rehabilitation, and the learning process of the retarded; (2) better preventive health measures including strengthened maternal and child health programs, protection from known hazards in pregnancy such as radiation and drugs, and extended diagnostic and screening services; (3) educational and vocational programs for both children and adults geared to the needs of the retarded; (4) more comprehensive and improved clinical and social services; (5) development of a wide range of local community facilities for care; (6) a new enlightened legal as well as social concept of mental retardation; (7) intensified recruitment of professional personnel in all fields of science and service with provision of opportunities for them to acquire firsthand knowledge about mental retardation and the creation of a Domestic Peace Corps to stimulate voluntary service; (8) programs of education and information to increase public awareness of the problem of retardation.

The report is available from: Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D.C.; 65 cents.

Mr. JAVITS. I call attention to the very serious and most distressing situation which exists under the Hill-Burton Act, which, by the terms of the legislation itself, allows separate but equal facilities for whites and Negroes in hospitals as accommodating the requirements of the Hill-Burton Act. This act gives the Federal Government a very important share in the construction of new hospitals and presents a situation which urgently requires legislative attention. It is literally shameful that in this day and age, after the Supreme Court decision of Brown against the Board of Education in 1954, we still have imbedded in the Hill-Burton Act—and, incidentally, in the Morrill Act with respect to land-grant colleges—the separate but equal doctrine which has been struck down by the Supreme Court, and which has caused the whole structure of policy negating the idea that that represents the American way, which it definitely does not.

These articles show how urgently legislative attention is required. I would say that one of the greatest challenges faced by the Congress is whether it can exorcise this completely obsolescent and very damaging and harmful provision of law, or whether it must sit with its hands folded and allow a provision of law with which such a great majority of the country disagrees, and which the U.S. Supreme Court struck down as being contrary to our beliefs. The question is whether that provision must remain imbedded in the law because we do not have the necessary procedures or a way of manifesting our will to change it. I shall do everything I can to bring about such change. It is a real challenge to the Congress, and one of those challenges which will determine how the Congress stands in the eyes of the country. If we cannot cope with anything as elementary as that problem, it seems to me the country must take a very dim view of our capacity for running the country's business.

SIXTH ANNUAL OBSERVANCE OF LAW DAY, USA

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, today, May 1, marks the 6th annual observance of Law Day, USA. Observance of this day, inaugurated by the American Bar Association in 1958, and now designated by Presidential proclamation, gives us Americans an excellent opportunity to reaffirm our devotion to and respect for the great heritage of American law.

Embodied in our Constitution we find the basic tenet that we are a government of laws and not of men. Article V of the Bill of Rights assures each person that the Federal Government shall not deprive him of life, liberty or property without due process of law. The 14th amendment provides that the State government shall respect this same rule. Through the consistent and continuous application of this principle we assure the freedom and equality of every individual.

Due process of law is maintained and protected through our courts. These bodies interpret our legal ideals and maintain our traditional concepts of justice through the impartial application of these principles. While our rules of law and means for enforcing them are not perfect, they allow more personal freedom than any other system known to man.

Many people have been attracted to the shores of this Nation, knowing that in America they need not fear discrimination and tyranny. These immigrants have recognized and appreciated the climate of freedom and security which the Anglo-American tradition of law has been able to offer.

The occasion that we Americans are commemorating today is in sharp contrast to the observances presently going on in Communist nations. We reserve this day as a reminder of the many freedoms we enjoy as Americans, freedoms which are constantly protected by our body of laws. The Communists use this day for a raw display of power which serves to intimidate their people and to make them aware that the only rules guiding their government are rules of physical power, administered by men outside of a framework of law. There is no room in such a system for individual freedom and expression.

We must remind ourselves and the rest of the world that the strength of our system is based on far more than overt displays of physical force. It is our belief in the protection of human rights, rights which the Communists refuse to recognize, which can best express the idea that we seek to make peace and prosperity, with freedom, a living reality throughout the world.

To survive and to fulfill its purpose, our code of law and the Nation which it sustains need the support and dedication of the people whom they serve. Law Day provides us with an appropriate opportunity to reflect on the importance of law in the American way of life.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, today, as on every May 1st since 1958, the Nation is celebrating Law Day. It is altogether fitting that we should pause for a moment in this age of rockets and missiles, to give recognition to our system of law which is so basic to peace and order in our own society as well as in the world at large.

The purpose of Law Day is to help us to become more aware of the significance of the rule of law in the preservation of freedom and the maintenance of peace. Bar associations, civic groups, and private and public organizations across the length and breadth of the Nation will hold ceremonies today directed at fostering an abiding respect for law and providing an occasion for the American people to rededicate themselves to freedom.

Our observance will serve to focus attention on the rule of law where the rights of people are governed by established rules, where the essential interests of individuals are guaranteed through limitations on the authority of the state, and where disputes are decided by impartial courts. It will help to demonstrate to the world the meaning of reliance on the rule of law.

In his proclamation of January 28, requesting our people to observe today as Law Day and to participate in ceremonies suitably signalizing its significance, President Kennedy stated:

> In a time when all men are properly concerned lest nations, forgetting law, reason, and moral existence, turn to mutual destruction, we have all the more need to work for a day when law may govern nations as it does men within nations; when systemized reason may bring us a confident future; when moral development of the human race may assure us a peaceful and law-abiding world.

It is in this spirit and with this hope that we celebrate Law Day today, knowing how essential law has been to the preservation of our own freedom and believing that the greatest promise for the consummation of our expectations of peace and tranquillity for the future lies in the development of a system of law among nations.

"ANATOMY OF DECISION"—FICTIONIZED STUDY OF EXECUTIVE DECISION PROCESS IN AN INTERNATIONAL SECURITY CRISIS

Mrs. SMITH. Mr. President, 3 months ago on February 1, 1963, a written study was filed at the Air University at Maxwell Air Force Base, Ala., that is of specific interest with relation to the international Haitian-Dominican crisis of the past few days.

It was a fictionized study of the executive decision process in an international security crisis entitled "Anatomy of Decision." I think it is interesting reading on the interplay between the White House, the Department of State, and the Department of Defense on the making of vital decisions in time of crisis.

It is a unique piece of writing, for while it is fiction, it is documented fiction with some 225 citations from some 121 publications. Yet I think its achievement of sustained interest gives it the potentiality of an excellent 3-act play.

Because of the interest that I feel that Members of this body would have in reading it and because of the potential interest that students of government and international and military affairs might have in it, I ask unanimous consent that it be placed in the body of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANATOMY OF DECISION—A FICTIONIZED STUDY OF THE EXECUTIVE DECISION PROCESS IN AN INTERNATIONAL SECURITY CRISIS

(Prepared by William C. Lewis, Jr., brigadier general, U.S. Air Force Reserve, for completion of vol. II of course 4, War College Extension Course, Air University, February 1, 1963)

PART 1. DETECTION

Chapter I. Discovery

It had been a raw, bone-chilling day so typical of Washington in mid-March. The days were getting longer but that was not much consolation from the mixed weather pattern of snow, sleet, and rain—and those reckless impatient drivers, who literally panicked at the drop of the first snowflake—making the drive home even to nearby Georgetown a nightmare.

Scott Davidson sat by the warming fireside leisurely enjoying his nightly predinner martini with his attractive wife Martha, who had a knack for relaxing him with intelligent conversation about matters other than intelligence—Central Intelligence (14:57), that is. As his right hand stroked the soft hair of the head and back of "Cappy," the English setter, sitting by his chair, he gave a gentle sigh of relief with this fleeting peace of mind.

Central Intelligence Agency

For nearly 3 years things had not been going well for the CIA (91:31). Hindsight on the Quahog Bay invasion failure had cast such a shadow on the Agency for a year that his predecessor as Director had resigned in bitterness (5:7). Faulty intelligence had been a major defeat in the Abuc misadventure (94:68). Scott himself had been one of the critics pushing for the resignation—and when it came the President in a "put up

SUMMER OPPORTUNITIES FOR CHICAGO YOUTH

CHICAGO SUPPORTS YOUTH EMPLOYMENT ACT OF 1963

In a letter to a cross-section of civic, religious, business and labor leaders, Youth Welfare Commission Chairman, Patrick H. Hoy, urged them to check the proposals of the Youth Employment Act of 1963. He also asked that they write Congressmen and state their views about the proposed Youth Conservation Corps and the local area youth employment programs.

"The majority of responses shared with me," Hoy reported, "indicate that Chicago is aware of the employment problem facing many young people in today's increasingly more complex work situation and that interested citizens want to make sure that every possible measure is taken to help youth prepare themselves to take their rightful place in a productive society."

"The Youth Employment Act has earned the favor of most Chicagoans who work with young people in the inner-city."

Among those who shared opinions they had expressed to Washington were religious, industry, and labor groups, welfare agencies, parents' and youth groups, veterans' and community organizations.

Typical of the comments was a priest's, "If ever an ounce of prevention is worth tons of cure, it is in our present difficulty," and that the Bill, "if passed will keep our youth off the street, will arouse ambition and create self-respect."

Added indication of public concern with its passage was shown by numerous requests to the Commission from various organizations for hundreds of copies of the legislation.

Mr. Hoy stated, "Citizen support for the Youth Employment Act is high. It exceeds the response I had expected or hoped for."

(THIS BILL HAS PASSED THE SENATE, BUT NOT THE HOUSE. YOUR OPINION NOW, EXPRESSED TO YOUR REPRESENTATIVE COULD MAKE THE DIFFERENCE.)

FESTIVAL OF FUN

The city of Chicago offers an exciting array of leisure-time pleasure and profitable experience. For all who are young-at-heart—of every age—the choice of wholesome activity is as varied as the interest of youth.

Most of these recreational and educational attractions cost little more than carfare. Listed inside are 3 pages of ideas you can share with youngsters. They probably will suggest still others to you.

Most of these programs offer such long lists of things to do that we give only brief descriptions plus information about how to reach friendly folks happy to give you further help.

You will find this 3 page Bulletin Board poster handy as you help make CHICAGO A SUMMER FESTIVAL FOR ALL YOUTH.

THAT SIP MAY SAVE HER LIFE as south side girl gets Sabin polio vaccine from Board of Health Nurse. Commission Chairman Pat Hoy provided 5000 suckers for youngsters in drive. Full particulars of new polio drive on page 6, read it now.

NORTHWEST SERVICES

At the April meeting, the Commissioners, in order to stabilize city-wide services to youth, authorized an extension of CYW services to a portion of the northwest side.

Included are parts of the 26th, 27th, 28th, 31st, 32nd, and 34th Wards. This newest service will be activated as soon as qualified staff can be obtained.

ADMISSIONS PROGRAM

As part of its service to aid neighborhood youth agencies enrich both their program and their volunteer adult participation, the Commission on Youth-Welfare supplies limited numbers of free admissions to cultural, sports, and other activities.

For further information check with the Commission office nearest you (listed on page 4).

NEWLY APPOINTED COMMISSIONERS, William G. Klupar and Dr. A. Lincoln James, flank CYW Chairman, Pat Hoy, as he explains their duties.

COOPERATIVE CURFEW EFFORTS BY RADIO-TV

June 15 marks another first for Chicago radio and TV. Joint action will produce the same 10:30 p.m. weeknight time-signal over most Chicago stations.

"It's 10:30; curfew time for Chicagoland young people under 17. Parents, do you know where your children are?"

Conforming to the provisions of both the city and the county ordinance, the spot announcement will be heard at 11:30 p.m. on Friday and Saturday nights. It will continue for the 2 weeks around the closing day of Chicago public schools.

In no way a punative effort, the curfew announcement will serve to remind parents and their youngsters about their respective responsibilities toward each other.

The advent of warm weather and increased leisure time as schools close often results in young people's having more chances to be away from home at later hours. Since much of the serious trouble into which young people fall occurs late in the evening it is important that parents be aware of their children's activities.

The Commission's suggestion met with immediate cooperation by broadcasting media executives. The action of these business leaders, the interest of Captain Mike Delaney of the Chicago Police Youth Division and Captain Nate Klein of the County Police mark the increasingly more effective joint planning and effort now being carried on for the welfare of youth here.

WEST SIDE STORY

The Commission on Youth Welfare has opened its 8th Community Organization Intensive Service Office. Located at 1310 W. Roosevelt Rd., its staff serves the Near West Central area.

Community Unit Director Julian Schwartz and a staff of 3 are busy becoming acquainted with community residents and civic leaders as well as determining available area resources and local youth needs.

SURPRISED MAYOR DALEY accepts roses for his wife from youngsters after speaking to 500 participants at CYW's Midwest Community "LET'S CHECK PROGRESS FOR YOUTH" conference.

WOODLAWN YOUTH EXCHANGE

With a healthy assist from the Commission on Youth Welfare, two teen-age groups of different cultural and ethnic backgrounds have worked out an exchange program. They are enjoying joint recreational activities. Students of Lyons Township High School in La Grange, and a group of Woodlawn's Negro, white and Puerto Rican youngsters meet on Saturdays at different Woodlawn youth-centers or at the suburban school. They are making plans now to work together on a project to acquaint Woodlawn mothers with the importance of physical exams for children.

WILSON-CHI. TEACHERS' STUDENTS VOLUNTEER

Volunteer student tutors from Wilson Junior College and Chicago Teachers College are aiding a cooperative community effort to combat the problem of student dropouts at Englewood's Parker High School. Concerned over increasing dropouts among Parker students, officials of the school requested the Youth Welfare Commission for assistance. The Commission, which has been helping to develop means to combat the dropout problem on a city-wide basis, enlisted the support of officials at the 2 colleges. Forty-seven students volunteered to act as tutors in a study-center program for Parker students, some of whom, because of inability to keep up with their school work, were in danger of becoming dropouts.

The Rev. Lowell Mathes also secured volunteers from the Christian Student Movement, whose membership includes students of both colleges.

Adult supervision at the study centers is provided by the Parker PTA, while professional guidance is given the tutors by Mrs. Marie Truex, Dean of Students at Chicago Teachers College. Canaan Baptist and Union Tabernacle Baptist Churches provide meeting space regularly.

HEIGHTEN ACTIVITY IN COOPERATING SERVICES CENTERS

This Commission activity — bringing available resources to the individual child in trouble — has been tripled in North Lawndale. The caseload, now averaging 70 cases open at all times, is currently handled by a Director and 3 workers. Increased service was made possible by simplified methods and by addition of 2 well qualified Neighborhood Workers, Mrs Marguerite Chapman and Miss Alyce Farley.

OPEN GRAND BOULEVARD-OAKLAND

Working toward opening of another Cooperating Services Center, Unit Director Mrs. Emily Hawkins, is meeting with police personnel to develop operational procedures. On May 17 she met with the Youth Officer force of Area I.

She also is setting up lines of communications with Cook County Department of Public Aid, schools, and similar organizations.

FOR THE FIRST TIME, the Midwest Region, National Conference of Public Youth Agencies, met in Chicago. CYW Chairman Patrick H. Hoy was Master of Ceremonies. Surrounding him are some of the program participants:

Eugene P. Schwartz, Metropolitan Youth Commission of St. Louis; Erwin A. France, Chicago Commission on Youth Welfare; Lester Granger, Director, Youth Development Project, U.S. Children's Bureau, and John A. Troike, Chairman, Illinois Youth Commission.

NEAR-NORTH YOUTH EFFORTS

The CYW's Near-North Community Unit has a new Director. He is Wade Parker, whose 2 years of previous Commission experience was on the south side. In addition, a new Neighborhood Worker, Kenneth M. Bogusz, is now on duty.

Millard Hughes is now devoting 4 days per week to aiding the Joint Youth Development Committee, which is becoming increasingly active in the area.

NEWEST CYW PUBLICATIONS include a colorful poster, "WE OBEY THE LAW" produced to aid neighborhood organizations concerned about minors' obtaining liquor, and a one-page description of the functions of the Commission. These are free upon request.

MUSIC IS IN THE AIR on the south side, in Uptown, and here at Cooley Vocational High on the Near North side. An outstanding cultural opportunity for youth resulted from joint efforts of local groups and the Chicago Music Foundation with CYW help.

Almost no Chicagoans are protected against Polio Type 3. Other shots do not cover this common type of polio.

For persons without a family doctor, the Chicago Board of Health is providing free Sabin oral vaccine, one day only: SATURDAY, MAY 25 from 9:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m. It is absolutely painless; 3 drops on a lump of sugar.

The Commission on Youth Welfare is helping to alert local neighborhoods about the one-day drive and its vital importance to all children.

Because of the urgent need, especially by children (including pre-schoolers 3 months to 6 years) and young adults, more than 175 local stations will be operated, this one day only. Consent cards for children must be signed by family.

PASS THIS WORD ON TO EVERY FAMILY. THE CHILD WHO AVOIDS CRIPPLING POLIO THIS SUMMER WILL NEVER KNOW IT, BUT YOU MAY BE THE ONE WHO SAVED HIM.

Find the nearest Sabin On Saturday station here. Then bring (not send) every child in your neighborhood.

June 12, 1963

Dr. George M. Fister, President
American Medical Association
535 North Dearborn Street
Chicago 10, Illinois

Dear Dr. Fister:

Our nation is currently engaged in a great effort to assure equal opportunity and human dignity to all its citizens. Racial segregation and discrimination can no longer be tolerated in a society based on democratic principles.

In addition, racial segregation and discrimination in medicine and in health services lowers the quality of patient care and violates the ethics of the medical profession.

We, therefore, respectfully ask the American Medical Association, the most important and most eloquent spokesman of American physicians, to speak out immediately and unequivocally against racial segregation and discrimination. Further we ask the American Medical Association to use its dominent leadership position in the medical field to assure a prompt and orderly transition to full integration wherever racial segregation and discrimination exist in medicine and in health services.

In particular, we ask you, the President of the A.M.A., the other national officers, the Board of Trustees and the House of Delegates the following four questions:

1. Will you use your considerable personal and organizational strength for terminating the racial exclusion policies of State and County medical societies?

2. Will you make available direct membership in the American Medical Association to Negro physicians who are denied membership in their State and County medical societies because of their race, as has been requested for years?

3. Will you actively oppose the "separate but equal" clause of the Hill-Burton Act which provides Federal construction grants to hospitals and other health facilities when this Act comes up for renewal in the Congress in the next few months?

4. Will you instruct your representatives on the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals to vigorously urge that racial integration of patient services be added to the minimum standards for hospital accreditation?

Sincerely yours,

John L.S. Holloman, Jr., M.D.

Walter J. Lear, M.D.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION REGARDING RACIAL SEGREGATION AND DISCRIMINATION

This "Appeal to the A.M.A." has been conceived as a first step by physicians and other health workers towards assuming their important and special role in the nation's current struggle for equal opportunity and human dignity for all citizens.

This "Appeal" will achieve a maximum effect as those making it are willing to do so publicly and bodily, should this be necessary. Although an appeal of this type is not ordinarily used by physicians, the continued existence of racial segregation and discrimination in medicine and in health services does not permit us anything less than the maximum expression of our convictions in this regard.

Attached is the text of a letter we have sent to Dr. George M. Fister, President of the A.M.A. Copies of the letter have also been sent to the other officers of the A.M.A., its Board of Trustees and its House of Delegates.

If a positive reply to this letter is not received by Tuesday evening, June 18th, the public phase of the "Appeal" will take place on Wednesday morning in front of the Traymore Hotel in Atlantic City where the House of Delegates will be meeting. The public phase of the "Appeal" will be carried out in a manner appropriate for the traditional humanity and dignity of the medical profession confronting the inhumanity and indignity of racial segregation and discrimination.

If you would like to join us in this "Appeal" or support it, please fill out the following section and return it immediately to the above address.

John L. S. Holloman, Jr., M. D.

Walter J. Lear, M. D.

☐ I will participate in the public phase of the "Appeal to the A.M.A." at 8:30 A.M. Wednesday, June 19th in front of the Traymore Hotel, Atlantic City.

☐ I enclose $10. in support of the "Appeal to the A.M.A.".

(Please make checks payable to: Medical Committee for Civil Rights.)

Racial Amalgamation Propaganda Versus Segregation And Racial Cooperation

by Fred A. Ross, Commissioner, State Department of Public Welfare*

Madison Avenue "public relations" firms, New York, radio and television "commentators," certain college "professors," authors, and propagandists during the past thirty years have kept up a constant barrage of propaganda about "discrimination," "prejudice," "equality," "non-discrimination," "integration," and "anti-segregation" in a concerted effort to hide and conceal from the American people the differences which God ordained between the white race, the black race, and the brown, red and yellow races.

They actually advocate racial amalgamation though they coined a new word for it called "integration." God did not integrate or amalgamate these races any more than he integrated or amalgamated the fowls of the air, or the fishes of the sea, or the animal kingdom.

These highly skilled and clever propagandists have deliberately disseminated false propaganda to America and to the world that the white people of Mississippi mistreat Negro citizens, deny them "civil rights" and other benefits granted freely to Negroes by the white people of other states. Most of this propaganda to integrate which means to amalgamate contains half truths or whole falsehoods. The official records show:

PUBLIC SCHOOL[1]/

A special legislative session in Mississippi was called in 1953 to consider recommendations made by an 18 man committee study group in the field of equalization of educational opportunities for the races.

Legislation was passed abolishing all school districts and authorizing reconstituted districts to borrow up to 75 per cent of the money necessary to construct new schools or add to old ones where they were acceptable. The state issued full faith and credit bonds for the purpose of financing this program .

Provision was made to repay the indebtedness by earmarking $550,000 per month ($6,660,000 annually) of the Sales Tax collections. School districts would not actually repay any money to the state, but would be able to repay the construction loan by receiving credit for its ADA (Average Daily Attendance) funds. This was set by the legislature at $12 per child in average daily attendance. Each Negro child was given an additional $3, making $15, until 1964. After 1964 each child would receive from the state $12. This program is designed to amortize itself by 1982.

Since the program started, more than $100,000,000 in state funds has been provided and approximately $90,000,000 in local funds, making a total of approximately $190,000,000.

The $100,000,000 state funds loaned to school districts for construction has been expended in the following manner:

> Two thousand nine hundred eighty-seven (2,987) white classrooms have been constructed or are under contract. Cost of this construction is $36,048,396.45. In other words, 37 per cent of the state's funds is being spent for construction of white classrooms.
> Four thousand eight hundred eighty-two (4,882) Negro classrooms have been constructed or are under contract. Cost of this construction is $62,362,848.72. In other words, 63 per cent of the state's funds is being spent for Negro classrooms, although they constitute less than 45 percent of the state's population.[2]/

Is that "discrimination"? Is that Negro "prejudice"?

During the 1961-62 school year, the tax supported public school system census (ages 6-21) showed 329,215 white children; 337,871 Negro children attending. Discrimination?

In 1941-42 there were 11,971 white children in grade 12; in 1961-62 there were 14,904, an increase of 24.5 per cent. On the other hand, in 1941-42 there were 1,709 Negro children in grade 12; in 1961-62 there were 8,162, an increase of 377.6 per cent.[3]/ Is that race prejudice?

What do the records show concerning the training of teachers (Bachelor's Degree and above)? In 1943-44, there were 5,063 white teachers with a Bachelor's Degree or above; in 1961-62 the number increased to 11,058, an increase of 118.4 per cent. On the other hand, in 1943-44 there were 705 Negro teachers with a Bachelor's Degree or above; in 1961-62 the number increased to 7,382, an increase of 947.1 per cent. Is that race prejudice? Discrimination?

What do the records show concerning salaries (from state and local funds)? In 1941-42 white teachers received $5,383,054.80; in 1961-62 they received $40,601,189.00, an increase of 654.2 per cent. In 1941-42 Negro teachers received $1,565,988.39; in 1961-62 they received $25,107,469.75, an increase of 1503.3 per cent.[4/]

COLLEGES

During 1960-62, new buildings provided by state tax money for public higher education of white students amounted to $372.56 per student and for Negro students it amounted to $497.13 per student. Is that race prejudice?

Amount of state tax money allocated for educational and general support of public higher education, 1960-62: White institutions, $580.23 per student; Negro institutions, $622.40 per student.[5/] Discrimination?

What about college enrollment? In 1941-42 there were 5,845 white students enrolled in college; in 1961-62 there were 16,238, an increase of 177.8 per cent. On the other hand, in 1941-42 there were 589 Negro students enrolled in college; in 1961-62 there were 3,521, an increase of 497.8 per cent.[6/] Does that indicate racial bias, prejudice?

CHARITY HOSPITALS

From 7-1-59 to 6-30-61 Mississippi spent $577,877.00 for white charity patients in private hospitals; but, on the other hand, spent $662,952.04 on Negro patients.[7/] Is that race bias or prejudice? Discrimination?

"INTEGRATION" MEANS AMALGAMATION AND THE ABOLITION OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Here's why.

After the Warren Court decision of 1954, Dwight D. Eisenhower, Republican President at the time, proclaimed to the world that the Government intended to make the Washington public school system a model for racial "tolerance," "cooperation" and "good will" so that the communist doctrines preached by Madison Avenue Propagandists and the Warren Court would spread throughout America, particularly in the southern states.

Since then, what has happened?

Since that time, white people have been leaving Washington with their school children like rats escaping from a sinking ship.

The movement to completely change God's plan by the amalgamation of the races under the guise of "integration," "anti-segregation" and "non-discrimination," and "brotherly love," has caught the imagination as well as the impulse for publicity of some of our ministers—Jewish, Catholic and Protestant.

The blind is leading the blind. Communism is the principal, if not the only, beneficiary. The movement is promoted, in a few cases, by wolves in sheep's clothing!

How has the great "model of integration" for the world worked?

TOLL OF A RACE RIOT

Official investigation of the Thanksgiving Day riot at District of Columbia Stadium revealed:

INJURED number at least 316 whites, 30 Negroes—total 346. In addition, 145 persons reported being pushed, shoved, slapped.

SERIOUS INJURIES included:

Broken Nose	13
Broken jaw	2
Dislocated jaw	1
Teeth knocked out	4

All those seriously injured were white.

WEAPONS used included knives, chains, bottles, umbrellas, sticks and stones. The following types of attack were reported:

Cut or stabbed	20
Clubbed with a pipe	4
Struck with umbrella	29
Thrown down and kicked	29
Hit by sticks, rocks, bottles	60
Hit by fists or kicked	105

PROPERTY LOSS INCLUDED: 70 cars damaged; 5 purses snatched; 4 band instruments dented; numerous cases of torn clothing, broken spectacles, stolen articles. (U. S. News and World Report, January 21, 1963)

Tax assessment rolls throughout the state reflect that not less than 90 percent of the real and personal property in Mississippi is assessed to the white race. That means, of course, the white race pays at least 90 per cent of the ad-valorem taxes collected on such property.

The per capita earnings of the Negro race in Mississippi is only a fraction of what the per capita earnings of the white race is in Mississippi. That means, of course, the Negro race pays only a fraction of the total amount of excise and other taxes levied and collected in the State of Mississippi.

The undisputed facts are that the white population of Mississippi give, monthly and yearly, more money, goods and services to the members of the Negro race in Mississippi than do the white people of any other state in the United States when the comparable ability to pay taxes is considered.

For this, does the white population receive any thanks or appreciation? The answer is, "No."

They receive national ridicule and abuse through the dissemination of half truths and whole falsehoods by national news media.

The question arises as to how much longer the white population of Mississippi will consent to be taxed and drained of its substance for the benefit of a race, and a nation, which shows no appreciation for their sacrifices.

A simple majority of each House in the Legislature present and voting can pass a law authorizing the abolition of public schools on a local option basis.

A two-thirds majority of both Houses of the Legislature present and voting have the power to abolish public schools state-wide.

Only one vote more than two-fifths of the members of each House is necessary to discontinue making an appropriation for public schools throughout the state. We all know that when and if the money stops, school is out.

It is not unreasonable to predict that public schools in Mississippi will be abolished, and it will be done sooner than we think!

The white race possesses the brains, the wealth and the earning capacity to devise a system of private schools to educate its children.

The Negro race has not indicated enough interest in Prince Edward County, Virginia, or anywhere in the United States to devise a system of private education for members of its race.

NEGROES RECEIVE MOST FROM WELFARE DEPARTMENT

The Department of Public Welfare in Mississippi makes an annual study, usually in September, on the distribution of the number of recipients of public assistance, by type of assistance, by county, by race.

TOTAL CASELOAD, ALL PUBLIC ASSISTANCE

	September 1958	September 1962	% Increase
Total	110,757	115,612	4.4
White	44,311	44,935	1.4
Negro	66,239	70,440	6.3
Indian and/or Chinese	207	237	14.5

AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN PROGRAM

		September 1958	September 1962	% Increase or Decrease
Total	Families	17,203	20,304	18.0
	Children	51,352	62,839	22.4
White	Families	4,962	4,433	-10.7
	Children	13,307	11,842	-11.0
Negro	Families	12,154	15,774	29.8
	Children	37,854	50,770	34.1
Indian and/or Chinese	Families	87	97	11.5
	Children	191	227	18.8

There has been a steady decrease in the number of white families receiving this type of assistance from September 1958 to September 1962.

The total state appropriation is $3,200,000.00; available federal funds is $14,933,312.00 during the 1962-1964 biennium. The total funds available is $18,133,312.00 or $4.66 federal tax dollars for each state tax dollar spent for this purpose.

Is that racial "bigotry," "prejudice" or "discrimination"?

79.07 percent of the assistance money goes to Negro children; only

20.47 per cent goes to white children; and

.46 per cent of the money goes to children of Indian or other nationality.[8]/

Is that racial "prejudice" — "discrimination"?

SUMMARY OF AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN CASES REPORTED TO COURTS BECAUSE OF ALLEGED PATERNITY AND/OR SUITABILITY OF HOME JULY - DECEMBER 1962 [9]/

TOTAL ADC CASES REPORTED TO COURTS	898
1. Alleged paternity	728
2. Suitability of home	170
ALLEGED PATERNITY CASES REPORTED BY RACE	728
1. White cases	28
2. Negro cases	696
3. Indian cases	4
(above paternity cases involved 1,607 children)
SUITABILITY OF HOME CASES REPORTED BY RACE	170
1. White cases	12
2. Negro cases	157
3. Indian cases	1
(above suitability of home cases involved 614 children)
REASON CASES REPORTED FOR SUITABILITY OF HOME	170
1. Illegitimate pregnancy of mother	34
2. Birth of illegitimate child	82
3. Promiscuous behavior of mother	45
4. Other (intoxicating liquor in home)	9

Do the above figures indicate that it is our duty as Christians to "integrate" the races or listen to a propagandist who claims we "sin" if we resist man's "integration" which, of course, means amalgamation?

A simple majority of both Houses of the Legislature can abolish the Welfare Department.

Only one vote more than two-fifths of either House is necessary to discontinue making any appropriation of any description to the Welfare Department.

QUESTIONS AND CONCLUSIONS

We assume that Almighty God was and is impartial. He is no "respector of persons," according to scripture.

Why was the Negro kept in Africa for 100 million years by our Lord God as we are told by our scientists?

The Negro has had the continent of Africa, beyond dispute, since his advent upon earth, one of the richest in natural resources of any continent.

Why has the Negro not developed it, and filled it with the monuments of his greatness?

The Negro has been in contact with the oldest civilizations, including "Ur of the Chaldees," whence came Abraham; and in Egypt where he amalgamated with whites and then destroyed that civilization. He helped haul the stones for the great pyramids five thousand years ago; he served in the armies of Xerxes; he marched against the armies of Alexander the Great; he saw the legions of Rome march across his horizon; and witnessed the rise and spread of the Empire of the Saracens.

But the record shows that from this he learned nothing, caught none of the fire, or the visions, of the greatest of antiquity.

He lived in his jungle home; he worked his wife; he sold his children; he ate his brother.

We have been told thousands of times "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son," etc. (John 3:16). But, also Jesus said: "For the tree is known by its fruit," (Matt. 12:33).

It is reported that there have been over 200 cases of cannibalism recently in the Belgian Congo. Since the Belgians were forced out by the U. N. there have been several hundred murders, and wholesale rapes of white women and children.

Contrary to Madison Avenue propagandists and radio, television and press "commentators," the black man was not "stolen" but was bought from their captors.

The South took these black men, taught them to eat cooked food, to wear clothes, to work, exposed them to religion, and forced them to lead a limited moral life.

After 100 million years of jungle savagery before they were brought here, in less than 300 years of association with our civilization they have now been "raised," by the Warren court fiat, and brotherhood by bayonet by both Eisenhower and Kennedy from cannibals to the "equals" of the President, the Vice-President and the Chief Justice of U. S. Supreme Court.

Why? The hunger of politicians for votes!

Negro births are 25.4 per cent illegitimate; white births are 1.5 per cent illegitimate.[10/]

Does this fit Negroes for white schools?

During the seven year interval from 1955 to 1962 there was reported to the Mississippi State Health Department sixty-three thousand four hundred forty-three (63,443) cases of venereal disease. Four thousand one hundred seventy five (4,175) of these were white and fifty-nine thousand two hundred sixty-eight (59,268) Negro.

In 1955 there were ten thousand two hundred eleven (10,211) cases of venereal disease reported. Six hundred seventeen (617) white cases and nine thousand five hundred ninety-four (9,594) Negro cases.

In 1962 there were five thousand nine hundred twenty (5,920) venereal disease cases reported. Five hundred twenty-six (526) of these were white and five thousand three hundred ninety-four (5,394) Negro.[11/]

Does this fit Negroes for white schools?

Why does Mississippi, with separate schools, have more Negro college presidents and more Negro teachers than all eastern states combined?

According to "Personnel News" the monthly newsletter of the Public Personnel Association, although Negroes constituted in 1960 only 10.5 per cent of the total population of the United States, Negroes account for 13 per cent of the work force in Government service in the United States at the end of June 1962. This shows, conclusively the Negro receives not equal but preferential treatment in employment in Government service.

MISSISSIPPI IS NOT "BACKWARD" MISSISSIPPI IS FORWARD

Mississippi is really a great state. It has much for which it is thankful.

There are more churches per capita in Mississippi than in any other state in the nation.

It has the world's largest broiler plant.

The first can of milk ever to be condensed was condensed in Mississippi.

Mississippi had the first concrete highway in the whole Southland; there's no state that grows more commercial trees. Mississippi has the world's highest priced bull; the world's largest plantation; the world's champion corn grower; the world's largest pecan orchard; the world's longest man made beach. The first wood processing plant; the world's largest nursery.

Two Miss Americas in a row. Mississippi has in many fields been a pace setter!

Mississippi was the first state to abolish imprisonment for debt;

the first to give married women property rights;

the first to establish an Institution for the Blind and Deaf;

the first to establish an Agricultural and Industrial Institution for Negroes;

the first to support a college for women (MSCW).

Barnard College, Columbia University, in New York, was named for the Third Chancellor of Ole Miss.

Henry Hughes, of Port Gibson was the first American to publish a book on Sociology.

Mississippi was the first state to establish a consolidated school.

The town of Mound Bayou, Bolivar County, Mississippi, with approximately 2,000 citizens, officially became a town in 1902, a town of which all Mississippians are justly proud. Its crime record is among the lowest in our nation. Since its inception, and to the present date, Mound Bayou is the most completely segregated town in America. Its citizenry is composed entirely of Negroes, because by tradition and ordinances, no white person has ever been permitted to own property or to live therein.

There is less hunger and more happiness, less dirt and more dignity, and less poverty and more opportunity for all men and all women in Mississippi than any other state. There are fewer taverns and more churches!

You can look in the wrong end of the telescope and see nothing but the mole on the face of Marilyn Monroe. Come to Mississippi with a myopic lens in your camera, photograph molehills and you'll make them look like mountains.

Or, you can walk the stately streets beneath the ancient moss draped live oaks lined with modern homes to savor the traditional graciousness and sense the industrial aggressiveness where two rivers run both ways — prodded by yesterday's poverty and lured by tomorrow's opportunity. It takes a wide angle lens to get the whole picture of Mississippi.

The American way of freedom—What is it?

3. It is opportunity regardless of economic status.

The idea that the American laboring man is a poor, bedraggled, enslaved automaton, suffering under the capitalistic heel of oppression is an absurdity. Some of those broadcasting such ideas have gone elsewhere on the globe but soon returned disillusioned about their utopian dreams.

To assert that the little man hasn't a chance anymore cannot be substantiated in fact.

A Chinese Buddhist immigrant came to America in 1927. He went to New York and drove a truck for 3 years. He saved enough money to make a downpayment on a small restaurant. The business began to grow. We are advised that his business is now worth more than $250,000. This Chinese truckdriver, who came to free America, is now living in a $50,000 home, drives a Cadillac automobile and winters in Florida.

The American way of freedom—What is it?

4. It is opportunity regardless of handicaps.

Compared to the environment of yesteryear there are so many today who expect to have things handed them on a silver platter. Many have attempted to reverse the old adage by proclaiming, "the world owes me a living," without any concern of their obligations to the world.

When things get tough we are now prone to look to Government for help in business, in education, in medicine, in housing. There are too many people who just don't want to stand on their own two feet.

Consider for a moment the case of a young university graduate. He had all A's in all courses in all 4 years, the highest record in the history of the school. Don't you envy him? He won the university's highest scholastic honor. He was a popular student and the star of the debating team.

In his high school days he likewise made straight A's and was president of the senior class. He won one of the outstanding scholarship awards of the country in which he competed with many thousands of students.

His case is quite unique because he was the son of Basque immigrants who came to free America from the western Pyrenees of northern Spain. I mention him here because he was totally blind.

What a noble example of the true American spirit to tackle a tough situation and see it through with courage, daring, and faith. How much we need that spirit of self-reliance and independence in this hour of our history.

We are yelling for security these days when what we really need is freedom. We need freedom from the super-state. We need freedom to pit the minds of freemen against the perplexing problems of human life. We need freedom to be creative, to encourage individual initiative and to improve our way of life. With that freedom America's future is unlimited.

If we are seeking a sound solution to America's economic problems we will be obliged to go beyond big Government, big labor, and big business to the freedom of big men over whom nobody stands in control but Almighty God.

This is the core of our predicament today. For this concept of freedom is based on the recognition of a sovereign God as the Lord of life. The Declaration of Independence and the American Constitution were anchored on this fundamental concept.

One of the chief aids of freemen in their resistance to the tyranny of the superstate is in their regular worship of Almighty God and their recognition of the Christian principles at the very center and core of life. The alluring temptation to embrace the state as a god may be appealing but highly dangerous to personal freedom. The welfare state can easily become the collectivist state. The collectivist state can easily become the police state. The police state can easily become the totalitarian state.

Thus, this Independence Day Sunday is an excellent opportunity for Christians to reexamine our fundamental freedoms.

We will do well to reaffirm our faith in a sovereign God. We will do well to reaffirm our belief in our individual rights and privileges. We will do well to rededicate ourselves to the true American way of freedom which undergirds our hopes for peace, national security and the enlightenment of our citizenry.

But always remember that the American way of freedom is a heroic and holy heritage of the Christian church.

As the psalmist penned centuries ago, "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord, the people whom He has chosen as His heritage."

Kiwanis Club of Elma, N.Y., Speaks Out Against U.S. Supreme Court Decision on Constitutionality of Prayers in the Public Schools

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. PILLION

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 11, 1962

Mr. PILLION. Mr. Speaker, I concur wholeheartedly with the following resolution adopted by the Kiwanis Club of Elma, N.Y. The resolution refers to the recent decision of the U.S. Supreme Court declaring the recitation of prayers in the public schools to be unconstitutional. This was another step in a long series of decisions wherein the Supreme Court has evidenced its lack of stability and appreciation of the fundamental values that underlie our Western civilization, and this Nation's Constitution.

The resolution follows:

Whereas the attention of the officers, directors, and members of the Kiwanis Club of Elma has been directed to the recent decision of the U.S. Supreme Court declaring the use of a voluntary school prayer in New York public schools unconstitutional; and

Whereas it is the considered, solemn opinion of the Kiwanis Club of Elma that this Nation from its inception, has publicly and consistently affirmed its belief in God, and its reliance on adherence to the basic principles of religion; and

Whereas this club is cognizant of the right of each American to worship God in the manner of his choosing; and

Whereas this club has carefully studied the material so declared to violate the Constitution, and satisfied itself that the wording involved is nonsectarian, nondenominational, and highly expressive of the loftiest principles of religious belief: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Kiwanis Club of Elma records its vigorous objection to the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court referred to; and be it further

Resolved, That the Kiwanis Club of Elma urges Kiwanis International to officially record itself as similarly objecting.

Congressman John D. Dingell's Remarks on Hospital Discrimination, Sixth National Imhotep Conference, May 25, 1962

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

Wednesday, July 11, 1962

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, during his four terms in the Congress of the United States I have had the pleasure of watching the vigor, drive, integrity, and intelligence of young JOHN DINGELL, Congressman of Michigan's 15th District. He follows in the footsteps of his illustrious father, whose years of dedicated service are memorable. I was friend of the father as I am of the son. Indeed, the apple has not fallen far from the tree. There is in the House of Representatives no more forthright, liberal, and no more able and aggressive Member of Congress. He has stood forth vigorously against legislation which would hurt small business by repealing the antitrust laws, has been one of the principal fighters for civil rights legislation and was one of the leading participants in the maneuverings which resulted in enactment into law of the civil rights bills of 1957 and 1959. He was the author of one of the very first bills to include hospitalization for the aged within the framework of the Social Security Act, and his vigorous endeavors on behalf of that great cause have in large measure contributed to the present consideration by the Congress of the King-Anderson bill, of which Congressman JOHN D. DINGELL is a cosponsor, to provide for hospitalization for the aged within the framework of the social security program.

However, no action by our good friend and colleague, the Honorable JOHN D. DINGELL, reflects more credit on him than his vigorous opposition to racial discrimination against the sick, the aged, the helpless, the maimed, the injured, mothers in childbirth, the newborn, the afflicted, and the suffering and dying.

I am referring to Congressman DINGELL's vigorous opposition to racial discrimination in hospitals. Evil weed though our racially discriminatory practices are, this perhaps is the worst of all and strikes hardest at that segment of our population least able to defend itself against such discriminatory practices.

I am including in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pursuant to permission granted, a speech made by our friend and colleague, Congressman JOHN D. DINGELL, before the Sixth National Imhotep Conference held under the auspices of the National Medical Association, the Medico-Chirurgical Society of the District of Columbia, and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church in Washington, D.C., on May 25, 1962.

This is the most telling criticism of a particularly pernicious form of racial discrimination which I have seen, and for that reason deserves inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The speech follows:

Mr. Chairman, officers, and members of this Sixth Imhotep Conference, I would like to express my deep gratitude for the privilege of being present today to discuss with you not only a medicosociological situation, but what I am sure you will agree is one of the most odious and hurtful aspects of our racial discriminatory practices.

I refer to the problem of racial discrimination in staffing and in admissions of patients to hospitals.

Although the practice of racial discrimination in our Nation is an evil growth, perhaps no fruit borne by it is more noxious than the practice of discrimination against the sick, the aged, the helpless, the maimed, the injured, mothers in childbirth, the newborn, the afflicted, and the suffering and dying.

It is for this reason that, whenever the opportunity was presented, I have opposed this vicious practice, both by sponsorship of appropriate legislation and by offering and supporting amendments to do away with it.

The Hill-Burton Act is a great piece of humanitarian legislation. It has, in and of itself, contributed as much as any other single piece of legislation now on the books to making good medical care available to the American people generally.

The Hill-Burton Act has poured $1.5 billion in Federal funds into construction and repair of 5,500 hospitals and similar institutions and has so stimulated construction to change a critical shortage to a point nearing adequacy.

Some 2,000 hospitals and other health care facilities have been constructed, in whole or in part, in 11 Southern States through Hill-Burton grants in the amount of $562,921,000 of the $1,550,214,062 spent since the start of the program.

Ninety-eight of these hospitals are segregated. Most of the rest of the facilities admit Negroes in segregated wings, segregated wards, in hospital basements, in halls, and in other places where by practice and tradition they put Negro patients, but would never think of placing white patients.

Concurrent with this are discriminations against practitioners of medicine of the Negro race which not only deny physicians an adequate opportunity to utilize their talents and training on behalf of their patients but which deny them the right to earn a decent living. One doctor in discussing the situation said he could treat his patients if they could be cared for in the alley but that he could not if they had a condition requiring hospital care.

In this matter, there have been bright spots, and although the situation is bad, it is slowly improving, but not without enormous effort by right-thinking people.

As in other aspects of the problem of segregation, the North is different in the practice of the vices of discrimination, if only as to amount and degree.

A recent study was conducted in 14 communities. The investigators assumed the most reliable single index of integration to be, "In a given place what percentage of Negro doctors is affiliated with predominantly white hospitals?" This is indeed an important criterion, but I believe it would be helpful to have it compared with the percentage of patients, white and colored, and their respective relationship to the percentage of population in institutions in the area.

The findings, at any rate, are interesting:

Percentage of Negro doctors affiliated with white hospitals

Community:	Percent
Gary, Ind	82
New York (Brooklyn)	71
Philadelphia	28
Los Angeles	25
Indianapolis	23
Boston	21
Detroit	16
St. Louis	11
Chicago	7
Kansas City, Mo	5
Washington, D.C	4
Atlanta	0
Nashville	0
New Orleans	0

Much of this evil is rooted in the Hill-Burton Act itself, which had language in it which read as follows, setting forth in clear terms what was then thought to be the law with regard to the due-process clause and the equal-protection-of-the-law clause and segregation:

"Such hospital or addition to a hospital will be made available to all persons residing in the territorial area of the applicant, without discrimination on account of race, creed, or color, but an exception shall be made in cases where separate hospital facilities are provided for separate population groups, if the plan makes equitable provision on the basis of need for facilities for each such group."

The milestone school case of Brown v. The School Board and others since have shown that this is not the law, and that it is impossible to have equal and separate since the two are mutually exclusive and contradictory.

I am proud of my sponsorship of legislation to slay this evil, H.R. 10535.

I am sure you understand the enormous difficulty of securing enactment of forward-looking social legislation. Many here in this room participated in the grassroot action which brought about enactment of the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1959, and in the misfortune which befell the friends of equality in the recent Senate filibuster which destroyed for this session chances of meaningful legislation in the area of voting and literacy tests.

There is, however, another bright spot, much like that created by the courageous actions of the freedom riders, the sit-ins, and the plaintiffs in school integration cases. I refer to the filing of suit against two hospitals in Greensboro, N.C., to declare unconstitutional the "separate but equal" provision of the Hill-Burton Act. One defendant, the Cone Hospital, has received $1,229,552.50 in Federal aid. It accepts Negro patients under special circumstances and conditions. The Long Hospital, also a defendant, which refuses to accept Negro patients at all, received $1,596,301.60 in Federal funds.

The Department of Justice has intervened in this matter on behalf of the Federal Government and has asked that the separate but equal provisions of the Hill-Burton Act be held unconstitutional. I am assured that the Department will vigorously press its participation in the suit.

A similar suit is pending in Orangeburg, S.C., against the Orangeburg Regional Hospital, which maintains segregated waiting rooms, wards, and other facilities. The thrust of this suit is that the hospital's practices violate the due process clause and the equal protection of the laws provisions of the 14th amendment. In excess of $300,000 has been granted this hosiptal by the Federal Government.

The striking thing about this pattern of segregation of hospital facilities is that it clearly does not conform to the now segregationist doctrine of separate but equal. The facilties are separate but clearly unequal in quantity and quality in a very striking way.

In many cases grantee institutions not only do not furnish separate but equal facilities but simply refuse to admit Negro patients. Where Negro patients are admitted it is to such scandalously inadequate facilities as to factually affirm the finding of the school cases that separate but equal is impossible of achievement as an inherent contradiction in terms.

There are many concrete examples of the way this works out in practice. In heavily Negro counties in Mississippi and other Southern States in older institutions Negro patients were kept in attics, halls and basements. In some new institutions they are now given 40 segregated beds per hundred. In Birmingham, Ala., with a population in the area of 750,000, equally divided between white and Negro citizens, in 10 hospitals there were only 574 beds allocated to Negro patients, and some 1,762 for whites. Beds for Negro patients were broken down to 134 beds for crippled children, 73 obstetrical beds, and 367 beds for medical and surgical cases.

In Atlanta, Ga., out of some 4,000 beds available in the metropolitan area, only 680 are available to Negro patients. Some Atlanta hospitals which refuse to admit Negroes were constructed or improved in part with Hill-Burton grants.

There was recently brought to the attention of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare a hospital in Augusta, Ga., that had previously received Federal assistance and was applying for an additional $400,000. This hospital refuses pediatric or maternity care to colored persons. Facilities for Negroes are limited to 12 beds in the basement. Ironically the requested $400,000 is for expansion of the "white" facilities.

Limitation of time and space precludes elaboration but the pattern is clear, quite uniform, and drearily repetitious. It can be substantially duplicated in most cities in the South. However, by way of further example of northern practice let us take just one city in the North, my hometown of Detroit, Mich.—in fact the same structure appears in nearly all parts of the country.

The Michigan Chronicle, a weekly newspaper of excellent repute, ran a series which both set forth the situation and led to its substantial improvement.

One Detroit hospital was found to have for all intents and purposes refused Negro obstetrical cases. The Chronicle quoted the Detroit Medical Society which found that three hospitals discriminated against Negroes in the admission and placement of patients. In another hospital it was found that of 24 internships available annually only 1 went to a Negro. With a turnover of one-third of its 54 residencies annually, this same hospital has never trained a Negro resident. Only one of four major hospitals in the Detroit area had substantially complied with fair and nondiscriminatory practices.

Happily, I can report that by cooperation of city government, the hospitals, and organized medicine in the area, these discriminatory practices are now being remedied and we hope will soon be eradicated.

There are many factors in this situation which have an unusual relationship of both cause and effect at the same time in this pattern of discrimination.

Perhaps the worst is degradation and hardship on our Negro citizens of an economic, physical, and spiritual sort when their resources are at their lowest because of illness.

Another is the impact on Negro physicians and surgeons. While Negroes comprise 10 percent of the population, Negroes comprise only 2.2 percent of physicians. There is 1 white physician for 770 people, and 1 Negro physician for 4,567 nonwhites, according to Negroes and Medicine by Reitzes.

This work shows that in almost every southern State and locality the percentage of Negro doctors to patients and the number of Negro doctors in absolute terms is declining. The average age of practitioners is increasing.

There are a number of facts hard to explain except in terms of discrimination. Generally exclusively Negro hospitals are old, makeshift, crowded, substandard, and often hand-me-downs from the white community which has erected a new commodious plant.

In the South, Negro medical students are nearly forced to receive their degrees from Negro schools or to go north. The Journal of the National Medical Association in 1961 reported that 11 southern medical schools did not admit Negro schools.

Although the practice appears to have suffered substantial reduction, State medical and especially local societies are reported to deny Negro physicians membership or limit them to a sort of junior participation without the cares of dues paying or voting, and eating dinner with their white colleagues at membership functions.

This denial of membership in medical societies often will deny Negro physicians membership on hospital staffs.

There is also a tendency for hospitals to make new staff appointments from board certified specialists. In 1947 there were 93 such Negro specialists; in 1952 there were 190; and in 1957 there were 320. Still today only about 1 percent of all such board certified specialists are Negroes.

Although there is an increasing percentage of nonwhite interns and residents in non-Negro hospitals that percentage is not yet representative.

The work of eliminating discrimination by enactment into law of the proposal of Senator JAVITS and myself will not eliminate the problem of discrimination in the practice of medicine and care of the sick. It now appears that the courts will act before the Congress in striking down as unconstitutional the separate but equal doctrine as embodied in Hill-Burton. As I pointed out when I introduced this bill, this provision of Hill-Burton cannot stand the test of the courts on the scales of constitutionality after the decision in Brown v. the School Board.

I do not need to say that elimination of this one form of the evil in this field will leave much other work to be done by dedicated and courageous civil libertarians. I hope that this success which is soon to come will be followed by a new and vigorous rededication by all Americans to the principles of equality and a renewed drive to eliminate the last vestiges of racial discrimination from our dear land.

Invite Health People To Join Washington March

The Medical Committee for Civil Rights is actively supporting the March on Washington, August 28th, inviting physicians and professional health workers to join the thousands who will demonstrate in the nation's capital for "JOBS AND FREEDOM." "The time is NOW" is the call of the sponsoring organizations, CORE, NAACP, National Urban League, Negro-American Labor Council, Southern Christian Leadership Conference and Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee.

Purpose of the March, they declare, is "by a massive, peaceful and democratic demonstration in the nation's capital, to provide evidence of the need for the Federal Government to take effective and immediate action to deal with the national crisis of civil rights and jobs that all of us, Negro and white, are facing."

Professional health workers have a special role, MCCR feels. Because we are among the most respected and influential members of every community, conscience requires that we join with all segments of society which are making a united effort to make "freedom" a reality for Negro Americans. Negro physicians and health workers are not only themselves victims of discrimination, but they also, like every practitioner in the field of health, see the tragic results of discrimination. For these reasons MCCR urges all concerned with health to join the Washington March. Health workers also have the special responsibility to urge Congress to pass an effective civil rights measure which will encompass hospitals and other community health services.

Washington March leaders have suggested that physicians, dentists, nurses and others working in the field of health, participate as a medical contingent, rather than as professionally

MCCR will continue to press its demands for an end to racial discrimination in medicine and health services, since it regards AMA action in this area as "totally unsatisfactory." Against the background of MCCR's "Appeal to the AMA," the American Medical Association agreed to form a joint committee with the National Medical Association to "halt injustices to Negro physicians." Such efforts, MCCR pointed out, by a committee which proposes to meet two or three times a year, lag far behind the needs of the situation. While

FORM ADVISORY BOARD

In the 60 days since the Medical Committee for Civil Rights joined the historic civil rights battle with an appeal to the AMA, more than 300 physicians have offered financial support to the struggle to outlaw discrimination and segregation in medicine. Temporary officers are directing the activities of the Committee and to help guide them a National Advisory Board is being set up. Its members to date are:

Roy C. Bell, D.D.S., of Atlanta, Georgia. A leader of the struggle against racial segregation in medical facilities and societies in Georgia.

Abbott B. Britton, Jr., M.D., of Jackson, Mississippi. A member of the Mississippi Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

MCCR recognized AMA's decision as a "small step forward," it also pointed out that it was not focused in any way on the health problems imposed on the Negro population. In addition,

MCCR declared it was "unlikely to be effective in the absence of a strong appropriate direction by the AMA Board of Trustees and the counsel of the representatives of the Negro community."

The day after the AMA agreed to form a joint committee with the NMA, the battle against AMA's inaction continued on another front. This time sparked by the NAACP, AMA headquarters in Chicago was picketed by NAACP members including four trustees of the National Medical Association: Dr. Kenneth Clement, President Elect of the NMA, Dr. Jesse L. Leach, Dr. Emery L. Rann, and Dr. W. Montague Cobb. Dr. Cobb is Chairman of the NAACP's Health Committee and Editor of the NMA Journal of Medicine.

Dr. John A. Kenney, Jr., current NMA president who negotiated with AMA, commented on both events. He said that Dr. Clement had been invited to the conference with AMA but "there is a new militancy in our organization....we differ with him (Dr. Clement) on tactics."

While MCCR is continuing its appeal to the AMA, it is also enlarging the scope of its activities. The Committee is inviting a group of physicians, dentists, nurses and other health workers to join the Washington March on August 28th; it is working and consulting with the Negro organizations in the forefront of this struggle; and recently the Committee appeared before the House Judiciary Committee to testify constructively on the proposed civil rights bill.

NMA JOURNAL COMMENTS!

From the editorial pages of the July issue of the Journal of the National Medical Association, under the title "Physicians, Peace, Pickets and Powell," comes this interesting comment:

"Lately some physicians have become convinced that progress needs to be expedited by what are termed "action methods." Recently a bi-racial committee of physicians picketed the AMA at its annual convention in Atlantic City. A member of the Board of Trustees of the NMA was among this group. On July 3, 1963, the N.A.A.C.P. during its annual Convention in Chicago picketed the AMA headquarters. Four physicians, two of whom were officers of the NMA and three of whom were members of the National Board of Directors of the N.A.A.C.P., also two dentists, one of whom was a National N.A.A.C.P. Board member, led this group.

"Neither of these two groups represented opinion hostile to the AMA. They felt merely that as the organization which purports to speak for the medical profession in the U.S., the AMA had been derelict in its duty to the public in not aggressively promoting some tangible program to eliminate hospital discrimination as to both patients and physicians...

"Be it not forgot that history is replete with militant clergy in Europe, Mexico and South America who had led organized protest comparable to picketing. In recent integration demonstrations in Baltimore, distinguished leaders of the church from many denominations were arrested. There can be no doubt that these leaders desired the full impact of their dignity and influence of their positions to be thrown behind the integration effort. It is unthinkable that a physician could consider picketing as beneath him as a dignified form of peaceful protest. The NMA can already point with pride to the fact that in Atlanta, in Detroit and in Cleveland, leading physicians among its number have been participating in picketing demonstrations, under various auspices."

unidentified members of other groups.

The medical group will start August 28th, lobbying with Congressional representatives in the morning. There will be a medical group luncheon at noon after which they will join all groups for the parade and rally. Health workers will be identified in the March by signs bearing a caduceus and their professional degrees (for example, M.D., R.N., D.D.S.)

Headquarters in Washington for professional health workers and physicians will be at the Willard Hotel, Pennsylvania Avenue and 14th Streets. The telephone number is National 8-4420. MCCR there will be staffed from 8 in the evening, Tuesday, August 27th, through Wednesday, the 28th.

All participants are advised to travel as part of an organized group. Private cars should not be used. Health workers are urged to contact their local civil rights, church, or fraternal groups in their own communities to obtain transportation. For health workers coming to Washington from the metropolitan New York area, group transportation by both train and plane at reduced rates has been arranged.

Requests for information about the demonstration should be directed either to Dr. Arthur C. Logan, Medical Committee for Civil Rights, POB 499, Madison Square Station, New York 10, Telephone: OR 4-5660 or to Dr. Paul B. Cornely, Howard University College of Medicine in Washington; Telephone: DU 7-6100.

August 28th will be an historical day. We urge you to participate. Please fill out the form on page 8 and return it immediately to MCCR in New York.

GARY HOSPITAL TO INTEGRATE FOLLOWING JOINT DISCUSSIONS

Methodist Hospital in Gary, Indiana, agreed to end its "separate" policies after discussions with the Gary Civil Rights Committee, which was preparing for a demonstration of 10,000 to protest segregation.

After all the work of the preparation for the Appeal to the AMA; after the excitement of the Day of Appeal, after the recognition that MCCR had made health an inssue in the current civil rights battle; inevitably the question was asked "What did it feel like?" MCCR's Newsletter went to Dr. John L.S. Holloman, chairman to find out. Reserved, yet with great warmth and sincerity, it is clear that Dr. Holloman's unassuming manner cloak determination and resolution in the battle for civil rights. We asked what it was like the night before when all the preparations were complete and the only thing left was action the next day.

"That night as I sat in the hotel room," said Dr. Holloman, "certain of only a few participants, I had reservations about my role and what we in the Committee were planning. I had reservations because doctors had never picketed doctors before. There had never been pickets on the boardwalk of Atlantic City before. How would the public react? What would be the reaction of my colleagues? I was uneasy, but Birmingham was boiling then. Every newspaper I read was filled with stories of heroic people and organizations – Negro and white – seeking justice and reason. Those people decided me. If it meant only a handful of us on that line, I would be one of them."

Dr. Holloman was not alone that day except once, when he came before AMA's House of Delegates to present President Edward R. Annis with MCCR's denunciation of the AMA reply to the Appeal for a stand against discrimination and segregation. Dr. Annis had just finished his inaugural address when Dr. Holloman walked the length of the hall to the dias. What was he thinking at that moment?

"As I walked down the aisle I felt that I was about to present Dr. Annis with an opportunity to be an important person. He could seize this opportunity and show himself a strong, courageous leader keeping pace with the thinking of the times, or he would be revealed as guilty on this issue as is the AMA despite its ethics and traditions."

How was the action received?

Dr Holloman recalled, "We were particularly gratified with the response from doctors attending the Convention. Many stopped to read our signs. Many commented that our cause was a just one. Some even joined the demonstration for a time. And since the Convention, the Committee has received correspondence from hundreds of physicians and health workers offering support for the Committee's work."

We couldn't help commenting on the unusual press MCCR's first activity had received. Major newspapers in major cities carried impressive stories and pictures of the Committee in action.

Said Dr. Holloman, "Since this was an unusual event in the medical community, we expected interest. We didn't quite expect the sympathetic response and the excellent coverage. When we called our press conference we were appalled at the size of the room the hotel provided. Frankly, we tried to get a smaller one. That room looked like a ballroom to us, but we couldn't get another. Yet, when Dr. Lear and I came came into that room to meet the press – early we thought – it was already filled with reporters. We never moved that day without being surrounded by reporters."

MCCR Testifies For Civil Rights

The impact of racial segregation and discrimination on the health of the Negro community was vividly presented in testimony for the proposed Civil Rights Bill (HR 7152) by Dr. Walter J. Lear, MCCR Coordinator. Speaking before the House Judiciary, Dr. Lear made a strong plea for passage of the Bill. In addition, he proposed amendments to expand the "public accommodations" section of the measure to cover hospitals and other community health services.

Since another section of the bill would eliminate federal aid wherever racial discrimination exists, including all hospital and health services, Dr. Lear made a strong plea for the passage of the measure, pointing out that it would "clearly invalidate the 'separate but equal' clause of the Hill-Burton Act which provides Federal grants for the construction of hospitals and other health facilities."

Negroes can protect their rights through the courts or through direct action, Dr. Lear stated, but he also indicated that legalities were time consuming and direct action to assure care for an emergency accident or heart attack was obviously "absurd." Federal legislation is necessary, he declared, because it "is neither morally nor scientifically proper that the optimal health, and at times even the life, of any Negro patient be dependent on the willingness of the medical profession and the hospitals of his community to offer him voluntarily what is his right."

Reasons for the proposed changes are that "non-profit, non-governmental hospitals, nursing homes, clinics and other health services and facilities provide an essential public service which would otherwise be provided by government agencies. The public service nature of these health services and facilities is recognized by government in many ways including (1) the purchase from them of patient services for which governmental agencies are responsible and (2) special laws and regulations including those authorizing the chartering and licensing of hospitals and other community health services, some of which specify qualifications of governing boards, standards of service, and fiscal policies, all of which are designed to protect the public interest and others of which grant exemptions from taxes on income and real property and other special privileges."

Dr. Lear brought before the Judiciary Committee a series of statistics which revealed the life and death substance of discrimination. Interestingly, the figures seemed to indicate that whether the city was "deep South," or liberal New York, ghetto living produced the same health problems. Separate from the individual tragedies which result from discrimination, segregation in medicine and medical care contribute to the creation of a cycle of deprivation and

NURSES TAKE STAND

The American Nurses Association, representing about 170,000 registered professional nurses, appeared before the House Judiciary Committee in July to urge passage of HR 7152, the proposed Civil Rights Bill.

The American Nurses Association faced its internal civil rights problem in the middle forties when it started to urge constituent societies to admit Negro graduate nurses. Shortly after, it offered direct membership, and by 1950, the National Association of Colored Graduate Nurses was absorbed into ANA. Today all state societies admit Negro nurses as regular members.

Mrs. Margaret B. Dolan, ANA's president, told the Committee that ANA was concerned over the fact that the proposed measure as written would not cover hospitals. Mrs. Dolan said, "Yet hospitals are built and operated for the public good. Admission of patients should be based on need. Employment of staff within the hospital should be determined solely on the basis of qualifications. Maintenance of separate facilities within a community seriously dilutes the number of qualified staff available for employment. In nursing, we are especially concerned about the shortage of professional nurses, who are responsible for meeting nursing care needs and for the direction and supervision of less well-prepared personnel in nursing service. At this time, the ratio of professional nurses to population is lowest in those regions which have the largest number of segregated hospitals."

marginal health which perpetuates the depressed conditions of Negro living.

Dr. Lear told the Committee: "For those of us who are not statisticians (that is, most of us) the statistics on infants are the simplest to follow and the clearest in their implications. In most communities in the South and in the Northern cities with Negro ghettos, the chances of a Negro baby dying within the first year of life are usually at least twice that of a white baby. Here are the figures for a few cities:

Babies dying with the first year of life (number per 100):

	White	Non-White
Albany, Georgia	3.0	6.3
New Orleans, La.	2.2	5.4
New York, N.Y.	2.2	4.3

"Of course, most Negro babies, like most white babies, do survive but the Negro babies have a greater chance of starting life with a health handicap. A particularly well-documented and significant health handicap is prematurity, best shown by the weight of the baby at birth. In communities where Negroes are subject to major segregation and discrimination, the Negro baby is much more likely to be born prematurely. Here are some figures on prematurity:

Babies weighting $5\frac{1}{2}$ pounds or less at birth (number per 100):

	White	Non-White
Albany, Ga.	7.0	11.1
New Orleans, La.	7.5	16.4
New York, N.Y.	7.9	15.3

"Premature babies may get excellent medical care if they are born in or near a hospital with a modern center for premature infants, but all of them have to struggle with their underdevelopment and the many premature babies who never overcome this handicap are unable, as they grow older, to take full advantage of the opportunities available to them in their homes, schools, churches and communities for development as complete human beings.

"The substantial disadvantage in the health status of the Negro population as compared to the white population is also shown by the figures for life expectancy and death rates. Only one example need be cited – the death rate for tuberculosis. This is a disease well recognized by the medical profession to be associated with deprivation:

Death rate from tuberculosis of the respiratory tract (number per 100,000):

	White	Non-White
United States; males	7.9	17.4
United States; females	2.5	8.3

"No matter which disease or health handicap the social consequences are similar for the afflicted individual and his family.

"Deprivation and poor health become a cycle which is unbreakable by most of those involved. Low income, inadequate education and occupational training, poor housing and environmental sanitation, improper nutrition and health habits, insufficient and often second-class medical care, all produce more and more severe health prob-

DENTISTS PLAY LEADING ROLE

Dentists in many areas throughout the national have assumed leadership in civil rights battles. In three recent action campaigns, dentists are in the leadership of local NAACP chapters spearheading the drive.

Dr. Jerry D. Jewell, a dentist, is president of the Little Rock NAACP. The New York Times describes him as one of the "new and militant young leadership" in Little Rock, who have "expressed determination to achieve more meaningful integration this year in the courts and, if necessary, on the streets."

Dr. R. B. Hayling is president of the St. Augustine, Florida, branch of NAACP Youth Council. St. Augustine has been the scene of several demonstrations against segregated lunch counters at Woolworth, McCrory's and the Service Drug Store.

Dr. Christopher Taylor is president of the Los Angeles NAACP, where a peaceful two-mile march against discrimination was staged. Dr. Taylor recently joined MCCR's National Advisory Board.

lems. These, in turn, make difficult or impossible improvement of income, education, job capabilities, housing, sanitation, nutrition, health habits and medical care.

"More tragic still, as shown in the first set of figures, is that the deprivation of the parents fosters disease and health handicaps in the children. These usually combine with the forces producing the original deprivation to assure the continuation of this cycle in the children as they grow up. And so deprivation and poor health are 'passed on' from one generation to the next.

"For the Negro, this cycle cannot be broken unless the pattern of racial segregation and discrimination is eliminated. HR 7152 is a necessary part of a program that would break this cycle. Consequently, we as citizens and as professional health workers respectfully urge you and the Congress to approve HR 7152 as quickly as possible."

In direct or indirect fashion, Dr. Lear told the Committee all "sections of HR 7152 would also affect medicine and health services." He pointed particularly to the section on the desegregation of public education. In addition to wiping out the racial exclusion policies of a minority of medical schools and other graduate level schools for professional health workers, the measure would be of greatest significance to medicine and health services if it helped Negroes obtain better education at the lower levels, thus permitting them to enter the graduate schools. As the health needs of the nation grow, all graduate schools report an insufficient number of qualified applicants. "The health professional potential of the Negro population has been largely ignored," Dr. Lear declared. "The Negro population could play a particularly valuable role in the nation's health services by contributing a greatly increased number of qualified students to our medical schools and other graduate level schools for professional health workers."

The Civil Rights Bill was also endorsed by the Physician's Forum and the American Nurses Association.

THE CHAIRMAN REPORTS.

Since a picket line is a unique event in Atlantic City, we couldn't help asking about police attitudes.

"Police cooperation was excellent," said Dr. Holloman. The captain assigned an integrated detail to police our demonstration. Having worked at the Jersey shore resorts during my early college days, I would say such cooperation is a good example of how times have changed."

"And now?" we asked.

"MCCR is on the map," Dr. Holloman smiled. "Now we've really got a job to do.

KNOXVILLE HOSPITALS INTEGRATE

Three denominational hospitals in Knoxville, Tennessee, have been desegregated smoothly, their administrators reported early this month. Baptist, Presbyterian and St. Mary's (Catholic) Hospitals recently came to an agreement to end discrimination early in August. "It went just like any other day," administrators said after 24 hours of an integrated service.

NEGRO STUDENTS WIN SCHOLARSHIPS FOR MEDICAL SCHOOLS

Two Negro students who have received National Medical-Sloan Foundation Scholarships will be the first of their race to attend the medical schools of Duke University in Durham, North Carolina, and Emory University in Atlanta, Georgia. A third scholarship student will be the first American Negro to attend The Johns Hopkins Medical School.

TO ALL CONCERNED AND AFFECTED PROPERTY OWNERS

THERE WILL BE A MEETING AT GUY WEBB SCHOOL ON TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1963 at 8:00 P.M. THE PURPOSE OF THE MEETING IS TO DISCUSS THE PROPOSED MULTI-STORY HOSPITAL IN OUR AREA. IF YOU ARE INTERESTED IN PROTECTING YOUR PROPERTY, BE THERE!!

The enclosed map shows the property selected for a proposed hospital. This hospital is to serve the area bounded by Piedmont Road, Highway 85, and the Chattahoochee River, which has a population of 180,000 by the 1962 census. This site was selected because it is easily accessible and centrally located for all the area to be served.

The hospital will be financed by Hill-Burton Federal Funds and local subscription. Hill-Burton requires the hospital to be located to serve Doraville, Roswell, Alpharetta to river, and down to about Peachtree Creek.

Construction of a hospital on this parcel of land requires no zoning change, only a Special Use Permit. A church or school also requires only a Special Use Permit.

There are to be between 20 and 30 acres in the hospital complex. Within the complex there is planned a 250 bed hospital, clinic, nurses home, and doctor's building. As a size comparison, Piedmont Hospital has approximately 200 beds and covers an area of a little over 9 acres.

This is to be a so-called non-profit hospital with a Board of Trustees consisting of five doctors and ten laymen.

Forty percent of the estimated $6,000,000 cost is to be furnished by Hill-Burton funds. The balance will be by local subscription.

At a meeting October 14th, at which the Hospital Committee presented the above information, a citizens fact-find committee was formed to investigate further into the situation.

TRAFFIC - A hospital located at the junction of the perimeter highway and the North Fulton Expressway would be accessible, but it also would considerably increase traffic on all surrounding streets and roads, including Peachtree-Dunwoody, Glenridge Drive, and Johnson Ferry Road.

HILL-BURTON FUNDS - The doctors and members of the Board of Trustees admit that if Hill-Burton funds are used, which is contemplated, the hospital must be integrated. Some members of the board would like to have "token" integration, but experience has proven that there is no such thing as token integration. Nurses would be integrated, as would their dormitories. This would mean many young negro girls would be living in the area, entertaining their guests, etc. Of the major hospitals in Atlanta, only St. Joseph's is now integrated. Many of us would not even use an integrated hospital when we could use one of the others.

Hospital like Grady or public

LOCATION - Under the Hill-Burton Act, there must be three possible sites selected. If two other locations have been selected, it has not been announced. Many feel that a hospital should be in a commercial or semi-commercial area rather than invading a nice residential section. There are other sites available. There are 30 acres available on the perimeter and Roswell Roads. This would be accessible from both expressways and Roswell Road.

Two sites

Jim Richmond

- More -

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

NOISE - The members of the Board of Trustees admit that there will be an around-the-clock emergency ward. This means sirens during the night. Those who moved into this area for quiet country living will find that they will be awakened frequently by sirens and increased traffic.

EFFECTS ON SURROUNDING PROPERTY - It is common knowledge that the area around a hospital rapidly becomes commercial. There will be doctor's buildings, florists, restaurants and tourist courts. There already are options on two pieces of land in the area for motels, provided the hospital site is approved. One is on Glenridge Drive, and the other on Peachtree-Dunwoody. Drug stores, service stations, and other undesirable businesses will surely follow. The promoters talk about controlling the adjacent and surrounding land, but they have nothing to do with it. And they cannot control it, even though they may have the best intentions.

ANNEXATION - A new hospital will bring additional pressure from the city of Atlanta to annex this area.

PROPAGANDA - The promoters have been guilty of using scare tactics. They give us a choice of a hospital or something less desirable, such as a motor court. This is ridiculous. If there is to be a motor court, it will come as a result of the hospital being located here. This land can be used for residential development.

THIS IS AN UNWARRANTED INVASION OF OUR NEIGHBORHOOD WITH A CALLOUSED DISREGARD FOR OUR PROPERTY VALUES.

IT IS VITALLY IMPORTANT THAT YOU COME TO THIS MEETING.

PUBLIC WELFARE

Give us the faith of innocent children, that we may look forward with hope in our hearts to the dawn of happy tomorrows. Reawaken the thought that our most cherished desires will be realized, the things closest to our hearts — that we may come to an appreciation of the limitless joys and bountiful rewards of Patience, Charity and Sacrifice. Above all, endow us with the spirit of courage, that we may face the perplexities of a troubled world without flinching, imbued with the child-like faith which envisions the beautiful and inspiring things of life . . . and restore the happy hours and experiences so many of us foolishly believe are lost forever. Give us faith in ourselves and faith in our fellow man . . . then, the treasures and beauties of life that make man happy will spring from an inexhaustible source.

And at Christmas, when hearts of the world swell in joyous celebration, let us cast aside the pretense of sturdy men and live, if only for a day, in the hope and joy we knew as children.

A Christmas prayer by an unknown author

New Accounting System For Counties

For the fiscal year 1962-63, the Hinds County Welfare Department reported receipts in excess of $71,000 as a result of court action, alone. This represented an increase of approximately $31,000 over the previous year.

Facing the definite prospect of steady increase in the more than 200 active court cases, the problem of bookkeeping time had reached the acute stage. The absolute necessity for rapid-transit handling of court-ordered funds added materially to the dilemma. In order that other essentials might be kept on a current basis, additional accounting hours had become a routine practice.

In the Hinds County office, with a large Child Welfare caseload, the orderly and accurate maintenance of purchase order requirements, the auditing of Forms DPW-411 and related invoices, and the resulting journal entries and ledger postings account for a considerable number of hours, without consideration for recording court funds. From regular Child Welfare funds an average of more than $300 per week is expended for board payments, medical care, clothing, et cetera.

At intervals, for several months, the Director of the Division of Audit, E. C. Sturdivant, had studied various measures designed to modify the difficulties arising from constantly increasing "Support" funds. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1963, it was noted that total receipts from this source were reported as follows: "Parents, Court Order, $260,133.31; Parents, Voluntary, $52,-827.89." Since additional personnel could not be considered, it was obvious that workable alternatives had to be devised.

After several conferences with Miss Nathalie Dunn, Agent, Mrs. Mary Lamoureaux, Accounting Clerk, Mrs. Lucile Martin who helps Mrs. Lamoureaux, and the salesman representing the system under consideration, the Director approved use of the proposed system. Documents were designed to meet local needs and a procedure was adopted.

Court-ordered funds designated as "Support" and requiring no action by the county office other than immediate transmittal to complainants involved, were set up in a special bank account. When funds in this category are received immediate preparation of receipt to defendant and check to complainant produces simultaneous journal entries and ledger postings. This simple system of carbonized lines is adaptable to any accounting wherein funds may be received and transmitted in a single operation. Compared to conventional methods, bookkeeping time saved amounts to more than 50%.

To derive the maximum benefit from the new system, use of Forms DPW-411 for the "Support Fund", only, was discontinued in the Hinds County office. Mrs. Lamoureaux and Mrs. Martin were assigned total responsibility for receiving and disbursing such funds. Since this placed clerks in the position of disbursing funds without the Agent's signature of authority, faithful performance bonds for Mrs. Lamoureaux and Mrs. Martin were fixed at $10,000 each.

Cost to the Hinds County Welfare Department for the system, including a year's supply of printed forms, amounted to slightly more than $600. Yearly supplies of forms thereafter are estimated at approximately the same cost as that of the same forms from any printing company.

By using exactly the same printed forms as those in use in Hinds County, with name changes, only, counties with approximately the same volume of accounts may purchase the same system for about $100 less. Similar systems, available through other office supply houses are priced somewhat lower. Harrison County is considering one. If the Division of Audit finds that it meets all essential requirements, it will be approved.

A Children's Bureau publication entitled ILLNESS AMONG CHILDREN reports that:

- The average American boy or girl has 3 episodes of acute illness a year, and one out of five has at least 1 chronic condition.
- More than 74 out of every 1,000 children have hay fever, asthma or some other allergy, and more than 34 out of every 1,000 are afflicted with chronic sinusitis, bronchitis or some other respiratory ailment. These two groups of conditions account for more than half of the almost 33 million school days lost because of chronic conditions.

What Price Integration?

(Reprint from Charleston News and Courier, Charleston, South Carolina)

For the sake of any who may read what follows, I wish to say in advance that it makes no claim to originality. The views here put forward are a composite of the views of the many informed, thoughtful men and women — with whom I have discussed the matter in question at length — lawyers, doctors, clergymen, professors, teachers, writers, painters, businessmen, labor leaders, office workers — in fact, men and women from almost every calling and walk of life.

That more of them have not put these views in writing, or otherwise committed them to the public, reflects the degree to which a powerful, well-organized and completely unrestrained minority has succeeded, during the last few years in coercing the unorganized majority — as well as a segment of the press — into silence.

Experience has operated to engender in me the friendliest of feeling for the American Negro. I say these things in advance, so that no statement made herein may be properly suspected of accruing of any hostility to the Negro, or even dislike of him.

Goethe, in one of his Conversations with Ackermann, declared that while it might be permissable to equivocate or dissemble concerning trivialities, important matters demanded complete honesty and frankness in their discussion.

Honoring that injunction, let us begin this discussion of integration, which certainly qualifies as an important matter in America today, by honestly and frankly stating that:

(1) Despite Supreme Court ukases, and all that has been done thereunder, we do not have genuine integration of Negroes and white in large areas of this country today in the public schools or elsewhere; and

(2) We are paying — and will continue to pay — a devastatingly high price for the pseudo-integration that has been set up as a sop in its name!

Can any honest person, looking around the nation today, dispute the accuracy of the first statement? Confronting the full meaning of the word, will anyone of sound mind seriously contend that the putting of a handful of Negroes into white schools by force constitutes integration in any honest sense? Can even the Supreme Court seriously maintain that a school in which there is a policeman or his equivalent standing guard to prevent white children from assaulting blacks, or vice versa, and in which the psychological climate is constantly charged with hostility, is really integrated? Or is a suitable place for any child — Negro or white — to acquire education?

No, this is not integration; and no amount of saying so — even when that "saying so" is by august governmental agencies or personages — can make it so. However, the incessant "saying so" — and otherwise pretending so — by those in positions of political power and leadership can do this:

It can deceive a large segment of the citizenry into accepting the false for the true; the disastrous consequences of which need no elaboration. We vehemently denounce Hitler when, as a part of Nazi "weaponry," he murdered truth and iterated and reiterated the Big Lie. Are we now to embrace and applaud the very same evil we so lately decried?

Why do those at the head of the Federal government, as well as the integration leaders, pretend that we have integration when the facts so belie this?

For government officials, it is difficult to find any answer compatible with statesmanship and right reason; but apparently they hope by so doing to: (1) garner the Negro vote for their political party; and (2) save face for the Supreme Court, which, having eagerly and gleefully grabbed a bear by the tail, now may desire something to help it "let go."

It seems almost incredible, but apprently it was possible for the Supreme Court to have been so far removed from reality as to believe that it had only to speak, and customs, conventions, attitudes and accommodations which had been generations in building would vanish as snowflakes before the summer's sun. When they did not, it apparently was quite surprising and disconcerting to the Court.

Why do we not have integration today in large sections of the nation? Why, despite the Supreme Court's decision, and all of the hullaballoo there has been for it, has integration made such little headway in the nine years since the Court attempted to legislate it?

The answer is simple — because most of the people the whole country over do not believe it is desirable and hence do not want it! We found with National Prohibition how difficult to the point of impossibility it was to force something down unwilling people's throats. Now we are trying to do the self-same thing again, and with equal ineffectiveness.

Neither as a statute of sovereign states nor as a part of the Federal Constitution could National Prohibition be enforced. Why? Essentially because, in attempting to do summarily by force majeure what could be done, if at all, only through education, it went solidly against the grain of human nature and was anathema to the vast majority of the American people. They would not countenance it, either as a moral principle or as a practical instrumentality for the regulation of human conduct; hence would not obey it.

We should thus have learned the lesson that although an enactment of Congress or a state legislature, upheld by the Supreme Court, may be called a law — "the law of the land," if you please — from a practical standpoint it is not one unless and until it has the sanction of the overwhelming majority of those to whom it applies. Unless it has that sanction it will not be respected; unless it is respected it cannot be enforced; and unless it can be enforced it is not, from a practical standpoint, a law — but only congeries of empty words.

By the same token, integration cannot be established throughout this country — no matter what the Supreme Court, the President, and the pontifical New York Times say to the contrary — by judicial fiat.

To be sure, at the cost of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money and of ugly wounds which will never heal, the United States Army — and little less than an army of U. S. marshals — invaded Oxford, Mississippi, and, through brute force and intimidation, deposited the physical body of one James H. Meredith within the halls and lecture-rooms of the University of Mississippi — to the end that James Meredith became, in his own words, "the most segregated man in America." But can any intelligent and reasonable person view this as anything but a horrible caricature of real integration?

Indeed, any sane, intelligent person who contemplates this malodrous affair cannot escape realizing that the employment of thousands of armed soldiers to put one Negro at bayonet's point into a white university was not the result of sincere desire to achieve real integration; but, rather, proceeded entirely out of the belief that this was "good politics" at the time; that it would assure the "Negro vote" being cast at the impending election for the party in power.

Once asked by newspaper reporters if we ever would have fascism in the country, the late Huey Long is said to have instantly replied: "Of course; but we'll call it democracy"! The Kingfish knew with what little compunction high-placed Americans engage in hypocritical euphemism when it suits their purpose. He also knew how easy it is to gain public acceptance of evil when, well-purfled by hyprocrisy, it comes wearing the mantle of good.

Besides not bringing about integration, the forced mixing of Negroes and whites in public schools — or anywhere else — augments and intensifies whatever natural antipathy those of one race feel toward the other; and this applies to children and their elders alike. Human nature being what it is, this follows as the night the day; and every time force is employed in alleged aid of integration, more barriers between the two races are erected.

The advocates of race-mixing repeatedly and vigorously assert that there is no "proof" that this would be injurious to the white race; in short, no proof that the black race is biologically inferior to the white.

They are wrong! There is such proof, as anyone will find who honestly seeks it. To be sure, it was all but buried under a mass of pseudo-scientific flotsam and jetsam emanating from writers who, in their zeal for egalitarianism, suppressed and tortured facts to make them serve their egalitarian idealogy. But the proof still exists; unaffected by the avalanche of "scientific" foal that was dumped on it, in the effort to conceal it from view.

From a purely practical standpoint, whether or not there is "scientific proof" of the inferiority of the black race does not alter the existing situation. For so long as untold millions of white Americans believe their race is superior to the Negro, it is a fact that must be reckoned with. Regardless of the basis of this belief, there it is!

In being unwilling to have my daughter marry a Negro (or a Filipino, Hindu or Indonesian, for that matter), my position might be considered to be scientifically unsound and logically untenable. It might be held to transgress Magna Charta and the Declaration of Independence, and to violate all the dogmas of sweet democratic togetherness. No matter; it still would be my position, which I would resolutely maintain and defend regardless!

The comparatively few people who really favor Negro/white race-mixing speak pejoratively of "prejudice," scoffingly asserting that it is prejudice which actuates the vast number of people who are actually opposed to integration. That may well be, for prejudice is the manifestation of deep-rooted feeling which, in turn, is the product of long racial experience. And to say nothing of the fact that life without prejudice is equally impossible and undesirable, that is why real integration cannot summarily be.

The fact that millions of non-Southern Americans do not cry out against integration means not that they favor it; it means only that for one reason or another they are afraid to announce their dissent. Their silence is for self-protection.

Although it is abundantly plain that the violent methods thus far pursued in the abortive attempts to effect integration have deepened and intensified the opposition to it, violence still seems to be the order of the day with its proponents. The professional integrationists and their governmental allies appear to believe that if some violence will not do the trick, more and more violence will.

There seems to be not the first glimmer of realization on their part that this violence is not only seriously impeding the advance of any real integration, but militating against the deserving Negro severely. And violence apart, all of the noisy huckstering and professional integrationists engage in — all of their hullaballooing and breast-beating in behalf of the Supreme Court's legislation — is slowly but surely arousing the ire and therefore the opposition of millions of Americans who have been more or less neutral up to date.

It is doing this because much of it is so repugnant to truth, so offensive to good taste, so far-fetched and absurd, so obviously unfair to the great mass of white citizenry, and so unrepresentative of millions of Negro men and women. Let me cite two examples.

In San Francisco, last spring, students of one of the high schools wrote and produced a little musical based on Mark Twain's inimitable HUCKLEBERRY FIN. While it was in rehearsal, word got out that a Negro boy was taking the part of "Jim". Immediately a great outcry arose. Officials of NAACP and CORE — and various others who make their living out of being professional race-mixing agitators — made violent protests.

What was the basis of their complaint? Simply that a Negro youth was cast to play the role of the Negro "Jim".

To the enduring credit of the school superintendent, he, like the principal, refused to be intimidated, and the play went on — to the delight of the students, including the Negro lad who played "Jim" and according to all accounts, played him well.

There were many reliable indications that most of the San Francisco and Bay Area Negroes — including "Jim's" parents and friends — were displeased by what their so-called leaders did and said in their name; and they, therefore, were blameless for it. Nevertheless, the damage was done — to them and to the entire Negro population.

Not daunted by this silly fiasco, a few months later the Negro leaders were at it again. This time they breathed wrath and defiance because an elementary San Francisco school was scheduled to open in the Fall with about 60 per cent Negro and 40 per cent white pupils. Since this reflected the racial complexion of the district the school was to serve, what was there wrong about it?

Well, according to the peculiar mental calibrations of CORE and NAACP officials, and other professional integrationists, if there are more Negroes than whites in a school, it is still not integrated. By some sort of outreasoning they came up with the contention that for a school to be integrated, it must have at least 51 per cent whites.

One thing noticeably common to virtually all integrationists "leaders", and other professional race-mixers, is their assumption that they are always 100 per cent right about everything, and that what they choose to demand must be 100 per cent granted, regardless of how much the rights of others may suffer thereby. There must be integration — as they define integration — at once and at all costs; nothing else matters.

In far too many cases this arrogant attitude, and the threats and demands to parents, have paid off; those upon whom the demands were made have capitulated — to avoid trouble. In this instance, this did not happen. The school board simply announced, at the height of the furore, that if this was the way the professional integrationists were going to play the game, all right; the school simply would not open at all!

Genuine evolutionary integration has suffered immeasurably from "remedies which are worse than the disease"; remedies which, for the most part, are the handiwork of the political "liberals". These men not only have a positive mania for what they call "equality", but commit endless mischief through their unwitting efforts to "give" it to all and sundry, everywhere. Intoxicated with the Utopian idealism, they do not realize that: (1) no one, not even a liberal, can give anybody equality; and (2) what they mean by equality is not the equality of Thomas Jefferson and the Declaration of Independence, but the egalitarianism of Saint-Just and the other chief inquisitors of the French Revolution.

The equality of the Declaration of Independence differs as much from the egalitarianism of the liberals as the Mona Lisa differs from a pin-up girlie, or a Shakespearean sonnet from a college yell. Under the equality of the Declaration of Independence, men are created with equal claim to those boons we have specified. Under the egalitarianism of the French Revolutionists and today's ritualistic liberals, man's natural inequality is to be set aside by law. Unequal men are to be made equal — that is, equalized — by governmental action which may take the form of brute force if necessary. Under this, everybody, regardless of individual merit or innate capacity, is going to be equalized with everybody else — in income, opportunity, education, sex appeal, housing, food, clothing, personality and all else any liberal can conceive of. What God or Nature cannot do, government will do — quickly. "All power hereafter resides in the laws", said Saint-Just, "which take the place of God".

To those who are not lost in the miasmatic fog of liberalism, it will be unnecessary to point out that equalizing the Negro by law cannot help — and must seriously hinder — him in the long run. Saying that a purse made out of sow's ears is silk — even though the saying of this is in the devious and involuted prose of a Supreme Court decision — cannot give it the real attributes of silk; cannot make it silk. But saying so can do this: it can, through deceiving purse-buyers by false claims, ultimately ruin the purse market.

By the same token, insisting that through being equalized by, for instance, having one of his race put at bayonet's point into an all-white university, the Negro has attained real equality, cannot really aid or advance him; on the contrary, it must harm and retard him. For the chief long-range effect of such equalizing is to coerce the Negro into striving to be what he is not. When he fails in this and fail in most instances he must, he is left "dangling" between two worlds — the old, familiar one which he has been induced to leave prematurely and which therefore will be difficult for him to reenter; and the strange new world in which, legally equalized though he may be, he does not naturally fit, and is consequently ill at ease and unhappy.

In persuading the Negro to believe that, through being equalized by law, he is entitled to something without having earned it, government officials and integrationist leaders are betraying the Negro! In soliciting the Negro vote through attempts to effectuate integration by force, those so doing are betraying the Republic!

For the present, we can expect to witness continued extension of privileges to him; this because the Liberal Establishment now in power thus bids for his vote; meanwhile, arguing to the public that these are his due — to compensate for the "equality" he was previously "denied".

That argument, however plausible-sounding to the unthinking, is too specious, too tenuous, too devoid, of solid foundation, to gain more than ephemeral acceptance. Even now a great many thoughtful people are asking: "Do two wrongs make a right? If it was wrong to discriminate against the Negro, is it less wrong to discriminate in his favor, and thus against the vast remainder of the population?"

It is abundantly evident that the current disposition of the average politician to fawn upon the Negro is not born of love, but of fear; the fear that unless he joins in the noisy huckstering for "civil rights", he will lose the "Negro vote".

Those of us with long enough memories will recall that National Prohibition, during most of its life, enjoyed the public support of most of the politicians. Here, again, it was fear that motivated them. With a few exceptions, they did not vote for National Prohibition initially — or later vote for appropriations for its attempted enforcement — because they believed in it. On the contrary, they disbelieved in it, to the point of flagrantly violating it when occasion (and the state of their ulcers) permitted. They voted "dry" simply and solely because they were scared half to death that if they didn't, that old dragon, the Anti-Saloon League, would get them. Believing the League to be as politically powerful and ferocious as it pretended to be, they voted its mandate out of fear that otherwise it would devour them. Only after Franklin Roosevelt, in his 1932 campaign, came out boldly for repeal and, instead of being instantly consumed by fire and brimstone, was elected President, did more than a scant few of the politicians wake up to the fact that (1) the League never had been anything like as powerful as it claimed to be; and (2) for several years past, it had been no more than an empty shell. Only then did they trip over one another's feet in their mad rush to board the repeal band wagon.

The same thing is bound to happen with the politicians vis-a-vis the "Negro vote" which they now so much fear. It will take a little time yet, but most of us now living will see the day when the politicos will discover that their fear of this ogre was as ill-founded and foolish as their predecessor's fear of the Anti-Saloon League. Moreover, one of these not-too-distant days, most of the politicians — Democrats and Republicans alike — will awaken to the fact that it will be to their own distinct advantage — to say nothing of the nation's — to treat the Negro vote the same as any other. To be sure, they probably will not do this out of consideration for the nation's good. Rather, they will do it because they will by then have realized the advantage to themselves of not having to engage in "out-promising" contests with their rivals. And they will be helped to this realization by the Negro himself, who is smart enough to discover the emptiness of promises made under such conditions.

The French Revolution may well be history's most hideous example of the inhuman attempt to do what is humanly impossible. In the name of Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, and in the fanatical attempt to achieve their absolutes, the most unspeakable crimes were committed. Men crazed by the delusion that absolute equality was humanly attainable and desirable, deified violence; and, as the guillotine operated with the regularity of a metronome, the streets of Paris literally ran with blood of innocent men and women.

God forbid that this, or its like, should be repeated here in America, in our time! God forbid that, today, in the name of integration, men should — by the methods and means they employ in attempting to further it — create such a tidal wave of hostility as will submerge and destroy all that had been gained in more than a century of dedicated, intelligent, patient endeavor to increase understanding and improve human relations between black man and white!

1963 Pre-Legislative Clinics

(Sponsored By Mississippi Press Association and Mississippi Economic Council)

Commissioner Fred A. Ross attended 1963 Pre-Legislative clinics sponsored by the Mississippi Press Association and Mississippi Economic Council on November 11 at Delta State College, Cleveland; November 15 at the University of Southern Mississippi, Hattiesburg; November 18 at the University of Mississippi, Oxford. Morris Priebatsch, assisted by E. D. Cox and J. M. Richardson attended the clinic on November 22 in Jackson because Commissioner Ross had to fill a previous engagement elsewhere on that date.

Mr. Richardson, Mr. Priebatsch and Mr. Cox attended the clinics and assisted Commissioner Ross in answering questions asked on the floor. Commissioner Ross used some of the charts found in the publication, PUBLIC WELFARE IN MISSISSIPPI — PAST AND PRESENT to illustrate the matter under discussion. A summary of his remarks at each of the clinics is as follows:

"This first chart indicates that it costs nine cents out of each general fund dollar for the state to finance the State Department of Public Welfare. Homestead Exemption, likewise, costs nine cents. All other functions of the government cost eighty-two cents."

"The second chart shows that the twenty-five and one-half million dollars currently appropriated by the State Legislature produces each biennium eighty-eight million dollars in federal funds which goes into the channels of trade in this state. The federal contribution each biennium is the same as eighty-eight factory payrolls of one-half million dollars each per year."

"State law limits administrative expense to ten percent. The third chart shows that because of the limitation on administrative expense in 1961 welfare workers in Mississippi carried 398 Old Age Assistance cases compared with the national average of 224, and that welfare workers in Mississippi carried 152 Aid to Dependent Children cases compared with a national average of 85. If the state receives any federal funds during the next two-year period, our present caseload per worker must be reduced so that our workers can render the services required by the congress through amendments to the Social Security Act since your regular session in 1962."

"Like other agencies of government, the department has prepared a budget of funds needed beginning July 1, 1964, to continue the payments to the aged, the blind, the disabled, and dependent children as authorized by the Mississippi Legislature.

"Funds needed from the legislature beginning July 1, 1964, and continuing through June 30, 1966, amount to $29,821,064. This is an increase of $4,321,064 over the amount appropriated by the legislature for payments being made now and through June of next year. The requested funds will allow the department to pay the aged, the blind, and the disabled up to a maximum of $50 a month. It will also allow the department to provide, if needed, 20 days of hospital care. The aged presently can receive hospital care. The blind and disabled do not receive such care because there are not sufficient funds available. If the funds requested are approved by the legislature, it will also mean that the dependent children who are now receiving an average of $11.21 a month for food, clothing, and shelter will receive on the average $15.32 a month to buy the necessities of life.

"Funds requested also include an amount to take care of administering the programs. Both Federal and State Laws and policies require each case be carefully investigated to determine the need for granting a check. Visits to the homes are required. There are many services which the county departments' staff either provide or help obtain for people receiving a welfare check. There are other people who receive services from the department but do not receive a check.

"Beginning next July, to investigate the financial needs of people and to provide services, it will cost more money than the department is permitted by State Law to spend for administration. Additional administrative costs next year will be due to requirements of the Federal Government. Federal funds will not be available unless the department meets these requirements. This problem can be solved by the legislature by either removing the ten percent limitation regarding administrative cost in Section 7241 of the Mississippi Code, or allowing slightly more than the ten percent of funds received to be spent for administration.

"If the funds requested for the aged, blind, and disabled and for increased administrative costs are not received, then the department will have no choice but to reduce grants to needy people and cut out some of the services now being provided. It is for the people of Mississippi to determine if the funds requested should be provided, or if the welfare program should be reduced beginning next July."

Mississippi has the second highest number of old age assistance cases per worker of any state in the nation and is among the states with the highest number of aid to dependent children cases per worker.

Now And The Future

Jessie Littleton, Director, Joint Field Staff

(Child Welfare Staff Meeting Speech—October 15, 1963)

Mr. Saucier, Child Welfare Staff and others:

Greetings to all of you! It is good to be with you again in our regular, quarterly child welfare staff meeting.

This is the time when we come together from our various assignments to think about what we are doing in child welfare, to find inspiration and new thoughts to help us in our every day jobs.

Your program chairman talked to me about this discussion with you. He suggested that I develop my thoughts around the title, "Now, and the Future," giving you some facts about where we are now in child welfare in Mississippi and what we have in mind for the future.

As we look at such a title we might say our "Now" is the "Future" of our "Yesterday." When I talked with you here last July we reviewed the structure of the agency which had so recently changed. We tried to look at where you were in the staff of the agency and at some plans for the future.

More than a year has passed since that meeting and "Now" is necessarily different to the "Now" we described then. Not in structure of the agency perhaps, but the "Future" of that day has become the "Now" of today, and we look to another future. We are still planning, still assessing and still evaluating, else child welfare as any other area of the program would stagnate.

What is Now"? What is "and the Future"? So far, they are organization and program of services for children. These are necessary but may I suggest that there must be something else. Throughout all of it is a constant which I believe is the heart and soul of any "Now" as well as "Future" in child welfare. This constant, this extra something that must be the Dynamo of organization and program and which gives hope to the child and his parents is you, and you, and you.

This is not just a you, but a particular you, with a particular yen for investing your basic interest in children and their families. Your training and experience, together with all the help the agency has to offer you to help them. To this thought I would like to address most of our thinking today.

Let us think for a few moments about the word "Now" in our title. This thought encompasses where we are now in program, staff, and training — all of which should reflect the "Future" plans of our yesterday. It encompasses, also, all of the adaptations resulting from the actual experience of working through, assessing and evaluating the program in its day by day operation during the past year. I will stay with staffing but I believe a few words here about program and training are pertinent to do so.

You will be discussing this afternoon the new child welfare definition 1/ which I think is one of the basic stepping stones to an opportunity for you to do the quality of work which larger caseloads do not allow. The new defined services program in ADC and closer coordination of the child welfare and ADC programs, holds promise for providing better services to children. The new emphasis on the day care program will provide opportunity, we hope, to develop this resource for children throughout the state.

Emphasis at the state level in the Child Welfare Division on consultation to the county and field staff in the various areas of the child welfare program is not in the future but "Now." Here we have the expert knowledge in each area of the child welfare program where staff is available. I must inject here a hope for the "Future." This knowledge is too valuable to keep it bottled up. We need to utilize it more fully with county and district staff.

May I give you at this point a brief, concise picture of staffing for child welfare as it is now. We have had goals for the next several years outlined by Federal plan in terms of caseloads and supervision. These are long-range goals but I believe we need such a challenge in order to work toward offering a higher quality of services in child welfare. Such long-range goals help us to work hard on immediate goals for Mississippi children.

So, during the past year, we have looked at staffing in terms of both goals. We have recognized as best we could with the staff available the need to assign trained staff in areas where we have the greatest concentration in child welfare cases. We have recognized, also, that supervision by trained staff is necessary in these counties.

Continued recruitment to the social work trainee job of persons with potential for child welfare and who are interested in training is a must. As you know, during one past year permanent training units for social work trainees have been initiated. We could run one or more of these year round if we could get trainees. You can help us with this.

You have a new listing of all child welfare staff so I will not give you a complete breakdown on staff.

It needs to be said that in 22 counties we have one or more child welfare workers with at least a year of graduate training. Several of these persons have Master's Degrees. These will be found in the counties of greatest need of their services. Casework Supervisors and/or Child Welfare Workers III have been assigned in three of the counties with highest child welfare caseloads, and we are looking toward another two or three during this year.

Child welfare visitors in 18 counties, for years in many cases, have been carrying full child welfare caseloads. In addition, we have several social workers in training in child welfare positions.

For the future, we need, as has been said, to recruit from present staff as well as otherwise. We will look toward establishing more supervisory units in counties where there are several workers. We need to try to build or maybe better said, to feed into our child welfare program in some areas, and the foster home program needs continued stimulation in the counties.

May I now get back to the "constant" mentioned earlier, back to you, the person who has the assigned responsibility of working with children and their parents, of bringing into being the various resources of the program to meet the needs of children.

What does working with your client, the child and his family, mean to you? Would it be the opportunity to bring to bear upon his personality your feeling that you have the most important job in the world — that through your understanding of his needs, and of the resources at your command, you help him to be a more adequate person?

Miss Kate Shepherd in her article, "Essentials for Good Family Living" said that she had found no pill to give which would make the essentials of good family life available to our ADC families but that the only answer is "US". She says, "We are the craftsmen who work with the most important material in the world — human personality. We are the only source of getting improved services to these distressed people." 2/ She was talking of ADC families but the same is true in child welfare.

Is your child of such importance to you that you keep his record alive by recording the necessary and important facts about him before you move on to another. There is nothing that will be more important to him than for his worker to recognize the need to put him in his record so that services to him may continue if she leaves, or if he gets another worker, or even as she herself continues to work with him.

Talking of records, they reflect the worker's feelings and attitudes too, as you know, so your interest, your genuine desire to help him is there, too. I read a record one time that aptly illustrates how true this can be.

The first worker recorded the necessary eligibility factors and recommended appropriate action but did little else to help the client, who finally got to another county and went to the welfare office. There she found a worker who saw her as a person. The record showed visit after visit to the home (the home which the visitor helped find for the client) close work with her and interest in her children. The result of the last worker's interest was obvious from the response of the client.

Does your child's worker see him as a person or a figure on the "statistics" report? If she sees him as a person, then the agent or supervisor gets a completed report on time, gets all forms correctly made to substantiate requests for funds, and otherwise provide for his needs. Programs are reflected by reports on services to children. Financial support depends upon them. Your children need the program and need money so this phase of your job might be easier if you can feel his needs even in making reports.

Your client knows you have respect for him as a person, and believe in his ability to change and grow as you visit him regularly, as you talk with him, about himself with the interest in him that he can feel, and that will enable him to do his best with what he has.

There are many other facets of this I am sure but I hope these few statements will help you to understand why I feel that you are the constant, the thread of life between the child and his family and the program. Without you, he would have no way to develop his potential and to discover his own worth as Miss Shepherd has said in the previous mentioned article.

The program is for the child and his family but you should never underestimate the fact that you are the program to him. Also, that the next worker, the researcher, the statistician and finally the Commissioner and the Legislature, see him as you paint his picture for them.

May I say that I read many field reports and reports of conferences with you, and I see that you are busy. I can only hope that you will soon have more reasonable caseloads as a result of the new child welfare definition. Plan well, visit with a purpose, record what you do, use your supervisor, and continue your in-service training with a view to being the best worker your client has ever had. To him you are the constant, you are the agency.

How To "Beat" Social Security

With most of us, our feelings about social security are like those of a woman at a sale: We are happy about the whole thing only if we feel we are getting a bargain.

The way to guarantee a whopping bargain on your social security is to die young and leave a widow with several very young children. If you have been making good money, they may receive better than $50,000 in benefits before they are all through drawing money on your account. Another device that will guarantee substantial benefit payments is to become completely disabled at a young age with two or three children and your wife as dependents. Neither of these techniques for "beating" social security has proved very popular.

Actually, the average person gets back from social security about what he paid in. In general it works out so that the most money is paid out where the most money is needed. The man who does die, leaving a widow and young children, has provided a substantial sum of money for them through his social security tax payments. With the worker in the family gone, they need all the money they can get.

The man who becomes totally and permanently disabled and lives as a semi-invalid for many years will receive a considerable amount of money from social security. He needs every dime of it.

The same is true of the worker who retires. Even if he avoids serious illness he is going to need all that social security can pay to keep meat on the table.

As with any insurance, social security is designed to help out in case the thing happens we don't want to happen. We don't want an automobile accident just so we can collect on our casualty insurance. We would rather our house didn't burn down. And most of us want to live a long time, stay healthy and work for good money at a job we like until the day we die. We won't make money on our social security that way, but we will have had the feeling of security that comes from knowing the protection was there had we needed it.

Miss Dorothy Hamm

Miss Dorothy Hamm, Welfare Consultant, finished her tour of public welfare service on November 30, after nearly 22 years with the State Department of Public Welfare.

Miss Hamm started her social work career in 1932 with the Works Progress Administration during the reconstruction of the national economy in the depression years. When the WPA program was discontinued, a number of the trained staff members were employed by state agencies.

Always alert to an opportunity for improving her knowledge and skills, she took advantage of the educational leave policy of the department and earned her Master's degree in Social Work (MSW) from Tulane University in 1946. Her Master's thesis was A STUDY OF THE INFLUENCE OF PUBLIC ASSISTANCE LEGISLATION ON THE ALMSHOUSE POPULATION IN MISSISSIPPI.

She worked as a District Supervisor from 1942 to 1953; as administrative reviewer April 1953 to November 1957; and finally as Welfare Consultant from December 1957 to December 1963.

The state office honored Miss Hamm with a 'farewell party' and a gift of silver on her last day of duty. The good, dedicated ones never leave us: they just say "auf Wiedersehen."

If you are receiving social security checks, it is important to notify the Social Security Administration as well as the post office whenever you move. Otherwise your monthly check may be delayed or it may be returned to the Government instead of being forwarded to you.

M. Care of Welfare

Price of a Civilized Society

When a woman in a mink coat joined thousands of relief clients lined up before a federal surplus food distribution center in New York, two years ago, the press had a heyday. The impression was clearly given that the relief rolls are loaded with chiselers. Later, New Yorker magazine writer A. J. Liebling assailed the press for failing to report that the mink was a moth-eaten castoff.

The relief client is much maligned. Being relatively helpless and defenseless, he is a handy scapegoat upon whom to blame local and federal tax burdens. And while chiseling is far more prevalent in the upper reaches of our society, it's much easier and more popular to curb the welfare chiseler.

Newburgh, N. Y., came into national prominence two years ago when Joseph Mitchell, the city manager, branded relief clients chiselers and sought to dispose of them with meat-axe welfare cuts. Mitchell was foiled by the intervention of the State of New York. Last year, the Newburgh official was among those indicted for seeking to defraud the city through land deals.

There are without doubt some frauds on the relief rolls. These always are the excuse to pare relief allowances and to drive from the rolls marginal clients or those whose need is great but who in one way or another have failed to meet the letter of the law.

In San Diego, California, a man and woman were convicted of swindling some $20,000 in aid-to-dependent-children funds and 13 others were charged with receiving $42,000 in relief funds illegally.

Although there is no justification for illegal acceptance of relief funds, the $20,000 swindle wasn't quite as bad as it was made to appear. It took place over 13 years, meaning that the annual illegal take was in the neighborhood of $1,500.

The incident was quickly used as a whip to beat the needy. "Indiscriminate welfare," charged

District Attorney Don Keller, "has encouraged a life of indolence for too many people in this state."

Typically, San Diego County's answer to the relief problem was to crack down on innocent and guilty alike. It expanded its staff of investigators to weed out every possible relief client who failed to meet the letter of the law. County officials have long had a "hard" approach to welfare problems. Attempts to get tough have been fought by the California Welfare Department, which has threatened to cut off state funds.

Case of D. C.

The San Diego County relief fracas is small compared with the storm kicked up in the District of Columbia by Senator Robert C. Byrd (D., W. Va.) last summer. Before the Senator was finished, some 57 percent of the District's relief recipients had been branded "chiseler." The Byrd investigation centered upon the Capital's aid-for-dependent-children program.

Washington, D. C., has the world's most exalted and expensive city council. The city is governed with studied indifference by the Congress of the United States. Since its citizens lack voice and vote in local affairs, Congress has always neglected to vote adequate funds to aid local government. The federal government owns much of the more valuable real estate and is supposed to contribute a fair share of local government costs.

The city has no municipal college except for the run-down plant of D. C. Teachers College. Many school buildings are obsolete and social services are faltering. While Senator Byrd was investigating welfare payments, Congress appropriated $10 million for a gilded aquarium on the banks of the polluted Potomac.

Washington is half-way house between the South and the big cities of the North. Seeking greater economic opportunity, Negroes have been migrating northward. Many have settled in Washington where government jobs — especially in the lower grades—are often available. Today, Negroes outnumber whites, many of whom have fled to Maryland and Virginia suburbs.

The Washington Negro community is one in transition. A large and self-sufficient Negro middle-class has emerged, but others remain totally submerged. Some have yet to make the transition from the depressed rural culture of the Negro South to the urban culture of the District. Discriminated against in jobs and housing and lacking education, Negroes make up a disproportionate majority of those on relief.

Washington, D. C., has a population of almost 800,000. Relief clients of all kinds numbered about 12,000 last summer. City heads—the District Commissioners—have proposed to cut 1,500 from the relief load. At the same time, they plan to spend an additional million dollars annually upon an "investigative unit" to police the rolls.

The District has one of the most strict and inhumane rules covering aid to dependent children. It provides that if any mother receiving such aid has any provable continuing relationship with a man, she and her brood will be kicked off relief rolls no matter how great the need.

This man-in-the-house rule has contributed to desertions. Jobless breadwinners have left home so their families could be eligible for aid. Where such breadwinners have been caught in the home, families have been denied continued assistance.

Mothers found living with men who could, if employed, support the family have also been thrown off the relief rolls. In cases where a man had even a casual relationship with a mother, the mother's children have been denied help.

West Virginia's Senator Byrd has charged that $18 million has been paid out in illegal welfare grants over the last four years by soft-headed District officials and social case workers. The Senator is of the view that payments to a mother having an illicit relationship with a man condones immorality.

The District's relief problem is complicated by the relatively high number of Negro children born out of wedlock who receive aid. In punishing mothers, welfare officials have sometimes forced helpless children to bear the burden of want.

In "proving" that 57 percent of D. C. welfare cases were chiselers, investigators used a random sampling of 280 cases. Inevitably, some of the findings were sensationalized nationally and locally in the press.

The Cases

One case involved a mother with four children who had been receiving payments for four years. A man discovered living in the house claimed to be a brother. On investigation, he turned out to be the father of two of the children. He was then earning $85 weekly.

In another case, a mother of six was living with a "brother-in-law" who turned out to be a husband. The mother received $191 monthly. The husband had a job paying all of $65 weekly with which to support the family of eight after aid payments ceased.

A mother of four had been receiving $109 monthly. Investigators found a man in the bathroom who admitted that he lived in the household. A mother of four was cut off from relief payments of $205 monthly when it was learned that she earned $20 a week and also received $10 weekly from a "boy friend" for TV set payments.

The investigation revealed that relief recipients are human and want some of the good things of our affluent society. Bernard W. Scholz, public assistance chief, protested shock after it was learned that some clients had purchased TV sets and phonographs on time contracts. While the clients were held up as perpetrators of reprehensible acts, the dealers who extended credit contracts at high interest rates were assumed to be conducting perfectly legal business transactions.

The Washington Post and Times Herald got the relief clients' side of the story. Told by these unfortunates, the purchases were hardly scandalous. Five of six interviewed said they were not using welfare money to buy appliances but were making payments with cash supplied by working children not dependent upon public assistance, or from other relatives.

"That phonograph keeps my children at home. If they were out, they'd get into trouble. It's all we got," one relief mother said.

"I like to listen to the services," an epileptic woman said, pointing to her clock-radio. "It helps keep down my mind."

As seen by the Washington Post reporters, the relief clients in question were hardly living in luxury. One 40-year-old grandmother of two and mother of four had just returned from the hospital. There was a new bed in the living room and a radio-phono. The woman told the reporters that the radio-phono belonged to a neighbor who had left it after being evicted. She said that the new bed had been bought for her by her 17-year-old son who worked in a restaurant because the old one was too painful for her to sleep in. She added that she shared the bed with two children.

Sad Results

The proof of sour pudding lies in the stomach-ache that usually follows. Within four months after the Byrd investigation, some 2,800 children had been cut off relief. At least 250 had landed at Junior Village, the already fearfully overcrowded city home for homeless children of the nation's capital. Seven hundred and twelve children were crammed into space intended for 320. While the District was cutting its relief load, it was causing misery and buying future crime.

Junior Village, like most such institutions, has been sadly understaffed. The city has called for 150 volunteers to help out the underpaid, ill-trained, and overworked staff who earn from $3,560 to $4,110 annually.

Live Like Animals

Junior Village has been described by one reporter as "frightening." Children "live crowded like animals in space for half their number; spend their formative years untaught and unloved, suffer from personal and emotional neglect."

Senator Byrd relented slightly last December when he ordered D. C. officials to move children out of the overcrowded jungle into their own or foster homes. The problem was that foster parents weren't readily found because D. C. payments for support were only from $53 to $57 monthly. And in their own homes, there was no longer aid to disqualified parents. At this writing, Junior Village continues to be the same fearful hell-hole for insecure children with no place else to go.

Junior Village kids and other deprived children reveal only a small part of the D. C. relief mess. Social workers for private welfare agencies tell these stories:

"A 17-year-old girl with two children (one legitimate, the other not) has been deserted by her husband. The husband, pursued by charges of nonsupport and a bench warrant, has managed so far to stay ahead of the police in his flight. The Welfare Department refuses to grant any relief to the girl on grounds that it is her responsibility to produce her husband even when the police cannot. Social workers say that this rule is being widely applied against abandoned families.

"A mother of six children was attempting to hold a job, but her youngsters repeatedly got into trouble while she was away. At last the Police Women's Bureau and the Welfare Department advised her to stop working and accept relief. And then on November 1, without warning, her relief checks were stopped.

"When she was unable to elicit the reason from the Department, she turned frantically to a private welfare agency. After much inquiry, the agency learned that a Welfare Department investigator had raised the question whether the father of the children was her husband, who deserted her years ago, or another man, not dead.

"Because the mother could not satisfactorily prove paternity, her relief was cut off. After protests from the private agency, relief was recommended, temporarily, after a hiatus that reduced the family to the edge of starvation.

"A mother of six children was on relief because her husband beat her viciously and she could not live with him. The Department then discovered that she was renting her home, a single room, from a landlord who was a bachelor and who lived in the same building. According to the Department, that constituted a violation of the man-in-the-house rule. Her relief was stopped."

These stories are far different from those told in headlines provided by the Senator from West Virginia. They are reprinted as they appeared inside a Washington Post editorial.

Self-fulfilling Estimate

"Here we see what relief eligibility means in actual practice," said the Post. "Eligibility for many families is an off-an-on affair. Perhaps a mother was once eligible, but then a man moved in with her and the [Welfare] Department, crying man-in-the-house, stopped her checks. Now the man has moved out, but the Department considers her untrustworthy and will not even discuss reinstating her. Since she cannot find a job, her recourse is to another man. The Department's estimate of her will be, in the end, self-fulfilling."

Relief clients sometimes are considered an inferior breed who merit only contempt. D. C. Public Assistance Chief Bernard Scholz has summed up such an official attitude. He has called for more "snoopers," adding that the "friend at the door" attitude that prevailed in the thirties was fine because in those days "truly nice people" needed help.

President Kennedy's budget message for the District of Columbia reflected White House concern with Washington's welfare problems, overcrowding at Junior Village, and the denial of aid to the children of jobless workers who remain in their homes. The President called upon Congress to grant an additional $1.3 million for relief payments and said the nation's capital should be "a leader" in carrying out reforms approved last year by Congress. Similar proposals for enlarged D. C. relief payments and relief from the onerous "man-in-the-house" rule were rebuffed in Congress last year.

The D. C. welfare probe and its exaggerated findings have been held up to the national mirror as proof that chiseling is widespread and that relief clients live in high style at the expense of hard-working taxpayers. The Wall Street Journal used the District as its horrible example in reporting on "welfare chiseling" and the "seemingly endless expense of the nation's depression-nurtured system of federal-state relief." The drive against the nation's most depressed segment is mounting, although, as the Washington Post has noted, relief "at best merely supports miserable people in squalor."

The Reverend Thomas J. Reese, a leading Roman Catholic welfare expert, has charged that there seems to be a concerted "drive against the poor and the socially disadvantaged." Father Reese is director of the Catholic Welfare Guild of Wilmington, Delaware. He has asserted that Delaware State Police have indiscriminate access to case records for purposes of discrediting welfare programs.

"We cannot accept," said Father Reese, "the facile solution to a problem of indigence that requires a woman to be sterilized to receive further public assistance for herself and her children."

Poverty's Handmaiden

Relief is the handmaiden of poverty. When U. S. Steel closed down its mill at Donora, Pa., some 80 percent of the work force became unemployed. Desolate Donora soon had 2,500 on relief, and 3,200 receiving government surplus foods. The town's story is repeated monotonously in depressed pockets across the country —in desolated mine communities, former textile towns, and other communities left high and dry by economic forces beyond their control.

Donora is only a small part of the relief story. There is not a major city in the nation without a welfare problem. In some cities, supplementary relief payments must be given to exploited workers unable to earn enough to sustain their families.

New York City approved a $1.50 minimum wage ordinance last fall. The new law required the immediate establishment of a $1.25 wage floor. It was estimated that 180,000 workers earned below that amount. Many had been receiving supplementary relief from the city.

A recent study showed that 49 percent of New York families are poor by modern standards. The study found that over 70 percent of nonwhite New York families fell into the "poor" category. Among these poor are the unemployed, the underemployed, the unskilled, the semiskilled, the aged, the widowed mother, the culturally maladjusted, the sick, the handicapped, and the cast-off of society. From these ranks comes the nation's relief load.

Despite relatively high unemployment and mounting social ills, the U. S. relief load is comparatively small. Only four percent of the nation's 185 million are on relief. Despite complaints about high costs, the nation's relief costs come to less than one percent of its national income—about $4 billion.

Of the seven million receiving welfare assistance, some 2.8 million are children. The total spent for "aid to dependent children" amounts to about $1 billion annually. Despite charges of rewarding illegitimacy, more than 80 percent of children assisted are born in wedlock.

The State of Ohio has termed its ADC program a "challenge to the community." Its Division of Social Administration has reported that ADC payments amounted to $3.8 million in June 1961. Payments were made to children under 18 "who have been deprived of support by death, incapacity of a parent, continued absence of a parent (usually the father), and who are living with a parent or close relative."

Ohio ADC money aided almost 125,000 children—about 2.8 percent of the state's dependent children. Monthly payments amounted to $30.79 per recipient. The federal government paid two-thirds; the state 22.6 percent, and the locality paid the balance.

The second largest welfare category is assistance to the aged. Some 2.3 million of the nation's elders receive about $2 billion annually in old age assistance payments.

About 87,000 elders received assistance from the State of Ohio in June 1961. The federal government supplied 56 percent of the funds and the state provided the remainder. Administered by state agencies, the program paid out $5.8 million in direct aid, and $1.1 million more to vendors for health care. Direct aid grants averaged $66.23; health payments averaged $77.37.

About 800,000 mothers receive $300 million annually in welfare grants; 400,000 disabled persons receive $300 million more; 100,000 blind persons get $100 million. Chief support for these programs comes from federal funds, although they are state-administered.

Most sadly misunderstood is the general relief program. Known generally as "home relief," this depression-born program supports indigent families unable to fend for themselves. An unfair press has pilloried general relief recipients as good-for-nothing and loafers.

A million families annually receive home relief, but the total cost is only $300 million. Home relief families subsist on budgets only one-fourth as great as those of nonwelfare families. How they manage is often a mystery, even to serious students of the problem. Applicants must subject themselves to a means test and thoroughgoing persistent investigations. Children of home relief families sometimes bear a stigma that inhibits normal emotional development.

Ohio reported that 39,000 families received general welfare aid in June 1961. These families included 137,000 persons who received $2.9 million in direct grants. This averaged out to $20.05 per person—less than $5 weekly.

Contrary to misleading press reports, outright fraud and chiseling add only two percent to relief costs. Almost 90 percent of those on relief are too old, too young, or too sick to work, or must care for children too young to care for themselves. Most of those on relief who are able to work would do so if only jobs were available. Relief costs are not rising; they actually declined by 11 percent between 1950 and 1960 despite chronic joblessness and a burgeoning population.

Rehabilitation

The Kennedy Administration has called for programs to help relief recipients become self-supporting. Last year, Congress made changes in the law and provided funds to aid such work. Welfare programs utilizing federal funds have been centralized in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare under a Welfare Administration headed by Mrs. Ellen Winston. Mrs. Winston has long been known as an articulate spokesman for the dispossessed. She has been highly critical of Congress-authorized cuts in relief grants to large D. C. relief families.

Under the new reorganization, the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation is being enlarged and reorganized into the Vocational Rehabilitation Administration. Efforts will be made to assist cities and counties to train the able-bodied on relief for new jobs.

Rehabilitation is a fine idea and should be an object of welfare programs wherever possible. But in a society which has more manpower than jobs, possibilities for gainful employment are limited.

Even in that best of all possible worlds where there are jobs for all, rehabilitation will answer only a small part of the problem. If all those on general relief who are able to work were provided with jobs, massive relief problems would still be with us.

America will have to face up to welfare programs as long as there are fatherless children, the dependent aged, the sick, and the disabled. Welfare programs for those unable to care for themselves are part of the price that must be paid to sustain a democratic, civilized society. The real tragedy of present welfare programs is their woeful inadequacy and the poor grace with which they are too often administered.

THE FAUQUIER HOSPITAL STERILIZATION STORY

By Gerald Grant

Mrs. S. is 30 years old and married to a Virginia sharecropper who earns about $45 a week. They have four children to care for. Forty-five dollars barely provides the necessities. Mrs. S. felt her children were being cheated in some way she found hard to express. When she became pregnant for the fifth time, she went to a new maternity clinic in her community to have the baby. During her treatment there she was told about family planning and a free sterilization operation. She chose the latter. A year after the operation she said she was glad she had had it performed and that she consequently had more time for her children and was no longer worried about additional pregnancies.

Was the act of sterilizing Mrs. S. "utterly reprehensible," lacking "even the moral judgments which must be weighed in consideration of abortion"?

Was "its obvious and crudely selfish materialistic purpose" the reduction of the community's tax rate?

Or was it "a moral good, for it grants to the poor privileges which they desperately need which are now enjoyed by the prosperous alone"?

These were the comments of a rabbi, an archbishop and a minister, respectively, on a sterilization procedure that made headlines recently. This report attempts to go behind those headlines and trace the course of the debate that was precipitated by a visit of a group of sociologists to the Fauquier Hospital in Warrenton, Va., where Mrs. S.'s operation was performed.

The group of about twenty sociologists had been attending a convention in Washington. They left the city on a muggy September Sunday in three limousines provided by the Human Betterment Association, the organization that sponsored the tour.

In its advance publicity the Association had noted that the Fauquier Hospital provided "the first complete maternity service for medically indigent patients in a rural area."

It also mentioned that services offered by the hospital's maternity clinic included "prenatal care, delivery and guidance in all methods of family planning, including voluntary sterilization."

The Human Betterment Association described itself as an organization promoting voluntary sterilization. One of its purposes in sponsoring the tour was to demonstrate that sterilizations could be and were being lawfully performed. The Association said it aided the Fauquier Hospital "in the development of its surgical birth control program."

The sociologists who toured the hospital in a calm, scientific way little imagined the national discussion their visit would raise.

As a result of their tour the hospital's sterilization procedure, which had been in operation for 33 months (but was relatively unknown outside the county), received nationwide publicity.

In the face of growing concern about ways of dealing with the "population explosion" and increased

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION
Under Public Law 565-1954

Vocational rehabilitation is a service provided jointly by the State and Federal Government to conserve the greatest of all assets--the working usefulness of human beings. This service is comparable to Public Education, Public Health and other activities for the Welfare of the people. Employment is always the aim of Vocational Rehabilitation.

SERVICES PROVIDED TO RESTORE WORK ABILITY

Medical, psychological and vocational diagnosis to determine the extent of the applicant's disability, and his mental and vocational limitations.

Counsel and guidance to help the disabled person attain the right job objective.

Physical restoration, medical, surgical, psychiatric and hospital care, and work therapy, to correct to reduce the disability.

Artificial appliances--limbs, braces, hearing aids, and other devices, to increase work ability.

Training, in schools, colleges, on-the-job, by tutors or correspondence, in preparation for the right job.

Transportation and maintenance during treatment or training, in needed.

Tools and equipment, if needed, to give the disabled person a fair start.

Placement in a suitable job, and follow-up to make sure he is safely and satisfactorily employed.

MENTAL AND EMOTIONAL

Studies show mental illness is the most prevalent disability among our people. The cost of care and treatment of the mentally ill is a heavy drain upon public financial resources, and the families of patients.

MENTALLY RETARDED

With financial assistance provided through a Federal grant, a three-year project was undertaken. The primary objectives were: (1) the development of better techniques for evaluating the vocational potential of mentally retarded persons; (2) the development of facilities for training and job preparation; and (3) the provision of necessary Vocational Rehabilitation services to a larger number of mentally retarded persons.

The Division has cooperated with local communities in establishing workshops for training thse clients in Atlanta and Savannah. It also works with local school systems in programs for "exceptional children."

The number of mentally retarded rehabilitated into jobs increased from 37 in 1958-59 to 83 in 1959-60.

EPILEPTICS TRAINING

In providing training for eligible clients, the Division utilizes the services and facilities of public and private institutions: universities, colleges, trade schools, and commercial schools in the communities.

Last year (1959-60) 867 were enrolled in universities and colleges. At the same time, 1,236 were in training in other educational institutions and establishments. Among those rehabilitated, 884 had their major vocational training as follows:

Colleges and Universities	267
Business and other specialized college or school	192
Trade Schools	265
Sheltered workshops	10
On-the-job	75
Other	75
Total	884

OASI DISABILITY DETERMINATIONS

To qualify for disability insurance benefits, a worker must be so seriously disabled that he is "unable to engage in any substantial gainful activity."

In addition, he must have worked under Social Security for at least five years out of the ten years before he became disabled.

YOUR OPPORTUNITY FOR JOB TRAINING

Who can get training?

Unemployed and underemployed persons who can qualify for training and who cannot expect to get full-time employment without training.

Unemployed youth 16 years of age or older.

What kind of training will be given?

Vocational courses in schools
On-the-job training
A combination of vocational and on-the-job training.

Do trainees pay for training courses?

No.

Will trainees receive any money from the government?

Yes, in certain instances, as follows:

1. Unemployed heads of families or heads of households who have had at least 3 years of gainful employment

2. Unemployed youths over 19 but under 22 years of age who do not qualify for regular training allowances--if allowances are necessary to provide occupational training.

3. To continue to receive allowances, trainees must have a satisfactory attendance records and make satisfactory progress

4. An individual may not receive a training allowance for more than 52 weeks.

How much allowance does a trainee eligible for such benefits receive?

In case of an unemployed youth over 19 but under 22 years of age who does not qualify for a regular training allowance, no more than $20 a week.

For trainees to live away from home, subsistence payments not to exceed $5 a day, and transportation, not more than 10 cents a mile.

It is expected that courses will be given in vocational training facilities already established, in public schools and colleges, and in facilities provided by employers, trade associations, labor organizations, and other industrial and community groups cooperating in the on-the-job training program.

EMPLOYMENT SECURITY LAW

Benefit Eligibility Conditions - Section 4

54-609. An unemployed individual shall be eligible to receive benefits with respect to any week only if the Commissioner finds that:

(a) He has registered for work at and thereafter has continued to report at an employment office in accordance with such regulations as the Commissioner may prescribe, except that the Commissioner may, by regulation, waive or alter either or both the requirements of this subsection as to such types of cases or situations with respect to which he finds that compliance with such requirements would be oppresive or would be inconsistent with the purposes of this Act.

(b) He has, while unemployed or while employed less than full-time during a regular work week if his deductibe earnings (any amount over $8) do not equal or exceed his weekly benefit amount, made a claim for benefits in accordance with the provisions of Section 6 (a) of this Act. (This provision as amended, shall be effective Julyl, 1960.)

(c) He is able to work, and is available for work, and has actively and in good faith sought employment, and is actively and in good faith seeking employment, and is bona fide in the labor market...

EDUCATION

"Future Teacher Scholarships - The best and brightest note in the teacher picture in Georgia is that young Georgians with the finest minds and a talent for teaching may now apply for state future teacher scholarships that can go as high as $5,000 and do not have to be repaid -- not a single dime of it -- by those who will teach in Georgia. This program is putting more and more brains in Georgia classrooms, has given students a new respect for the teaching profession. Future Teacher Scholarship holders are often the outstanding students on Georgia campuses, are graduating with honors, are being chosen campus leaders. We need this kind of mind and personality in Georgia classrooms. No money that the state invests is paying richer dividends than this program. We now have 750 bright young Georgians in college on these scholarships, would like to have 1,000, with 250 going in each September, 250 coming out to teach in Georgia classrooms."

The Negro in America

HOW WE TREAT HIM AND HOW WE SHOULD

THE NEGRO IN AMERICA

The facts and conclusions presented in the pamphlet, "THE NEGRO IN AMERICA," have been drawn from months of continuous exploration and consultation with individuals of outstanding competence in Negro-white relations, in labor, industry, education and housing.

We have drawn fully on the experience of the Medical Research Division of the Rockefeller Foundation and the Deans of eastern medical schools including Harvard, Columbia, Cornell, Yale and Tufts.

Bankers, housing officials and contract builders, thoroughly experienced in their several fields gave the full benefit of their experience and competence to this study.

Correspondence and inquiry is sincerely invited.

AMERICAN FAITH

The contending forces of liberty and oppression, tolerance and hate, are joined in titanic battle that will determine the kind of world in which mankind will live for the next century.

In such a conflict America has no choice. All of our history and our traditions bind us to oppose oppression and intolerance, and to defend that ideal of government which has as its end equality of opportunity for all men without regard to race or color or creed. On this principle the American democracy was founded. And it is to preserve this principle as a vital force in the world that the nation has called its sons to arms.

It is a tribute to our democracy that Americans of every national and racial origin and of every religious faith have responded willingly to that call. On the battlefields of this war the sons of black and white, Jew and Gentile have fallen. And in the growing list of heroes, who have performed deeds of valor far beyond the call of duty, are the names of Polish and Italian and Scandinavian boys from all over the nation, of Jewish boys from New York's East Side, of Negro boys from Texas and Alabama, who had but one loyalty and that was to America and its ideals.

On the all-important homefront, the same high devotion to our country has characterized our people, whatever their race or color or creed. From the earnings of the Negro worker, as well as the white, the income tax is withheld, War Bonds are purchased. There is no restriction to which he is not subject. There is no task that falls to the lot of his fellow citizens which he can escape. Nor has he tried. Of the American Negro, as of Americans of other racial and national origins, this must be said: He has shirked no duty, evaded no responsibility, imposed no condition on his loyalty or service.

Out of the welter of this war we must plan and work for a better America and a happier world, an America which fulfills its ideal of equality of opportunity, an America and a world where no man shall suffer solely because of his race or his color or his creed.

In the period of transition from war to peace, even more than now, we will be called upon to demonstrate our faith in and our willingness to live according to the principles of democracy. The dreadful alternatives to tolerance and good-will are misunderstanding, distrust and antagonisms, leading to confusion and violence. America has not been free from manifestations of bitter racial antagonisms in the past. But the American people must resolve that these shameful racial outbreaks which have humiliated our government before the world, shall not occur again.

THE NEGRO IN AMERICA

The Negro in America is struggling to attain first-class citizenship. Great progress has been made in two generations; even more if the history of 75 years is encompassed. Many obstacles remain; some set-backs have occurred, others may be expected.

The degree of attainment and the rapidity of progress vary widely according to the social climate of the particular community and general section of the country. Conditions in the southern states where the issues have been more acute over a longer period of time are being examined and the local issues faced constructively by organized groups of influential white and Negro southerners. What is and is not accomplished there is of profound interest and importance to the rest of the country.

The Council For Democracy believes strongly, however, that this challenge is to be met primarily by southern residents themselves. The Southern Regional Conference, composed of distinguished leaders of both races, has already made significant contributions and is best qualified to carry forward the work begun there by its joint statements of principles and aims.

The Negro problem in America is not, however, confined to the southern states. The colored population in many northern states, especially in industrial centers, is constantly increasing. The economic and social levels of Negroes in these northern areas is of direct and vital concern to all their inhabitants. These problems break down naturally into three principal inquiries: (1) what kind of jobs do Negroes get and how steady is their employment; (2) what housing facilities are available to them; (3) what educational opportunities do they have and use? These are the foundations of full citizenship, assuming full equality in political and civil rights.

The Council For Democracy has made careful inquiry into these three phases, as found in selected, typical communities of the northeastern states. With due allowance for variations and differences in degree, and disallowing the wholly exceptional, isolated, atypical instances, the Council finds fairly consistent patterns in this particular section of our country which are summarized below. Some of these findings, we believe, will be equally typical of western and northwestern areas.

No attempt has been made to state the elementary moral and political principles of full citizenship; it is assumed that these are known and fully accepted by all responsible white citizens who believe that democracy in America should include blacks as well as whites. The purpose of this statement, largely factual in structure, is to point the way toward further achievements in citizenship by indicating what can next be done, by Negroes themselves, and by whites along with Negroes.

NEGROES IN INDUSTRY

A. Facts

1. Negroes' first demand is for steady employment and equal job opportunity with whites in all trades and all levels of skill.

2. Chief bar to equal opportunities in jobs is widespread anti-Negro prejudice among white workers. This takes form of notions such as that:

   Negroes are strike breakers.

   They will become "red-apple" boys for management.

   They are so eager for employment that management can bargain with them and threaten whites with total replacement.

   Plant activities in behalf of workers lead to the question of social association.

   Standards will be lowered because Negroes are easily satisfied.

   The prestige of the white worker will be lowered in the community.

   Organized labor will be undermined if dual standards are observed.

Negroes are not adaptable to industrial work.

3. Management on the whole, remains reluctant to offer equal employment opportunities to Negroes. This is due in part to unthinking adherence to past practices of discrimination, in part to overcautious timidity in the face of white worker prejudices.

4. These prejudices and timidities of both labor and management have kept the greater body of Negro workers, where employed, at the lower levels of maintenance workers and common laborers.

5. Organized labor has not, generally speaking, effectively taken up the cause of the Negro in industry. In principle the CIO bars discrimination, but the actual practice differs widely among its constituent unions and even within a single plant. The AFL has 19 member unions which refuse membership to Negroes. Efforts of the government to prevent discrimination in employment against any minority groups by employers holding war contracts do not have the force of legal sanctions and have often been unsuccessful.

6. White labor's prejudiced notions can be largely dissipated by intelligent leadership in management. There are numerous examples of successful integration of Negroes into levels of skilled labor, by gradual introduction of skilled Negro workers on the initiative of management and by engaging the active cooperation of local white labor leaders in the attempt. Where this process has been carried through, as in many plants, active prejudices and opposition have disappeared, harmonious relations in the work sphere have become established between the two racial groups, and "segregation" lines within the plant have become blurred or dropped.

7. Negro employment, skilled and unskilled, has increased rapidly under pressure of man-power shortages. Proportionate increase in skilled employment, however, has lagged; the great majority of 70,000 odd industrial units have not made any pretense of offering Negroes equal opportunities with whites.

B. Conclusions

1. Inability of Negroes to obtain equal industrial opportunity keeps this group at a lower economic level than whites, makes for unrest, and contributes seriously to the present general state of uncertainty and tension among Negroes, and to national disunity.

2. Negroes' fear of widespread postwar unemployment is a further contributing factor to unrest and indifference. The extension to Negroes of the protection of seniority principles should be studied sympathetically by both labor and management. Discrimination in layoffs is as objectionable as discrimination in original employment.

3. Successful integration of Negro workers into the industrial population fabric, where it exists, contributes to mutual understanding in other relationships of Negroes and whites, in addition to placing Negroes on a more solid economic foundation.

4. The active cooperation of organized labor must be secured to break down existing restrictions. It is not enough to convince labor's high command; lip service is already being paid to the cause of equal opportunity for all. But an educational campaign must be carried on to reach the local leaders in every key community. Techniques similar to those successfully used with foremen and supervisory labor can be adapted to this purpose.

5. The timidity and reluctance of management can be gradually overcome if the way in which resourceful leaders have successfully met the problem is widely publicized, and if community leaders exercise their persuasion on management.

6. An effort must be made to increase community awareness of the Negro's problem. In some cities, groups of leading citizens have formed informal committees to combat discrimination, and these have proved extremely effective. In Detroit such a body has done yeoman service in resolving management-labor disputes which hinge upon discrimination. In Cleveland, where the Mayor called together a group of distinguished industrialists, a similar group is in process of organization.

7. There is an urgent need for more leadership in Negro labor circles. Negroes are aroused to resentment by cumulative injustice; they are demanding action, and there is need for intelligent, judicious leadership from the Negroes themselves.

8. Continuation and strengthening of present government policy and machinery, such as the Fair Employment Practice Committee (Federal), with judicious handling by officials, will assist in the ultimate break-down of barriers.

9. The progressive opening of equal opportunities in federal, state and municipal government employment and in public services, will contribute materially to the economic security of the Negro and to racial understanding.

EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES FOR NEGROES

1. In the northern and western states there is little formal discrimination in public education opportunities. Where discrimination does exist, it consists chiefly of providing and maintaining, for schools where Negroes predominate, facilities—buildings, equipment and services — inferior in quality, location and extent to those offered for whites in the same community. Any such differentiation is both indefensible in principle and unwise in practice; it contributes to a natural and justified resentment and to a feeling of group separatism that breeds disastrous consequences on both sides of the color line. It also contributes to keeping Negroes at a lower level of education and citizenship.

2. In schools of mixed white and Negro attendance, mutual understandings and acceptance depend chiefly upon the leadership and wisdom of the school heads and teachers. It is essential that when these positions are filled, this problem and this opportunity be recognized as major considerations. Prejudices are more easily eradicated, created, or confirmed in childhood than in later life. The stimulus in the right direction can be given most effectively by school principals to the teachers.

3. No substantial discrimination, or want of opportunity, has been observed in northern colleges maintained by public funds.

4. In northern professional schools, public or private, the only category in which there is any sign of lack of equal opportunity is the medical schools. Even here the evidence is inconclusive. In the schools of high standing, such as Columbia, Harvard, Yale, Cornell and Chicago, the proportion of applicants (white and Negro combined) to those accepted may run as high as 15 to 1. The number of Negro applicants is disproportionately low. The number accepted is still lower and thus presents a question whether selection is influenced by color or is determined solely by merit. We have found no evidence of conscious bias and the disparity may be in fact due partly to inadequate pre-medical training of the Negro applicants. In some medical schools, the Negro students find it relatively more difficult to obtain necessary specialized obstetrical and surgical training and experience. It is exceedingly difficult for Negro medical graduates to obtain internship appointments in good hospitals. Few are open. The same is true as to Negro nurses, both for training and post-graduate hospital experience. Hospital administrators are reluctant to create situations in the close doctor-patient relationship out of which incidents unpleasant to either and to the staff at large may arise. Progress in the broadening of such opportunities will be slow; it depends upon skillful handling by representatives of both races.

HOUSING FACILITIES FOR NEGROES

A. Facts

1. In many or most Northern industrial centers there has been a marked increase, sometimes very heavy, in Negro residents, owing to the attraction of war work and to higher levels of Negro employment.

2. The greater part of these new urban immigrants are from the southern states and are from relatively low economic and educational levels, less accustomed to city living conditions than older residents.

3. Housing facilities for Negroes have not expanded in proportion to increased demand. This condition is also common among white areas. Negroes are relatively more restricted, however, than whites, due to (a) general desire of white property owners to prevent Negro "encroachment"; (b) the gregarious and protective tendency of Negroes, which is true of any group, particularly new arrivals, to stick together; (c) general suspension of new building operations during the war; (d) reluctance and timidity of private capital to invest money in housing developments for Negroes. As a result of some or all of these factors, there is heavy overcrowding of Negroes in many cities; this condition ante-dated but is accentuated by the war.

4. Existing housing occupied by Negroes is generally in worse condition at comparable rental levels, as to types of construction and modernity, maintenance, cleanliness, and health. This is due to the fact that, as a group with generally low earning, Negroes have had for a long time to occupy the cheap-level properties of old construction; and to the common belief of white owners or operators that Negroes ruin property, and hence it is useless to spend money to keep it up.

5. Negroes as tenants are no worse —and no better—than whites. Inferior-type property, neglected by owners, will receive indifferent care from low-rental tenants of any group; the opposite is progressively true of better-type property occupied by higher-rental tenants.

6. The Federal Housing Administration does not object to racial restrictive covenants upon the use of land as imposed by private enterprise who apply for mortgage insurance and other assistance.

B. Conclusions

1. The greatest need is for more housing accommodations in urban centers, of modern type, for all groups of the population. If there is abundant good housing, many of the disputes which now cause hard inter-racial feeling will tend to solve themselves.

2. There is substantial and persuasive evidence from various centers that Negro tenancy can be and is profitable for private capital venture in modern construction. Private capital, however, will probably not embark widely here until these results are made better known.

3. A lack of cooperative understanding between public housing bodies and private ownership has retarded new facilities open to Negroes. The Federal Public Housing Authority has in many instances pre-empted or asserted priority rights for building projects previously located and planned for by private builders. Such competition is retarding. Adequate housing for all must be supplied chiefly by private capital; public funds and public enterprises can only supplement, and at times provide the nucleus.

4. The repeated demonstrations in public housing of lower income people—Negroes included—have proved that given adequate housing, tenants exercise a high sense of responsibility for the property. If this becomes better known, it will break down the reluctance of white property owners and of managers of private funds to create equal opportunities to Negroes for good housing.

5. The Federal government should exercise the right of eminent domain where necessary to condemn, remove all racial restrictions from and assemble adequate parcels of land to make possible the development of large-scale coordinated housing programs by public and private enterprise.

*What Can the Jew Do?

David L. Cohn

IN SEPTEMBER, 1944, the Washington, D. C., Star published the following item:

> The Citizens' Committee on Race Relations plans to meet in the near future with leaders of the National Conference of Christians and Jews as the first step in its move to combat what the committee said was "growing" anti-Semitism in Washington. . . . The chairman declared that "anti-Semitism is definitely bad and apparently growing worse in Washington. It will challenge the very best we can do about it."

From other sections of the country come similar reports of growing anti-Semitism while liberal Gentiles and alarmed Jews seek means to combat this hatred which menaces not only American Jews but the whole American democratic system. The old lies and some new ones are repeated over and over.

Week after week these monstrous charges are refuted by Jewish and non-Jewish authorities, but they continue to be made and apparently gain force with the telling. It seems useless to demonstrate that Jewish wealth is simply in proportion to the number of American Jews; that Jews are an almost negligible influence in banking and in such powerful industries as oil, steel, railroads, automobiles, chemicals, meat packing, communications, shipping, coal, aluminum, farm implements, shoe-manufacturing, aviation, lumber; that in Gustavus Myers' History of the Great American Fortunes Jews play a trivial role; that perhaps the amassed wealth of all the Jewish millionaires in the country would scarcely equal the two-billion-dollar fortune of only one Gentile—Henry Ford; or that Jewish influence is predominant in only two smaller branches of American industry, the garment trades and the movies, both of which were pioneered by Jews.

Of what benefit is it to show that from the Revolutionary War to this one Jews have fought and died in proportion to their numbers and have often earned awards for gallantry out of proportion to their numbers? It is unhappy enough to be accused of lack of patriotism. But it is a melancholy thing indeed when such accusations sometimes drive Jews to boast of their patriotism so that one cannot even die quietly for one's country; when there is read into the Congressional Record page upon page of the names of American Jews who have died, been wounded, and won medals for bravery in this war. None of this matters. The same old charges are made just the same.

What does it profit Jews to prove the largest press proprietors in the United States are non-Jewish? Or that the Jewish-owned New York Times is by universal consent one of the ornaments of world journalism, if not the world's best newspaper, distinguished for its lack of bias as well as for its news coverage. The futility of such defense is obvious.

We have long had a genteel anti-Semitism here. It is expressed in part by the exclusion of Jews from certain resort areas, hotels, apartment houses, clubs, schools, and college fraternities. More important, Jews are admitted into many privately endowed schools and universities only on a quota basis. The quotas are especially limited in medical schools. It so happens that Jews brought medicine to Europe when they entered Spain with the Moors in the seventh century, but this makes no difference. Similarly, one finds here a marked economic discrimination against Jews on the part of many employers who welcome them as customers but not as employees.

But latent anti-Semitism, even of the genteel High-Church variety practiced by some of the nation's well-bred people, is not necessarily static. It may readily become dynamic in a period such as this of profound unrest, insecurity, and fear. For, it must be remembered, the anti-Semite is generally a man suffering from a sense of inferiority, and few things give rise to a more violent hatred. The combustibles of violent anti-Semitism are present in all anti-Semites whether American or German.

There is now a rising anti-Semitism here. It would be reckless under the circumstances to say it could never assume a violent form, and no minority with a tragic history such as that of the Jews can go upon such a comfortable assumption. Consequently there are few American Jews who now do not feel insecure to some degree, and their insecurity is shared by all Gentile democrats who know that anti-Semitism is almost invariably the forerunner of tyranny for all. If, however, appeals to reason fail, if Christian charity dies and love is superseded by hate, to what and to whom shall Jews appeal?

In my opinion they should make no appeals at all but conduct themselves as good citizens according to their lights and await the verdict of the majority with calm dignity. Certainly it is intolerable that one should be in a position where one can be constantly called upon by any vulgar passer-by to justify one's right to a decent place in society. I, for one, should prefer extinction under these circumstances, whatever my coreligionists may think, and I, as an American Jew speaking only for myself, think it time to state what seems to me the essential nature of the case. I would be crystal-clear upon one point. I do not imply that Jews are blameless. Their virtues and vices are such indeed that at one stroke they produced Jesus and Judas. "Jews are members of the human race," wrote Mark Twain. "Worse than that I cannot say of them."

If the majority of the American people conclude, for whatever reasons, that they want to indulge in ruthless anti-Semitism, they have the power to do it. The power of the majority is overwhelming and, as Israel Zangwill said: "The Jews are a frightened people. Nineteen centuries of Christian love have broken down their nerves." But before proceeding the majority must remember one thing. The hallmark of being adult is willingness to pay for what you get. What is part of the price in this case?

First of all, anti-Semites must give up Christianity. Even the Germans realized this and, consequently, with their dreadful logic, they sought to extirpate the religion of love and peace in Germany before embarking upon war, murder, and hate.

Secondly, democracy would have to go and with it the Bill of Rights; the great books would be burned and the universities perverted; the press debauched and truth driven underground.

Thirdly, it would be obligatory again to assassinate Mr. Lincoln. The President of the United States held that a nation could not exist half slave and half free. Since, however, there is no essential difference between three million black slaves in 1861 and five million white slaves in 1944, the memory even of a man who pronounced such a doctrine must be obliterated.

Few Gentiles would willingly pay such a price for indulging in ruthless anti-Semitism, and no Christian would even toy with the notion of making the purchase. Yet even in this nation, Christian, free, and democratic, in the midst of a great war, and with the ghastly German example before it, how many American Gentiles are there who in their hearts agree fundamentally with the Nazis in their anti-Semitic attitudes but think that they merely went too far? They would like a people held in leash, a controlled hatred, a disciplined humiliation which would maim but not kill. These attitudes are common to a great many "nice people"; men and women who, by way of demonstrating their broadmindedness, say, "Some of my best friends are Jews." Such persons are the breeding ground of violence because in the dangerous times in which we live it may be only a short step from genteel anti-Semitism of nice people to the brutalities of the concentration camp.

Anti-Semitism has not yet become a national menace to the United States. It is only at the stage when it is a personal tragedy that humiliates, frightens, and embitters individuals. The greater part of the task of uprooting anti-Semitism must be done—if at all—by the Gentile majority with the Jewish minority cooperating. If, however, nothing is done and genteel anti-Semitism, fanned to flame by the hatred of our times, becomes a ruthless anti-Semitism, American Jews will die and with them will die the American freedom for which men have been struggling for two thousand years.

Today and Tomorrow

These leaflets are designed to help soldiers and civilians to Think Together, so that they may Act Together on the social issues and conditions of today and tomorrow.

If you have found this leaflet interesting, do something about it! Here's how:

Pass it on to some one else.

Enclose copies in your letters.

Distribute copies to the men and women in your outfit or your men's or women's organization.

Devote a meeting to a discussion of it.

Today and Tomorrow leaflets are issued monthly.

RENDEZVOUS

The Infinite has set a lighted taper
Burning at the center of the soul:
A sometimes feeble, but perpetual fire.
Call it conscience, intuition, what
You will, but it's the Kingdom-throne within:—
Light and power to use today for living:
No need to wait on death to give one life.
He that believes HATH eternal life!
He surely dies who lives on bread alone:
The Spirit quickens body, mind and soul.

This day and every day, within my heart,
I have a happy rendezvous with Him.

Keep this vestal altar-light aglow
Within the secret chrysalis of your soul,
So that you may glean a glimpse of glory.

BETRAYED

America today stands betrayed: at the brink of total disaster. Without God's promised help to His chosen nation, I would not give two hoots for her chances of survival as a FREE nation.

Stalin—that inhuman, Oriental pagan killer (leader of all colored races against the white)—stands poised and ready to plunge a dagger into the warm, friendly heart of America: America who so generously gave and is still giving, feeding, and clothing the Russians and their satellites. It will require the intervention of an all-powerful Providence to save us.

And if, through constant aggressive, warlike acts on the part of Russia and her stooges, such as shooting down unarmed American planes in Yugoslavia, war is finally provoked between Russia and the Western Powers, WHO WILL GAIN? Answer: The International Jews: the Rothschilds, the Kuhn Loebs (who financed the Russian Revolution): just as they do in EVERY war, through the sale of munitions, lending of money, etc. We will have more unscrupulous contracts and deals such as those made by Jews, Andrew May and the Garssons—while millions of innocent white boys again die. But they will not retain this ill-gained loot for long: because the present Babylonian money system will soon fall, and be replaced by the more just one of the Bible, and of our own Constitution.

The United States Senate has voted to abdicate part of the SOVEREIGNTY OF THESE GOD-ESTABLISHED UNITED STATES, to the control of heterogeneous foreigners of the United NATIONS: this is treason to God and to the Constitution of the United States: direct defiance of our Constitution and our Christian Bible, which forbids us to align ourselves with heathen totalitarian powers, and to make foreign entanglements. We refuse, at our own peril, to heed God's command, "Come ye out and be ye separate." We are not contented or grateful for our own high scale of living; our own high Christian ideals: no, we must coalesce with, and embrace the very sort of people and ideologies, strife, and dissension which originally caused our Founding Forefathers to establish America as a new kind of government OF the PEOPLE, BY the People, and FOR the People. But we leave our OWN people in the soup: and so we shall reap the whirlwind.

If we, with the most idealistic and Christian background of any nation in the world, cannot make our own decisions and settle our own disputes and problems, either national or international, there is little hope of them being more justly settled by a conglomeration of powers whose ideals, desires and methods are diametrically opposed to ours: ALL OF WHICH IS MADE PERFECTLY OBVIOUS BY THE PARIS

"PEACE FIGHTS." As Mr. Herbert Hoover says, "The U. S. should discontinue its role of Santa Claus, announce to the world that hereafter its economic relations with other nations must be a two-way street with balanced traffic . . . freedom has shrunk rather than expanded in the world as a result of World War II and Russia is the chief obstructionist in the efforts to establish a sound peace."

BUT WE CONTINUE TO PLAY THE ROLE OF SANTA CLAUS: the U. S. taxpayer must support displaced persons in Europe to the tune of 80 MILLIONS a year: we are to extend a credit of about 55 MILLIONS to Japan and Korea: some folks would also have us bear the financial burden of transporting Jews from Europe to Palestine (in spite of ONE HUNDRED MILLIONS recently collected by Jews in America, presumably for the relief and help of destitute Jews in Europe): and we must also assist in financing both Jewish and Arab development in the Holy Land. This is illegal, unconstitutional, and further BETRAYAL of the American people and their resources.

A FEW of our Congressmen and Senators have taken a valiant stand for their own country, at personal sacrifice to themselves: but many others work for themselves, and in every possible way AGAINST America's best interests. There is a dearth of great men possessing selfless courage, OF LOVE FOR AMERICA, of vision, integrity; upright CHRISTIAN men to lead us: all is self-seeking, party politics, graft, treacherous double-dealing with our enemies: the while insidious enemies in our midst cry peace, peace, WHEN THERE IS NO PEACE IN THE WHOLE WORLD.

You who betray this nation today, either passively or actively, will not survive in the brighter days just over the horizon. You would be just chaff, deadwood, in the way of progress, because you were too blind to discern the Signs of the Times. The Lord will shortly come: He will point His finger at you and say: "What have YOU done for my chosen nation, America: what did YOU do to defend and uphold the Christian principles of Americanism? Depart from Me: I never knew you. I want no faithless cowardly weaklings in My Kingdom. Be not faithless, but believing."

> "And it shall come to pass, that every soul, which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people." (Acts 4:23)

And so, even though America is saved at the last minute, by Divine intervention, YOU will not be here to enjoy it, if you refused the challenge of the present hour.

> "If the watchman see the sword come, and blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned: if the sword come, and take any person from among them, he is taken away in his iniquity: but his blood will I require at the watchman's hand." (Ezek. 33:6)

And what of our WATCHMEN IN WASHINGTON: have they been warning the people? And what of our CHURCH LEADERS: have they been true to their trust: have they been telling the people the TRUTH, and warning them of the dangers to come?

In that day of disaster, God will raise up His own leaders to take charge of our affairs and our defense. These pseudo-Americans will be destroyed: but our cause will not be lost. All of these things must come to pass in order to cleanse and purge this country, as well as the world, preliminary to the establishment of the literal Kingdom of Righteousness and Justice.

If you would help save your country, your homes, your freedom, your Christian ideals, then PRAY, WORK, BAND TOGETHER in numbers of ten, fifty or a hundred, TO SAVE AMERICA. Organize Pro-American groups to meet in your home, to exchange information: to pray: to strengthen each other. Check on your police force: your public officials in your community to ascertain if they ARE Pro-Americans: form a contact with your local FBI: know who are your enemies and who are your real friends. BE AS WISE AS SERPENTS. When the day of attack comes (which it will) this information and these contacts will be priceless. It will be vitally important to be ORGANIZED for your protection, both from internal and external enemies.

Christianity and America will stand or fall together: there is no middle ground. The main reason our pagan enemies seek to destroy us is because their objective is to root out Christianity and replace it with brute force, materialism, fleshly appetites:—all the while they deceive us by mouthing platitutes about PEACE.—SUPPORT ALL THOSE WHO FIGHT YOUR BATTLES FOR CHRISTIAN-AMERICANISM.

I speak truth to you: I have everything to lose and nothing to gain by so doing. Every Christian Nationalist leader today is POOR, not rich. For the past 13 years at least, our Government has officially made it unpopular to be an AMERICAN: we have lauded and supported, literally, everything and everybody, EXCEPT OUR OWN COUNTRY, our own people, and our own ideals. THIS WRITER PROUDLY CARRIES THE HOLY BANNER OF WHITE CHRISTIAN CONSTITUTIONAL AMERICANISM, for this REPUBLIC. Every day the grinning MASK of Communism slips lower and lower, revealing unmistakably the utter depravity, beastliness, and revolting horror that is the REALITY (which word the Bolsheviks like so well) of Communism: Realism (materialism):—while they hate the word Idealism (Americanism), because they know they have none. Line up strongly and staunchly behind everything that is truly AMERICAN.

Mr. Cedric Foster, in his broadcast of 8-6-46, said:

> "There is only ONE question: under whose rule do we wish to live—our own or another? The Left-wingers are playing into the imperalistic ambitions of the Communists. Only he who is a FOOL would deny that the democracy (that word again) of the Western Powers has evolved the most liberal government in the world."

Writing in his column titled, AMERICANS ALL, dated at Berlin, 8-5-46, Dr. Daniel A. Poling said:

> "Communism is a RELIGION. It is a dynamic, passionate, propagating religion, and it brooks no rivals. THE PARTY CLAUSE SPECIFICALLY BARRING GOD AND RELIGIOUS BELIEF IS STILL THERE . . . we believe that increasingly Russia will become Christian."

Then he goes on to relate that he knows from first-hand evidence how religious leaders behind the iron curtain are TORTURED, who do not go along with the Communists.

What double talk: a veritable jewel for inconsistency! How anyone can make a RELIGION out of a pagan materialistic totalitarian political cult and instrument —which is what the Third International is—which cult says that "religion is the opium of the people" and which cult, as Wm. Z. Foster himself has testified before our Congress, brooks NO RELIGIOUS BELIEF WHATEVER, is something escaping my comprehension. All through their literature, the Communists deny God and religion. Dr. Poling is correct when he says in his own statement: "THE PARTY CLAUSE SPECIFICALLY BARRING GOD AND RELIGIOUS BELIEF IS STILL THERE"—so then why pretend that the totalitarian regime of Communism has anything to do with religion, or that Russia CAN "increasingly become Christian" so long as such a regime holds sway?

Communism is on the same par with ZIONISM, which also is not a religion, but a deliberate plan, working hand in glove with Communism, for the Internationalization of the World for JEWRY: for racial domination: for a national STATE for the JEWS in Palestine, from which they hope to control the GOLD, the PRESS, the LIVES of all peoples of the world. This plan is boldly set forth in their Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

The same thing was true of the so-called "religion" of Shintoism: which was merely a false political front and ruse used by Japan's war lords to hold the people in slavery and submission. NO REAL RELIGION EVER ENSLAVES A MAN: RATHER IT SETS HIM FREE. "Ye shall know the TRUTH, and the TRUTH SHALL MAKE YOU FREE."

All of the foregoing dovetails into the action of Freedom House Board of Directors (in New York) in naming Bernard M. Baruch as winner of the 1946 FREEDOM AWARD for performing an "outstanding service to the cause of freedom: for serving with vision and statesmanship in the world's quest for peace." Why not wait a little longer and see how Baruch's plan for FREEDOM and for PEACE works out? It is a travesty that Americans should present an award of this nature to a man who is linked with the Zionists and their plot and program: a man who played ball with the un-American NEW DEAL and also plays ball with the Internationalists: a man who has boasted of his POWER OVER THE AMERICAN PEOPLE: a man who said, "I believe national pride a lot of nonsense." Certainly, this organization might easily have found someone else who TRULY WORKS FOR AMERICAN FREEDOM AND ITS IDEALS; rather than this Internationalist Jew. This is only another evidence of BETRAYAL of the American people, by this pretended "Freedom House," who would thus help to deliver us up to International slavery.

Westbrook Pegler

MY medal of merit for "performing outstanding service to the cause of freedom" and Americanism would go to Mr. Westbrook Pegler.

Day after day, year after year, he has factually set forth the shameful truth about the labor union racket in this country: of the abuses practised by labor unions and their leaders: such abuses as undoubtedly would not be tolerated by the supposed forces of law and order in ANY OTHER GROUP. Many of the union members themselves cringe with shame and embrassment over what the unions are getting away with.

It would be difficult to name another Upstanding, OUTstanding American who has more intelligently, courageously, and consistently worked and fought for the best interests of EVERY American, including the rights of organized labor itself, than Mr. Pegler.

Here is MY idea of a MAN: an AmerICAN: not a weak-livered internationalist. His honesty, sincerity, and the authenticity of his information are unquestioned. His style of concise English is inimitable. He has not failed to call a spade a spade: he has upheld the honor and dignity of the American heritage and of our Constitution. He has performed a frequently unpleasant and thankless task, with great credit to himself, and has been instrumental in exposing many abuses and nefarious practices by union labor bosses: many of whom are Communist enemies of the United States. Mr. Pegler has done a magnificent job of fearlessly educating the public along these lines: as well as dispelling much of the Rooseveltian myth.

If any man today is entitled to a medal for genuine AMERICANISM and for distinguished service to his country, it is WESTBROOK PEGLER. This writer offers sincere admiration and thanks: and the earnest recommendation that some PRO-American organization pin a well-won medal on him!

We are being betrayed by our so-called educators: from the highest to the lowest, who preach, teach, talk, and write socialist, collectivist, marxist, fabian doctrines: the vast majority of which educators are, or have been, connected with atheistic, marxist, modernist, communist movements, groups and individuals. Not having enough of these perverters in our midst, led by Henry Wallace and Eleanor Roosevelt, we import such communist radicals as Harold J. Laski, who is permitted to tour the U. S. and lecture to our University students, in order to swing their immature minds over to socialism and collectivism. Then the so-called LIBERALS, like Ellis Arnall of Georgia, have introduced a law making it legal for 18-year-olds to vote. Instead of being "Hitler's Children," or OUR children, many of our young people now are "STALIN'S Children," having been indoctrinated with false foreign ideologies, which make them willing tools of the communist P. A. C.

Send 15c to Charlotte Wettrick, 1519—26th Ave. N., Seattle 2, Washington, for copy of her paper, "WHY THE AGE FOR VOTING SHOULD NOT BE LOWERED," in which she discusses this whole subject, and gives names of so-called "Intellectuals," groups, and individuals who are thus making a business of corrupting our youth: turning them from the fundamental ideals which made America the greatest country on earth: making them into dupes to be used by those who control the Soviet Union: teaching them both heresy and disloyalty to their own Christian government and country.

Signs of these Apostate Times

Some items illustrating what is wrong with our supposedly Christian REPUBLIC today:

1. The President of the United States joins forces with the corrupt Pendergast political machine, and with the anti-American CIO-PAC (which is strongly commended by Russian trade newspapers), to PURGE a political candidate because that candidate does not go along 100% with the President. It is BECAUSE an elected representative of the people HAS the right to his own views and convictions, as well as the right to differ with the Chief Executive, THAT AMERICA IS A REPUBLIC, with a representative government. It is in RUSSIA that the PURGE is an accepted weapon for destroying all opposition. And so, even though Mr. Axtell is elected, MR. TRUMAN IS STILL WRONG—just as Mr. Roosevelt was wrong in forcing Montgomery-Ward to sign a CLOSED SHOP CONTRACT against its wishes, and even forbidding it the right to protest.

2. Then we have the FARCE TRIAL of the Russian spy, Nicolai Redin, at Seattle, who was plainly GUILTY of treasonable activities against the Government of the United States. Our splendid F. B. I. had the goods on him.

According to the newspapers, Judge Lloyd L. Black said this case had no "international" meaning or implications: and that he, the Judge, had no authority to invoke the death penalty. One wonders what constitutes HIS idea of treason or betrayal of this country.

I agree with Mr. Upton Close, who says in his newsletter of August 5th, 1946, that Congress should appoint a committee to investigate the Department of Justice's failure to prosecute, or perhaps its deliberate throwing of the Redin trial. In this same newsletter, Mr. Close quotes from a letter written to him by an American woman—a political worker—who attended the trial daily:

> "I have never seen such a hoax perpetrated in a Federal Court. The judge allowed defense lawyers to refuse anyone on the jury who had read the following books: Out of the Night, by Jan Valtin: Approach to the Soviet Union by former Ambassador Bullitt; I Chose Freedom by Kravchenko; or other books and columns not utterly pro-Russian.
> "Imagine the mental calibre of a jury passed through such a screen! Imagine the bias of the judge who permitted such a screen, to say nothing of his abrupt and surprise rulings on evidence. But, above all, what was wrong with the Department of Justice prosecution lawyers? Twelve or more FBI men were in constant attendance, but were NEVER GIVEN A CHANCE TO TELL WHAT THEY KNEW, and were sorely persecuted by defense lawyers. Many Russians were in daily attendance. One woman flourished Communist newspapers and periodicals with Stalin's picture in the courtroom during recess. I reported her to the bailiffs. There was a feeling of so much pressure at the trial that some Americans really began to fear . . . The prosecution was viciously attacked for not being able to produce the original papers delivered to Redin. If Redin was worth his salt, those papers are, of course, in Moscow."

Yet, in spite of such treasonable goings-on in a supposed American court of justice (sounds more like a Moscow-staged play), our dull or indifferent public refuse to see that we already HAVE a Red Revolution in our midst.

3. In order to appease the strong Jewish forces, individuals and groups who surround and beseige him (a nation within a nation), who constantly press their OWN interests upon him, President Truman has publicly announced that he will recommend to Congress that the United States lower our immigration bars, exceed its quota again, and admit 50,000 MORE

EUROPEAN IMMIGRANTS to this country: most of whom would probably be trained Jewish revolutionaries, who would play the same kind of tricks here that are being played in Haifa. The President says this would also appease the Arabs and set a good example to them, so that they would be willing to accept more thousands of this same kind of people in Palestine. WHY ARE WE ALWAYS DOING SOMETHING DETRIMENTAL (if not actually unlawful) TO OUR OWN INTERESTS IN ORDER TO PLEASE OR PLACATE SOMEBODY ELSE? Especially since this policy of APPEASEMENT HAS NEVER YET PROVEN SUCCESSFUL.

This Jewish proposal immediately meets with the warm approbation of the so-called Liberals, including Senator Thomas (Utah), Chavez (N. Mex.), and Taylor (Idaho) who applaud President Truman's "humanitarian" (TREASONABLE) suggestion to still further wreck the economy and stability of these United States by importing 50,000 European undesirables. These Senators are being paid, incidentally, to PROTECT the interests and citizens of the United States. However, Senator Thomas says, "An invitation to outsiders to come in would precipitate an outburst of "CHAUVINISM": this is a favorite word of the Communists, which they scoffingly direct toward anyone having decent and commendable love and pride in his country or his own race.

4. We have Attorney General Tom C. Clark going ABROAD to look for evidence of TREASON: while the whole United States reeks with it: and thousands of Russian spies infest our Government and roam our country at will: while armed, organized Communists hold seditious meetings here at will: while strikers, pickets, Jew-Communists mutiny against law and order, and the latter break up otherwise peaceable meetings of Christian Pro-Americans.

5. Now we have an announcement in the Salt Lake paper of a Communist Party rally to be held on City and County Bldg. grounds, September 23d, by permission of the City Commission, under police supervision! Isn't that something? Every informed person today knows the treasonable nature of the Communist party and that it is dedicated to the destruction of our Constitution and Government: it is SUBVERSIVE: it has been denounced by the First Presidency of the Mormon Church. Yet the City Commission grants them permission to meet, under police protection, on City grounds! What is the matter with the taxpayers of Utah? Don't we have any American spirit or spunk any more? Aren't there enough public-spirited citizens in Salt Lake City to rise up and ban this subversive meeting? What KIND of a City Commission is this? Will they openly make the SAME OFFER TO THAT CHRISTIAN AMERICA FIRSTER, GERALD L. K. SMITH??? I am waiting to hear it.

6. We still have much careless or ignorant use of the word "democracy" in connection with our REPUBLIC. Even such men as Senator Arthur Vandenburg and Dr. Daniel Poling still harp on "democracy" (which is only another word for Communism or MOB rule): when what they actually mean to say is Americanism: or a Republican form of government, by duly constituted and elected representatives of the people: government by law and order, PRESUMABLY BY PREEMINENT MEN, chosen for their high qualities and fitness for the job. So why don't we QUIT talking about "democracy", and thus confusing a confused world still further. This is playing into the hands of our enemies.

The Jews, both in Palestine and America, are the best examples of "democracy" because they constantly defy the forces of law and order: they take the law into their own hands, and practise terrorism, coercion and violence —MOB RULE—in an attempt to get their own way, whether right or wrong. This sort of conduct is "democracy in action" (which phrase Drew Pearson loves so well).—On Monday, August 19th, 1946, the British Embassy in Washington reported receipt of a telephone threat: "This is the voice of the Jewish protest. Between now and noon, your embassy is going to be blown up. You had better get out."—In Palestine, they have attempted to blow up ships and bombed the King David Hotel, killing nearly a hundred innocent people.

Mr. Paul Mallon analyzed the situation pretty accurately in his column of 8-20-46, when he told how people who insist upon going WHERE THEY ARE NOT WANTED are sure to get into trouble. But, of course, the Jew has never been known to be sensitive on this score. Mr. Mallon went on to show how these ships loaded with ILLEGAL JEWISH IMMIGRANTS were largely from RUSSIAN ports and territory, and were sent to Haifa to complicate the problems of the British and EMBARRASS THE PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Communist-dominated labor unions also practise democracy (Communist MOBOCRACY) in the same way, with their strikes, picketing and continual riots and fights: they are constantly at work breaking down the established forms of law and order. THEY ALL SEEK GOVERNMENT BY BULLETS, NOT BY BALLOT! THIS IS DEMOCRACY!

According to the dictionary "democracy is government directly by the people COLLECTIVELY: the mass of the people." THESE HATE-INSPIRED MOBS SEEK TO ENFORCE THEIR WILL ON THE PEOPLE. Has anyone ever seen or known of true justice being administered in an orderly fashion BY A MOB? Rather mobocracy practices hate, vengeance and revenge: they take the law into their own hands.

This murderous hate-passion is what animates the Jew-Communist mobs who invariably heckle, disrupt, and practise mob violence upon Gerald L. K. Smith and his adherents and audiences, whenever these people attempt to exercise their rights of free speech and peaceable assembly. After the usual disgraceful riots of Jew-Communists which broke up and prevented Mr. Smith from holding a meeting in Minneapolis (Aug. 21st, 1946), a Justice of the Peace wrote me from there: "IT'S A HELL OF A COUNTRY WHERE THE MAYOR ENTERTAINS THE MOB AFTER A DECENT CHRISTIAN MEETING WAS CLOSED." Yes, it's getting to be just that! Stupid Americans close their eyes or even CONDONE the actions of these bloodthirsty packs of Jew MOBOCRATS in America: little realizing what it is all leading up to, and how soon this same lawless element will enter their own homes, and render THEIR lives and their property unsafe and insecure. Such are the fruits of "democracy" (MOBOCRACY). And then the IRONY of it is that we have HR Bill 6897 introduced into Congress to PROTECT THESE RIOTING JEW-COMMUNISTS FROM "ANTI-SEMITISM" on the part of Christian Americans, who are themselves persecuted by the JEWS and unable to get proper protection of THEIR RIGHTS IN THEIR OWN COUNTRY!

With the speed of a whirlwind, the JUDGMENT-DESOLATION (of which William Lay Jr. writes in August 1946 DESTINY) approaches America: the brave will stand and fight for all they hold dear: the cowardly ones who have betrayed these United States (God's battle-axe) will skulk and run and hide for fear of what will come upon them: both God and man will punish them.

7. Our own people are betrayed by having to do without cars, lumber to build much-needed homes; food; and many other things: while we send these cars and material ABROAD, and while we GIVE BILLIONS away to foreign governments, which will be used against this Republic: continual dipping into the pockets of the American taxpayers: taxation without representation.

8. Hose are practically unobtainable without forced charge accounts. No matter if one has the MONEY and offers it for a pair of hose, the stores will not sell the hose unless one has a charge account. This is a vicious UnAmerican subterfuge. The writer has gone hoseless practically all summer, rather than cater to this illegal custom.

9. The effect of the Un-American (pro-Communist) OPA is to REGIMENT a free people: cause planned SCARCITY: PREVENT PRODUCTION: RAISE PRICES TO THE CONSUMER: encourage all sorts of subterfuge and trickery.

In a recent speech, Representative John S. Wood (Chairman of House UnAmerican Activities Committee) said:

> "There is a planned effort to keep price controls in violation of the American system of free enterprise, and they are determined to see that commodities REMAIN SCARCE . . . Communists have invaded every bureau and practically every office of the National Government. So irrefutable was the evidence that Civil Service rules were waived by Congress to permit a purge of known party members from the State and other departments. Communism is standing across the threshold of world peace, barring the way to a just and lasting peace."

10. Yugoslavs shooting down with malice aforethought friendly American planes when driven off their course by weather conditions, and then interning the survivors and holding them incommunicado. Thus do these pro-Russian Slavs (slaves) repay evil for good. Thus do the "Peace at any price" adherents in the U.S.A. begin to reap their reward.

An immediate ultimatum should have been issued to these Communist stooges, to return our men to their own lines within 48 hours, and to cease FUTURE "UNFORTUNATE ACCIDENTS" of this kind, or atom bombs would fall on Belgrade. Thus, in one fell swoop, we would have regained our lost prestige in Europe: and we would save the lives of other American boys in the future, because this is the only sort of ACTION these people understand. They can no more be "appeased" with words than Hitler was. Especially since Russia is now manufacturing 300 jet-propelled rocket planes a MONTH, in Russian-occupied GERMANY. Against whom do you think she will use them???

11. The vicious tirade of Salt Lake Tribune (8-30-46) titled "While Hate is Fostered, Treason Will Grow" is one of many directed against the AMERICA FIRST leader, Gerald L. K. Smith.

When he gave a private talk here on 8-28-46, Mr. Smith entered into no villainous, vicious tirades of intolerance or untruths such as the Tribune has printed under the above title. He merely stated calmly, dispassionately and truthfully that about nine-tenths of the rioting mobs who attack him in various cities are Jews: many of them foreign Jews who have illegally entered this country: who can scarcely speak a word of our language and know or care nothing about our institutions, WHO HAVE NO BUSINESS HERE, depriving American veterans of opportunities to make a living.

The major part of Mr. Smith's address was taken up with a defense of genuine Constitutional Christian Americanism: of how both it and he are on the firing line today, and are constantly being smeared and attacked. Mr. Smith asks nothing more than that we RETURN TO OUR CONSTITUTION AND OUR BIBLE.

At the recent riots in two well-known Chicago hotels, where these rioting Jew-Communist mobsters prevented Mr. Smith from exercising his RIGHT OF FREE SPEECH AND PEACEABLE ASSEMBLY, Mr. Jeremiah Stokes, prominent Salt Lake Attorney, Crusader for Christian Americanism, was present:—he came very near having HIS head bashed in; and he being right close to the Jewish leaders of the riot, heard them say they were "out to get Smith."—Mr. Stokes is one of those real Americans smeared in Under Cover by Red Armenian spy, John Roy Carlson: the same small fry who smeared so many Pro-American Pro-Christian groups and individuals in August 17-46 "Liberty?" sheet. This man Carlson (of many aliases) is a dangerous alien subverter: in everything HE writes, read from RIGHT to LEFT: know that the people he endeavors to damage are usually top-ranking Pro-Americans.

Going back to Mr. Smith: he has made no such threats, nor has he in any way practised personal violence against his enemies: he never interferes with Jew-Communist meetings in an attempt to deprive them of meeting: yet ALL of these things THEY practise against him. Immediately after Mr. Smith spoke in Denver, he was followed there by the notorious seditionist, Wm. Z. Foster (head of Communists in U.S.A.) who rented an auditorium, publicly advertised the meeting and SOLD TICKETS to gullible Americans—which would be an impossible feat for Mr. Smith!! SO WHOSE IS THE INTOLERANCE AND WHOSE THE LIES AND WHO IS FOSTERING HATRED AND MOB RULE???

Further PROOF of this wicked persecution is exemplified by the Pro-Jew Anti-Christian HR Bill 6897 (discussed herein) recently introduced into Congress by Patterson of California.

Furthermore, it WAS a "selected" group of Christian Americans who heard Mr. Smith speak in Salt Lake: fine upright Mormon leaders, and other Christian group leaders: the cream of the crop: alert, freedom-loving Americans who know the dangers that threaten us today. If you were not so hate-blinded yourself, Mr. Salt Lake Tribune Editor, you would be able to get some truth into your head once in a while.

12. We have a fine young ex-service man, Del Hardy Zesiger (of Bountiful, Utah) pummeled to death in the prize ring, by repeated savage blows on the head. The equally savage audience greatly enjoyed this "fine fight" and the courage of the boy who was killed: this boy who had survived war in the Aleutians, only to be killed in "peace!" Yes, this is what we call "Christion civilization." No wonder we have wars when so many people get pleasure out of so bestial a sport.—This is not the first time that young men have been killed in the prize ring.

13. In the Salt Lake Tribune we have the brazen announcement that "$12 MILLION Liquor Sales Net Utah $2,797,257 in Year" . . . "Utah's liquor business made $2,797,257.60 in PROFITS in the past 12 months, setting a new all-time record and eclipsing the 1944-45 mark by $424,834.19." Now, isn't that just dandy? I wonder if these were all PROFITS? Elsewhere in the paper, you read about all the FATAL AUTOMOBILE ACCIDENTS, as well as murders, and other crimes. You don't suppose there is any connection, do you?

14. We have depraved fiendish perverts and murderers like William Heirens, and soft-headed attorneys and judges who make "deals" to save the life of such enemies of civilization. Of what value is his life to himself or anyone else? And why should taxpayers support, indefinitely, this sadistic murderer? The law exists for the purpose of protecting the innocent living. If ever anyone should die for his crimes and for the PROTECTION OF THE PUBLIC, then Heirens should die immediately. Otherwise, he will be let out of prison in a few years to perpetrate more such heinous crimes against women and children. An American JURY is supposed to try this criminal, and decide FROM THE EVIDENCE whether he is worthy of death: it is not for the lawyers to decide IN ADVANCE what his punishment should be.

15. In his able letter of August 1st, 1946, entitled, GOODBYE—FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, Mr. Merwyn K. Hart, President of NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL Inc. (sponsor of Upton Close on the air), says truly:

> "What these people do not realize, those who are alive to what is going on, is that many people have got to get hurt—mortally hurt—if this land of liberty is to be saved. If they are not willing to risk getting hurt, THEN OUR LIBERTY IS GONE."

The proposed wicked unconstitutional HR Bill 6897 aims to destroy that very liberty. No doubt, both Mr.

Hart and this writer would be imprisoned for upholding true Christian Constitutional Americanism. This writer is a native-born white American, whose forbears were among the original settlers of Cincinnati, Ohio, (formerly known as Losantiville). The day that law is passed, making it a crime to boldly proclaim truth: that day America dies as a free independent nation, and joins the satellite nations of Russia. If you do not fight, fellow-American: if you are not willing to pledge your life, your fortune, and your sacred honor to the cause of American LIBERTY, then you deserve to come under the heel of the oppressor.

The writer thoroughly agrees with what Mr. Thurman Arnold said in his review of THE FIRST FREEDOM, by Morris L. Ernest, i. e.

> . . . "The press, the movies and the radio have become highways over which STANDARDIZED intellectual commodities and opinions can be poured into the public mind . . . as to overwhelm any unorganized individual efforts . . . The sources for competitive ideas in America are unprotected. They are drying up."—Mr. Ernest himself says: "Our press is fast evaporating . . . The backbone of local democracy (here he means free Americanism—mra) has disappeared."

And so it is proposed to pass HR Bill 6897 in order to still further cause our freedom of the press to evaporate!—The author knows from her own experience that the foregoing quotations speak truth. Only the standardized "smooth" line of peace, tolerance, equality, blah, blah, blah, is acceptable to publishers today. They betray their country by barring out most original thinking as "controversial," when as a matter of fact, EVERYTHING WHICH IS OF VITAL INTEREST TO AMERICANS TODAY IS CONTROVERSIAL. The people must have only "standardized pap" and the vast bulk of that pap is anything BUT virile AMERICANISM. Let's quit being made into dolts, simpletons, saps, by all this international UN-Americanism, and show greater appreciation for our own country, our own heritage, our own Constitution, our own ideals.

> We read in the newspapers August 13th, 1946, that "The flow of news messages to and from the United States was seriously disrupted by an American Communications Assn., C.I.O. (that tells the story—mra) embargo against eight cable and wireless companies in sympathy with 300 strikers at Press Wireless Inc. Joseph Kehoe, national director of the 2500-member union, said the embargo was 'extremely effective'."

"The embargo will last until the strike is settled" said Lawrence Kammet, A C A publicity director. BOTH of these names sound Jewish to me.—So here is more evidence of LACK OF FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, which can be tied up at the whim of selfish sectional unions and their pro-Communist bosses.

And now our biased, weak-kneed judges are ruling that FOREMEN and SUPERVISORY EMPLOYEES OF MANAGEMENT MAY JOIN UNIONS and BARGAIN COLLECTIVELY WITH EMPLOYERS, whose employees and agents they are supposed to be! Again I say, we have no men of vision, of integrity, of character, of patriotism, to see where all this is leading us, and that we place the welfare and security of this Republic in jeopardy by PUTTING IT IN THE HANDS OF PRO-COMMUNIST LABOR LEADERS, who will wreck anything and everything in order to serve their own selfish interests—NOT THE WELFARE OF AMERICA. If unions were as ready to guard the rights of non-union citizens as they are their own, we could believe in them, but they are not, and thereby they prove their true nature. The labor unions today are doing everything in their power to destroy truth, justice, tolerance, freedom: they are murdering the soul of America: at the same time siphoning off huge sums from the workingman, who needs his money for his family. How many honest workingmen today feel that they receive great benefit from their union membership? ? ?—Unless "Adventuring Freedom" is restored to labor and business, America cannot survive as a great industrial nation.

now known as Buckley Bill 2848

79th Congress 2d Session H. R. 6897

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

June 27, 1946

Mr. Patterson introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL

To suppress the evil of anti-Semitism and hatred of members of any race or religion because of race, creed, or color.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

Section 1. (a) Congress hereby finds that anti-Semitism is a potent weapon in the hands of the enemies of this country and of its institutions, and that the enemies of this country and of its institutions, have been, and are, using the United States mails and the channels of interstate and foreign commerce to spread the doctrines and foster the feelings of anti-Semitism and of racial and religious hatred because of race, creed, or color thereby tending to destroy the unity of this Nation, creating discord among our people, disrupting the normal channels of trade and commerce, and interfering with and dislocating the economic life of the country.

(b) It is hereby declared to be the policy of this Act, through the exercise by Congress of its powers to regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign nations and the other powers granted to it by the Constitution of the United States, to prevent the spread of anti-Semitism and racial and religious hatred because of race, creed, or color, through the use of the mails and the channels of interstate and foreign commerce.

IMPORTATION, MAILING, AND SHIPMENT

Sec. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person to bring, or cause to be brought, into the United States, or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or to deposit, or cause to be deposited, with any express company, or other common carrier, for carriage, or to send or carry from one State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, any book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, writing, print, or other publication which exposes the Jews as a nation, people, or religious group, or any substantial portion of them, to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes or tends to cause them to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure them in their occupations, employment, or other economic activities, or exposes any race or religion because of race, creed, or color to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes or tends to cause the members of such race or religion to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure the members of such race or religion in their occupations, employment, or other economic activities.

RECEIPT AND DISTRIBUTION

Sec. 3. It shall be unlawful for any person to take or receive from the mails, or any express company or other common carrier, with intent to sell, distribute, circulate, or exhibit the same, or to read the same to others, any matter or thing forbidden by section 2 of this Act to be imported into the United States, or to be deposited for mailing, delivery, or carriage in interstate commerce; or to sell, distribute, circulate, or exhibit, or to read to others, any such matter or thing, knowing the same to have been imported into the United States or carried in the mails or interstate commerce in violation of the provisions of section 2 of this Act.

PUNISHMENT

Sec. 4. Any person violating any of the provisions of section 2 or 3 of tis Act, or who conspires or acts in concert with any other person or persons to violate any of the provisions of section 2 or 3 of this Act shall, for each such offense, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000, or sentenced to imprisonment (at hard labor) for not more than five years, or both, at the discretion of the Court.

JURISDICTION

Sec. 5. Any person charged with violating the provisions of this Act may be prosecuted in any district in which any part of the offense has been committed by him or by his actual associates participating with him in the offense or by his fellow conspirators.

Shall Jews dispossess NON-Jews of Free Speech, Free Press, Peaceable Assembly?

The Jewish Communist mouthpiece, Patterson of California, introduced this bill, giving PREFERRED STATUS and RIGHTS to JEW-ZIONIST and other minorities over the majority of CHRISTIAN WHITE AMERICANS, IN DIRECT CONTRAVENTION of the CONSTITUTION of these UNITED STATES and its Bill of Rights, Article I—which says:

> "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or ABRIDGING THE FREEDOM OF SPEECH, OR OF THE PRESS, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble" etc.

Although Congress has made no law respecting establishment of religion, our Supreme Court has ruled that THIS IS A CHRISTIAN NATION, founded upon the precepts of Christianity. Try to imagine an America in which all the Christian virtues and precepts were left out!

The Supreme Court has also ruled that "The Constitution was adopted to PRESERVE OUR GOVERNMENT, NOT TO SERVE AS A PROTECTING SCREEN FOR THOSE WHO, while claiming its privileges, SEEK TO DESTROY IT."

By the mere introduction of this unconstitutional bill, Patterson and all those who are behind him in this effort, ARE VIOLATING THE CONSTITUTION and using it as a protecting screen, while seeking to destroy the fundamental rights of Americans. Patterson himself should be impeached for treason. Let every AMERICAN, who still has the fire of freedom in his veins, make it his business to inform his legislators what he thinks of this bill. Even if it is never passed in the United States, it shows how far we have gone down the wrong path, that an un-American, unconstitutional bill of this nature should be considered or introduced.

These minority groups have all the protection and redress they need, under our Constitution. IF they are conducting themselves as genuine Americans, WHY should they have, or need, any MORE protection than any other citizen?

If this bill were sincere and truly prpposed to "prevent the spread of racial and religious hatred because of race, creed, or color" then why doesn't it go ALL the way and expose and penalize the Jewish practice (by its B'nai B'rith, and Anti-Defamation League, which operate to persecute Christians, and its hundreds of Pro-Jewish anti-Christian publications) of spreading ANTI-CHRISTIAN INTOLERANCE in these Christian United States; of legislating our Bible out of our public schools; of endeavoring to discredit our Christian holidays and observances; of endeavoring to change certain wording of the BIBLE ITSELF wherever it appears to be unfavorable to the JEWS?

But section 2 of this Bill tells the story: it is mainly intended to prevent "exposure of the JEWS as a nation, people, or religious group . . . to hatred, contempt, ridicule . . . which has a tendency to injure them in their occupations" etc. Here this bill admits the Jews ARE A NATION WITHIN A NATION (NOT AMERICANS FIRST). It is also silly to pretend that they are being INJURED in their occupations, because, as this writer has shown in booklet, GOD MADE ME FREE, as well as in THE JEWISH PROTOCOLS and Their Application to Present Times, the JEWS have been in CONTROL OF OUR GOVERNMENT and have held practically ALL the high posts in it for many years past: to a large extent, they control our banking interests; our press; our movies; and they own much of our real estate.

Recently, some friends were attending a movie in Los Angeles. When the picture was finished, Jew Eddie Cantor said to the audience: "I would like for the JEWISH ladies to remain after the performance: I have something important to say to them." Although non-Jewish, these friends remained to listen to the announcement. Then Eddie Cantor advised the Jewish women to BUY UP ALL THE REAL ESTATE THEY COULD GET. He said he had $35,000.00 in cash there with him, which he would be glad to lend them for that purpose, and he had a list of friends who would HELP THEM FIND REAL ESTATE TO BUY. So, multiply this sort of activity by groups and individuals, by hundreds and thousands, and you will see what is happening in this country today. This same sort of buying up real estate is going on in Utah too. The Jews largely control the wealth of this country as well as of England, Russia, and other countries. So the reasons assigned for the passage of this bill are sheer hypocrisy: it is merely intended to GIVE THEM OUTRIGHT CONTROL OF THE COUNTRY.

If their activities as a nation, people, or religious group were strictly on the "UP AND UP," why should they FEAR EXPOSURE? In other words, the JEWS must be sheltered and protected from criticism, or anything that displeases THEM; while every other citizen, from the President on down, is a target for bitter attack, criticism, abuse, by the Jews, Zionists, Communists, et al. These very people are always most vociferous and abusive in THEIR criticism. Getting to be a funny country, isn't it?

This Pro-JEW, un-American, unconstitutional bill would deprive the white Christian American of a voice in his own country and affairs: he would stand stripped of his birthright. It would make us virtual slaves to the GOLD and POWER of the Jews: such as was experienced in Germany, and is now experienced in Russia. We would experience slavery right in our own country, and the same sort of persecution as Christ Himself suffered at the hands of these same people. Every non-Jew would be at the mercy of a minority race or nation of JEWS: "HUMBLE SLAVES" just as the Protocols of the Elders of Zion said they would make of us. This is ONE MORE EVIDENCE OF THE CARRYING OUT OF THESE PROTOCOLS. (See THE JEWISH PROTOCOLS And Their Application to Present Times, by this writer.)

Quoting from Protocol No. 9 (page 7 of this booklet):

"IT IS FROM US THAT THE ALL-ENGULFING TERROR PROCEEDS. We have in our service persons of all opinions . . . we have harnessed them all to the task: each of them . . . is striving to OVERTHROW ALL ESTABLISHED FORMS OF ORDER."

From Protocol No. 12 (page 9 of booklet):

"What is the part played by the Press today? It serves to EXCITE AND INFLAME THOSE PASSIONS NEEDED FOR OUR PURPOSE, or else serves selfish ends of parties. WE SHALL SADDLE AND BRIDLE IT WITH A TIGHT CURB" (this is the aim and object of H. R. 6897 —mra); . . . NOT A SINGLE ANNOUNCEMENT WILL REACH THE PUBLIC WITHOUT OUR CONTROL: EVEN NOW THIS IS ALREADY BEING ATTAINED BY US."

So THIS is the kind of people who would thus be given ABSOLUTE CONTROL over our PRESS and our very lives: because, as the Jews themselves have said, who controls the Press practically controls a country. We have observed, both in this country and abroad, and we have been told by the Jews themselves in their Protocols, HOW THEY CONDUCT THEMSELVES WHEN IN POWER.

These people openly admit they are not for AMERICA FIRST: nor for CHRISTIANITY: but for Zionism, Judaism, a foreign state within a state: for an International State in Palestine which shall rule the world. These people, many of whom are foreign revolutionists, aliens partaking of America's gracious hospitality: who collect MILLIONS and BILLIONS from kind-hearted non-Jewish Americans, to SEND OUT OF THIS COUNTRY: these people who have large richly-financed organizations, secret societies, literally THOUSANDS of publications to PROMOTE THEIR OWN NARROW PARTICULAR JEWISH INTERESTS: these people who NEVER WORK FOR THE BEST INTERESTS OF CHISTIAN AMERICANS or AMERICA-AT-LARGE, but constantly play upon the sympathy, the fair-mindedness, the square-shooting instincts of our people in order to BETRAY them: these are the people who would force upon us this treasonable law in order to protect their own nefarious seditious activities, and bind and gag NATIVE WHITE CHRISTIAN AMERICANS SO THAT THEY WOULD NOT BE FREE TO DEFEND THEMSELVES AND THEIR COUNTRY FROM THIS "FOREIGN" FOE THAT LIVES AMONG US. THEY would make it a law, as in Russia, that no criticism be permitted, in any shape or form, of JEWS or ZIONISTS—no matter how inimical or treasonable their activities might be to the United States. The introduction of such a bill plainly shows us WHO OUR ENEMIES ARE.

This bill H. R. 6897 even proposes to CENSOR OUR MAIL, and would subject us to a "Secret Police" spy system similar to the NKVD in Russia. We would have the spectacle of AMERICANS in prison, at hard labor, for daring to exercise their Constitutional right of FREE SPEECH OR FREE PRESS! And soon the next step would be to have people put to death (as in Russia) for venturing to criticize their MASTERS, who would have complete control. So it is probably a very good thing that this bill has been introduced; because it may awaken some well-meaning persons who hurl all sorts of unjustifiable names and criticism at us WHO ARE ALERT AND INFORMED AS TO THE AIMS AND PURPOSES OF THE JEWS. Surely even they could not construe this Bill as being well-intentioned toward PRO-AMERICANS.

I say with Patrick Henry: "GIVE ME LIBERTY OR GIVE ME DEATH:" and so does every TRUE American. I WILL NOT BOW DOWN to these un-American seditionists in our midst, who would dispossess us of our most precious heritage: FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.

Shall Whites Marry Blacks?

We have had many ignorant, or vicious, people who have told us, "Oh no, THAT isn't the issue at all: Social Equality of Whites and Negroes doesn't mean that the two races will intermarry." Does any sane, reasonable person really BELIEVE such twaddle?

As if to thoroughly prove the falsity of their position, we now read in the newspapers of the MARRIAGE of "Father Divine," Negro preacher, and the depraved white girl. Thereupon, Father Divine's secretary issues the asinine statement that "This marriage is to propagate virtue . . . and to give the whole nation a new political and religious birth of freedom." One does not propagate virtue by disobeying God's strict command, "YE SHALL NOT COMMIT ADULTERY" (or FORNICATION): meaning THOU SHALT NOT MIX THE SEED OF THE RACES.

God's law is that "EVERYTHING SHALL PRODUCE AFTER ITS KIND": there is no law more strictly emphasized in the Bible than this, and no more severe penalties inflicted than for its violation. In olden times, everyone who thus defiled himself and his race, and broke God's commandment, was STONED TO DEATH. The punishment was swift, drastic, and certain.

Since Mr. Divine's secretary talks of "political and religious birth of freedom," it is obvious that this girl (Divine's wife) is probably a Communist stooge put up for the purpose of trying to corrupt the morals of our national life. A true Negro respects a white person who keeps HIS rightful place, just as the reverse is true. Our Negro people deserve better treatment than to be used as tools and dupes by unscrupulous selfish Jews and Communists; and it is the job of genuine White Americans to help protect them from this exploitation.

"Even as Sodom and Gomorrha, and the cities about them in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, and GOING AFTER STRANGE FLESH, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. Likewise, also these FILTHY DREAMERS DEFILE THE FLESH, despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities." (Jude 1: 7, 8.)

"Ye shall keep my statutes. Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind: thou shalt not sow thy field with mingled seed: neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woolen come upon thee." (Levit. 19:19.)

"Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Molech: he shall surely be put to death: the people of the land shall STONE HIM WITH STONES." (Levit. 20:2.)

"And ye shall be holy unto me: for I the Lord am holy, and have SEVERED YOU FROM OTHER PEOPLE, that ye should be mine." (Levit. 20:26.)

"Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? And what communion hath light with darkness?" (II Cor. 6:14.)

"Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together." (Deut. 21:10.)

"And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creatures AFTER HIS KIND, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth AFTER HIS KIND: and it was so. And God made the beast of the earth AFTER HIS KIND, and cattle AFTER THEIR KIND, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth AFTER HIS KIND: and GOD SAW THAT IT WAS GOOD." (Genesis 1: 24, 25.)

"Now it came to pass, when they had HEARD THE LAW, that they separated from Israel ALL THE MIXED MULTITUDE." (Nehemiah 13:3.)

Ask any horticulturist or stock breeder of what value is a hybrid or a mongrel, i. e. a mixed breed. Christ thought the same thing, because he said to the Canaanite woman (of mixed breed) who came crying unto Him: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the House of Israel" (that is, to those of pure lineage): she cried unto him the more, saying, "Lord, help me." He said: "It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs." But because of her great faith in Him, He healed her daughter. (Matthew 15:24, 25.)

Then in Daniel 2:38 we read of the status given by God to the White man:

"And wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven hath He given into thine hand, and hath made thee RULER OVER THEM ALL. Thou are that head of gold."

In Psalms 8:3-8 his status is unmistakably set forth:

"When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained;

"What is man, that thou art mindful of him? And the son of man that thou visitest him?

"For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor.

"THOU MADEST HIM TO HAVE DOMINION OVER THE WORKS OF THY HANDS: THOU HAST PUT ALL THINGS UNDER HIS FEET:

"All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; The fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas."

"And now have I given all these lands into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, my servant: and the beasts of the field have I given him also to serve him." (Jeremiah 27:6.)

So you see, there is not all this "equality" in the Creator's plan: and if we were observing God's law regarding FORNICATION today, Father Divine and his white girl would both be put to death. God does NOT say that everybody, every race, is created free and EQUAL: He says to his own particular selected servants—the white seed of Adam, Seth and Jacob—Israel:—"Come ye out and be ye separate from the world." The White race, "Sons of God," made in His image, have time and time again been commanded and warned to keep themselves pure and separate.

God's plan for the White Race was that it should serve HIM: His plan for the Negro, according to the Bible, is that he should serve the White man, helping him till the field, and performing similar useful services. The Negro does not have the organizing genius; the creative ability; the inventiveness; the sense of responsibility of the White man. He is particularly lacking in sense of responsibility as well as of gratitude. It is only occasionally that one of his race shows forth one or more of these qualities: due no doubt to admixture with the White man. He is by nature a follower and an imitator. He enjoys a civilization and high standard of living created by the White man.

We are today encouraging the mixing of the races: social equality and fraternization: by our false maudlin un-Scriptural teaching, we are encouraging sex crimes, the ultimate entire destruction and mongrelizing of the pure White race. This would mean the end of America. All this skullduggery about equality of the races, especially SOCIAL EQUALITY (advocated and promoted by Communists, and demanded by the Negro) is absolute wickedness and will not succeed, because it is DIVINELY FORBIDDEN AND ACCURSED. If you think any man-made dictum will succeed, when it runs counter to a fundamental law of God, you only betray your ignorance or wickedness, or both.

"Separateness," as God well knew, is best for both races, and this does not mean that the Negro is not entitled to his civil and educational rights: this writer believes in justice and kindness to the Negro: but it is suggested that the Negro "EARN" his way as he goes, and not be beguiled by the Jew-Communists into demanding things which are not rightfuily his, by any law of God or man.

The Jew-Communists (led and inspired by Eleanor Roosevelt) work fevorishly in this country to put across this wicked idea of SOCIAL EQUALITY: well knowing the harm they are doing BOTH races, and the country-at-large. A woman in Eleanor Roosevelt's position would not constantly seek the companionship of Negroes, if she did not have much in common with them. "Water seeks its own level." Even those people who work for the welfare of the Negro race, do not ordinarily make of them intimate social companions. All through Nature, each seeks the company of ITS OWN KIND.

Mr. Abraham Lincoln (though he freed the slaves) was in full accord with this idea of "separateness". Listen to a portion of his speech before a group of freed Negroes in Washington:

> "Why should not the people of your race be colonized? Why should they not leave this country . . . You and we are of a different race: we have between us a broader difference than exists between almost any other two races. . . . I think your race suffers greatly, many of them by living with us, while ours suffers from your presence . . . You are free men, I suppose, but when you cease to be slaves you are yet FAR REMOVED FROM BEING PLACED ON AN EQUALITY WITH THE WHITE RACE. You are still cut off from many of the advantages which are enjoyed by the other race . . . But for your race among us there could not be a War, although many men engaged on either side do not care for you one way or the other . . . It is better for us both, therefore, to be separated."

More and more Negro entertainers appear on radio programs, such as Kate Smith's, with White performers. Why do not the Negroes have their own programs, such as Wings over Jordan? I like to listen to Negro spirituals: there is no reason why they should not have their own bands of entertainers. Write to these programs and tell them you prefer not to have MIXED ENTERTAINERS. And the same thing applies to sports: let each race have its own contenders, and let them not fight with each other, either in the ring or out of it.

There was a nauseating article in Liberty magazine recently about a colored doctor in Beaufort, N. C., who delivers white babies and takes care of white people, who, he says, think no more of it than he does. One can scarcely blame the Negro for stepping out of his province when we have Whites of this type. A real true Negro would not go outside of his own class in this manner: and high-type white people would not so lower their own standards.

Today there are many vociferous NEGRO FIRST organizations, just as there are hundreds of JEW FIRST organizations, who work exclusively for what they consider their own best interests. It is only INTOLERANCE and BIGOTRY WHEN THE PURE WHITE AMERICANS WANT SOMETHING FOR THEMSELVES! But watch the bigotry, intolerance, violence, anti-Americanism practiced by these two minority groups toward the K K K, or toward the AMERICA FIRST party of Gerald L. K. Smith: and for that matter, toward White Christians in general. No smear artistry and no violence is too low for them to use. IT IS TIME WHITE CHRISTIAN CONSTITUTIONAL AMERICANS DID ORGANIZE TO PROTECT THEMSELVES AND THEIR RIGHTS!

In Utah we have a fellow named Sol J. Selvin (get the name) who is Chairman of a special committee to investigate racial discrimination and "determine if corrective legislation is needed." Now WHY would anybody appoint a pre-prejudiced person like him on such a committee: that's just like the Kangaroo courts of the Russians, who convict and torture a man first, and then try him afterward, and arrive at a pre-determined verdict.

This vicious trouble-maker concludes that there now exists in the State a "sizeable body of discriminatory practices which serves to bar equal opportunity and treatment . . . to colored citizens," and he thinks the legislature should enact legislation and PROVIDE ENFORCEMENT MACHINERY. This means trying to force through an F. E. P. C. law here, such as now exists in California and New York. The Communists care nothing about the best interests of the Negro: they merely use him and laws of this sort to STIR UP TROUBLE, cause racial riots, and help the cause of the Communist Revolution.

The Coloreds and Whites of Utah have been, and are, getting along VERY PEACEABLY: without noticeable complaint on either side. NOW, this fellow proposes to stir up animosity and hard feeling by forcing the Negro into an unpalatable and unjustifiable position. If the people of Utah have any wisdom at all, they will quickly see that this fellow and his proposed law are properly squelched.

The ONLY way the Negro and the White man CAN get along peaceably is to observe each other's rights and privacy: the right to be separate and to go with one's own kind, as God's law provides. The Negro is entitled to his rights as a human being: other than that, NO MAN HAS THE RIGHT TO LEGISLATE THE TWO DISTINCT RACES INTO SOCIAL EQUALITY AND CLOSE JUXTAPOSITION. The rights, privileges, dignity of the White man are being destroyed!

Believing the Bible to be the perfect and final authority as to the laws which should govern mankind on earth, this writer must accept the Bible version of the subject being discussed. Here are to be found the only just and perfect laws, given by God to Moses at Mt. Sinai, which still hold good today. (Some of these laws are briefly enumerated in THE ONLY WAY OUT, by this author.) The reason America and the whole world is in a mess today is because we refuse to heed and obey these laws. Christ said He came not to abrogate these laws, but to fulfill them, and that not one jot nor one tittle of them should pass away. Therefore, to the Christian, whatever the commands and laws laid down in the Bible, they are the final word. They are not based on hate, prejudice, or passion, and cannot be so construed just because they run counter to the false teaching of certain minority groups, or individuals, who want, demand and advocate something unlawful for themselves: or because they are exactly opposite to the pagan, materialistic teaching of Communism, Modernism, Zionism, or any other cult. These laws in the Bible are the BASIC FUNDAMENTAL LAWS OF THE UNIVERSE.

Let each race walk proudly, fulfilling its OWN destiny. It is not the destiny of the Colored man to be a White man: nor of the White man to be a Colored man. God has set metes and bounds for botn.

There is ONLY ONE WAY TO RESTORE PERMANENT PEACE on earth: that is by knowing and doing the laws of God: not by breaking them.

And now when our nation is in utmost peril, from within and without, we have radio announcers still further betraying us by blabbering about religious and racial freedom, advocating TOLERANCE toward the minority organized groups who do most to DESTROY THE VERY CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS MOST PRIZED BY EVERY GENUINE AMERICAN: the people who are the MOST INTOLERANT IN THIS COUNTRY ARE THE COMMUNISTS, JEW-ZIONISTS, NEGROES.

No one is being persecuted, actually, on the basis of either his religion or his race: but some of us ARE objecting to these people on the basis of TREASONABLE ACTIVITIES to the GOVERNMENT, WELFARE, and ESTABLISHED CHRISTIAN RELIGION OF THESE UNITED STATES. Traitors, or ignoramuses in our midst, want all of us to stick our heads in the sand, and remain quiescent and quiet NO MATTER WHAT DIRE DANGER THREATENS OUR INSTITUTIONS AND OUR COUNTRY. Rather, we need virile, vigilant PAUL REVERES today to tell our people the TRUTH, and WARN them of imminent peril to this REPUBLIC.

Our former Supreme European Commander, General Dwight D. Eisenhower, said universal peacetime military training is necessary for the sake of the nation and of the individual who must fight. He believes in "Peace with Strength." His ample experience has proven the superior quality of the VETERAN fighter, as well as the better chance the thoroughly-trained man has of living. Admirals Wm. F. Halsey and Chester Nimitz say that peacetime training is imperative: General Jonathan M. Wainwright said recently in Salt Lake City that we must be ready for ANY emergency.—On America's preparedness may depend the fate of civilization itself.

We previously refused to fortify Guam and take other necessary precautionary measures, due to the timidity of our legislators who feared to OFFEND JAPAN, and LOOK WHAT HAPPENED! On their heads is the blood of thousands of our finest youth.—And all present indications are that we will do a 'retake' with RUSSIA.

Our youth will profit in many ways from peacetime military training and discipline: (many of them do not give evidence of having received much disciplinary training elsewhere): they will gain a better idea of their duties and obligations to their country: EVERY American owes something to his country besides merely taxes. And included in this training should be a thorough course in CONSTITUTIONAL AMERICANISM—which is long overdue. Many of our Armed Forces had no clear idea of the PRINCIPLES for which they were fighting in World War II. Such training and discipline might be one panacea for the juvenile delinquency problem, and should be made a countermeasure to all the poisonous Communistic propaganda which floods our land.

Mr. F. L. Schlagle, of the National Education Association, says: "In the future, if nations are willing to sacrifice part of national sovereignty for the good of the world, the teaching of the INTERNATIONAL CONSTITUTION (as drawn at San Francisco) WILL BE A MORE IMPORTANT SUBJECT IN AMERICAN SCHOOLS THAN INSTRUCTION IN THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES." This is a sample of the kind of sloppy thinking many of our so-called educators are doing these days.

In the first place, a vast number of our selfish citizens are not willing to sacrifice anything for their OWN country's welfare. In the second place, there has never been devised a finer or more idealistic instrument for the protection of human rights and welfare, than the CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, and there has NOT BEEN A CONCERTED, CONSISTENT AND THOROUGH PROGRAM OF EDUCATION IN CONSTITUTIONAL AMERICANISM — at least, not recently. If there had been, this country would not today be on the verge of Red Revolution, and there would not be the present dearth of high moral AMERICAN leadership.—Furthermore, the ideals incorporated into the international charter were largely lifted from the American Constitution.

The Russian newspaper, Izvestia, says that Soviet youth, during the war and after the war—regardless of war—undergoes military training as preparation for future service to his country. In fact, their training starts at the tender age of EIGHT and continues for many years. Russia is the largest land-mass in the world (and gradually getting larger too): with a vastly greater population than ours: she is rich in almost untouched natural resources, as well as resources which she grabs from other nations (while we constantly DEPLETE OURS and send them abroad): yet she finds continuous military training a necessity, and is even so concerned about her security that she insists upon 'friendly' or communist regimes in bordering states, and also in those which do NOT border her country. She has already announced her intention of building the greatest navy in the world. Further, it is common knowledge that Russian communists have 'infiltrated' not only into this country, but China, Italy, France, Germany, Mexico, South America, and other countries, with the intent of "world-revolution" and the establishment of communism as a way of life, with the communists being the ABSOLUTE RULERS.

At the time of the trial of the alien communist, Harry Bridges, our Attorney General Biddle said the communist party "advocated violent overthrow of the United States Government" (WHICH IT STILL DOES). Now, after a seven-year fight to deport said Bridges as an undesirable alien, the (packed) Supreme Court rules invalid the deportation order, and he has the EFFRONTERY TO APPLY FOR U. S. CITIZENSHIP! And he uses that citizenship to foment strikes, tie up our shipping, and help deliver us into the hands of the Communists. HOW WE DO LOVE TO WASTE THE TAXPAYERS' MONEY, and how we bend over backward to favor the ENEMIES of our country and its institutions! As Jerry Colonna says: "Are we crazy, or sumthin?"—Did you ever read OUT OF THE NIGHT, by Jan Valtin, in which are exposed the terrorist practices of the Communist underground?

It is this same RUSSIA and her satellites which put on a campaign against the nations, especially little Greeee, which stand between her and access to the Mediterranean: while at the same time she puts on a similar campaign against Turkey for military control of the Dardanelles.

There is an article in September 1946 READER'S DIGEST by Joseph and Stewart Alsop concerning the much-discussed atomic bomb, and their final conclusion: "The only sure defense of this country is POLITICAL DEFENSE." When I first read that sentence, I had hoped that they meant CLEANING UP AND PURGING AMERICA OF COMMUNIST TRAITORS AND SPIES, so that we might present a united ALL-AMERICAN front to our enemies, within and without. But on reading further I found that what they meant by this phrase was that, "We shall insist, with all our power and all our AUTHORITY, upon INTERNATIONALIZATION of atomic-energy control . . . We shall insist . . . upon making the United Nations a working world organization, capable of settling world problems by peaceful means." But right there, without in the least showing us how this is to be done AGAINST THE DETERMINED WARLIKE OPPOSITION OF THE SOVIET UNION, the writers stopped: just as all of them do. They put ALL the onus upon America, for setting up a workable peaceful world machinery: when we are doing our very best, and Russia does her very worst. They do not tell us HOW to INSIST SUCCESSFULLY on establishing peace against an imperialist, warlike, totalitarian power whose ONE announced purpose is to DOMINATE AND CONTROL THE WORLD, UNDER THE THIRD INTERNATIONAL. Will not somebody come across with an explanation as to HOW THIS INSISTENCE IS TO BE ACHIEVED? Such a person should be made Chief Adviser to Mr. James Byrnes, at Paris, who would unquestionably welcome this much-needed advice and information. The advocate of this kind of INSISTENCE could no doubt have prevented war with Hitler.

Have the Messrs. Alsop READ THEIR BIBLE RECENTLY? This is the book upon which our nation was founded: It says WAR BETWEEN THE PAGAN HEATHEN NATIONS, LED BY GOG (Russia, King of the North), AND ISRAEL (God's white Christian people) IS INEVITABLE: it describes the battle: how God will intervene on behalf of His people: and HOW

WE SHALL BE SAVED, in spite of atomic bombs: or perhaps BECAUSE of them, because God will rain FIRE on our enemies!

These people who protest so loudly against universal military training and preparedness, and other measures designed to safeguard America: do they complain about the intense nationalism and PREPAREDNESS OF THE RUSSIANS?? Most realistic thinkers admit that the world is still very unsafe for innocence and weakness, and it will be dangerous for a long time to come for the lamb to lie down with the BEAR. There is even enough rampant selfishness and evil right in our own country to convince us of that: laws do not make people perfect, nor do laws MAKE PEACE. We have far too many laws in the United States: yet they do not prevent the committing of many crimes, as well as an INCREASE in crime of over 13% in the past year, according to Mr. J. Edgar Hoover's recent announcement.

Instead of quite so much emphasis on man-made law, international or otherwise, why not more emphasis on the PEOPLE who make and enforce and live by those laws? Why do we never hear anything about the Sermon on the Mount as a code of conduct? It is not "merely" Christianity: it is the ONLY common sense, as well as Divine, philosophy that will ever GUARANTEE permanent peace on earth. Why do we never hear the word CHARACTER stressed as a necessity for world peace? Everything boils down in the last analysis to CHARACTER: the sort of personal code that individuals believe in and live by. To repeat: laws on the statute books do not make people good nor do they prevent wars or make peace. Until a man's word is his bond, and until we rate CHARACTER higher than DOLLARS, we wil not be able to enjoy the full fruits of Christian Americanism in America.

This very LACK OF CHARACTER is exemplified in the lawless, rioting MOBS, who take the law into their own hands, and FORBID the holding of peaceable Christian meetings: they race through the lobbies of our best hotels, destroying property, causing violence and bloodshed, depriving American citizens of their right of free speech and peaceable assembly. THIS is the result of Russian-Communist indoctrination: these mobs of CIO-PAC Communists, Negroes, Jews, order peaceable assemblies to "Get out or we'll put you out" and the supposed forces of law and order connive with them—as was done in Minneapolis, Minn. on August 21st, 1946.—Why don't Messrs. Alsop INSIST that people of this caliber be subject to the LAWS and CONSTITUTION OF AMERICA? How can we control powerful nations abroad if we do not maintain law and order in our own country?

A mature person disciplines and governs himself, needing few outward restraints to prevent him from being a menace or hindrance to his neighbor. There is a saying: he that governs himself is greater than he that taketh a city. Until we have a preponderance of emotionally and spiritually mature and stable individuals in the various countries of the world (including our own) and they have demonstrated some ability to manage themselves and their own countries successfully, without being a menace to their neighbors, we cannot expect them to qualify as world-citizens and world-policemen.

Until both leaders and peoples of the world get back to the fundamentals of honesty, integrity, unselfishness. at least a degree of self-discipline, and at least a modicum of the exercise of the GOLDEN RULE, no national or international laws or regulations will stand up against the wolfish tendencies exhibited by people and nations. Two cases in point are Germany's and Japan's total disregard of international law in World War II. Until the "masses" as well as many leaders show more moral character and high integrity, it is FATAL FOLLY to yield up any American sovereignty to ANY outside power, who would use it against us. Why do not the leaders in the various countries try educating their people to a higher standard of thinking, of conduct, and living, so that they will be FIT to become world-citizens?

There are entirely too many people who are not even genuine, loyal American citizens: they do not show the first principles of cooperation in their own Republic, so how should they be fit to take on still greater duties and obligations, as altruistic, broad-minded world-citizens? It is like saying, we are all going to Heaven, when we have none of the prerequisites to entitle us to Divine companionship. A STRUCTURE THAT IS NOT BUILT ON A FIRM FOUNDATION CANNOT STAND. We are straining at gnats and endeavoring to swallow a camel, which will give us worse indigestion than we already have. We need military training and preparedness, as well as moral and spiritual education, FOR A STRONG, UNITED IMPREGNABLE AMERICA.

The important thing is that we must not only preserve this AMERICAN REPUBLIC, as established by our Constitution, for ourselves—but also for the benefit of the world, because there WILL come a time when the hands on the cosmic clock will point to a World Federation of Republics, patterned voluntarily after the United States model.

PRO-AMERICANS MUST WORK TOGETHER IN ORDER TO SURVIVE

Never mind the tiresome reiteration on choosing life or death, peace or annihilation, etc. in the atomic age: the time has now come when we must have INTELLIGENT COOPERATION IN AMERICA, BETWEEN AMERICANS, IN ORDER TO SURVIVE. Today all the accent seems to be on discord, dissension, opposition, politics first and America last. This must be replaced by unity, working for a common goal—the WELFARE OF AMERICA—and the maintaining of America's place in the sun. AMERICANS MUST WORK TOGETHER IN ORDER TO SURVIVE.

Everything is PLANNED in Russia under a one-party system, which has no opposition whatever: everyone bends their efforts toward the good of the state as a whole. In America we have many selfish politicians, as well as individuals, pulling in every direction: frequently devoting most of their thought and attention to their own selfish interests and ambitions. Business initiative, freedom, and enterprise—which built this country—have been stifled and handicapped to a very dangerous degree: Labor has been given plenty of rope, with which it proceeds to hang the rest of the country: while it constantly demands more for less, and has fully demonstrated its own selfish interest and lack of any sort of consideration for the NATIONAL welfare or for the public. If that sort of thing continues to hold sway, how does any reasonable person expect that America can continue to exist and prosper?

National selfishness is our cardinal sin: likewise national cowardice in refusing to face facts and critical issues, and DO SOMETHING ABOUT THEM. No nation exists for long as a great power under the loose and lax morals and standards that are so prevalent today: it goes down into decay. To speak frankly many of our people are going to reap, in the time which is now upon us, just what they have sown, by their selfish indifference and neglect of America's interests.

Mr. David L. Cohn had a very pertinent article in January, 1946 issue of The Atlantic, entitled FIRST IN WAR—LAST IN PEACE, in which he lays bare the weakness, and childish adolescence which so often afflicts the American character. We refuse to face responsibility: we dislike discipline and any sort of hardship. No wonder our young people expect life to be always just a "bowl of cherries", when one considers the example set by so many of their elders. When ARE we going to grow up?

In his book PEOPLE ON OUR SIDE, Mr. Edgar Snow says "these Russian youths cry for responsibility:" they are eager to assume it, and to learn new skills. They have a keen sense of responsibility as well as love for, and gratitude to, their country: all of which is necessary for ANY country to be a going concern.

The Russian people have energy, ambition, a definite goal: all the verve, energy, enthusiasm, national spirit that we Americans USED to have B. S. (before strikes) and before so many people began talking about the folly of being truly American: before we were fed so much seditious smooth anti-American propaganda by so many pro-Communist writers and commentators. Now our national spirit is so watered down, we aren't sure just what we are. WE SHALL HAVE TO REGAIN THAT COMPELLING AMERICAN SPIRIT: that WILL to do and dare: if we are to hold our own at home and abroad in the tough days ahead. We are going to have to face keen competition. In Mr. Edgar Snow's book, he makes it quite clear that Russia intends to outstrip America in every possible way (by 1960) and prove that her way of life is better than ours.

The theory behind Article 12 of the Soviet Constitution: "In the USSR work is an obligation and a matter of honor of every able-bodied citizen, in accordance with the principle, 'He who does not work, neither shall he eat' " is basic, in Russia, America, or any other country. No one who can work, but refuses to work, is entitled to be paid. (You don't hear the pro-Soviets in America stressing THIS provision, though, do you?)—A further provision in the Soviet Constitution: "FROM each according to his ability, TO each according to the work performed" is also fundamentally sound in principle: the application of this principle would eliminate so much of the foolish contention of labor unions in THIS country for "equal pay" for all —which is utterly unjust and unfair.

Article 4 of the Soviet Constitution aims to "abolish the exploitation of man by man", and no one can quarrel with that ideal: only we differ in the manner by which it should be attained. The Bolsheviks strive to attain it by force and regimentation to such an extreme that they accomplish the very thing they are supposed to be "abolishing:" by depriving the citizens of their freedom: by maintaining a minority one-party dictatorship, and by putting the interests of the State above that of the individual citizen. OUR method in the United States is the opposite: i. e., to allow our individual citizens the fullest possible liberty and freedom: to subordinate the government and the state to the uses and benefit of the individual citizen: and to permit the individual to succeed financially or otherwise to the extent of his ability.

However, one freely grants that the possibility of exploitation of man by man: abuse of freedom is much more a possibility under OUR system than under the Russian:—just as we see freedom today abused and exploited by the labor unions, who refuse to work to the best of their ability, and demand equal pay for all members regardless of individual worth, skill, and productivity.

Under our system, it is the more necessary that moral and spiritual law, principle, self-discipline, shall be observed and practiced: in other words, it is necessary for us to be VOLUNTARILY governed by the Golden Rule: t o do good to our fellowman, thereby increasing the good of all: in order to preserve our system of free enterprise and at the same time protect the best interests of the nation as well as of our fellow-citizens. And this form of volutary observance of the rights and interests of our fellowman, along with individual freedom, is the HIGHEST SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT THAT CAN BE DEVISED: but its success depends upon this observance of moral and spiritual precepts.

In the chapter of his book (above referred to), which is entitled, "Is Russia Abandoning Communism," Mr. Edgar Snow deals gently and tenderly with the Communist system of "purging." He says:

> "Some people jump to wrong conclusions because of external resemblances between Soviet Communism and Nazi methods, or because they employ similar tools. In both cases there were one-party rule, secret police, 'liquidation' of opposition elements, and strict control of the press. But although surgery and murder both employ a knife, society does not regard them as synonomous. Under the Soviet system the victim was held to be a privileged class, which had to be liquidated in so far as it obstructed realization of socialist society in the USSR and the elimination of 'exploitation of man by man through private ownership of the means of production.'"

It is noteworthy that Mr. Snow objects most strenuously, (and inconsistently) when the Kuomintang in China has the same idea toward the Chinese Communists, who the Nationalist Government thinks are obstructing realization of a united China.

Continuing with Mr. Snow's argument:

> "Under the Nazi system, the victims were frankly said to be whole peoples, not only the Jews and the Slavs, but ultimately all who opposed 'Aryan' mastery of the earth . . . The simple truth seems to be that the USSR is unique."

Does anyone understand this peculiar uniqueness of the USSR, and from whence it derives its authority and sanction to PURGE ALL THOSE WHO INTERFERE WITH ITS MASTERY? Is murder to be condoned as "liquidation" by the Communist Party whenever and wherever it suits their own particular purposes, merely because, as Mr. Snow assumes, they have, or will, kill FEWER people in the long run than the Nazis did? Who knows accurately how many people the Communists have, and will "liquidate" before they have finally attained their announced objective of WORLD-WIDE COMMUNISM? Has the Sovereign Ruler of the universe placed his stamp of approval on the Communist Party of Russia and informed them that it is quite O. K. to slaughter anyone else in the wide world who refuses to bow to one-party Communist rule, and has HE said that THEY are the ONE PEOPLE destined to rule the world, instead of the Nazis? That isn't likely, since the Communists themselves have repudiated God and religion. What is the difference in principle between mass murder, as herein stated by Mr. Snow, whether practiced by the Nazis or by the Communists? We fought to destroy the "Divine right to rule by force" obsession of the Nazis: why embrace it under the label of Communism?

This issue was much more truthfully and ably stated by Mr. Sumner Welles in his article "The Bomb and World Government" in January, 1946 issue of the Atlantic:—

> "If I understand his (Prof. Einstein's) thesis correctly, and I think I do, minority rule should be regarded as iniquitous in every nation of the world EXCEPT THE SOVIET UNION . . . This view, of course, approximates the classic thesis of the Third International that minorities are entitled to exercise control when they are of the Communist Faith. Examples are not wanting that the logical outgrowth of this philosophy is the assertion of the right of Communist minorities by liquidations and terror to dominate opposing majorities until those majorities have been forced into the Communist line. The issue raises one of the gravest problems with which freedom-loving peoples are today faced."

Mr. Snow contradicts himself when he says, in the Chapter entitled, "What Russians Think of Us"—

> "But no one now dreams of overthrowing the American system by force. (Oh NO??? —mra) Russian Communists are satisfied with the Stalinist principle that the best way to prove the superiority of socialism over capitalism is by making a triumphant success of it within the borders of the Soviet Union."

by his statement in the following chapter, "What Russia WANTS"—

> "It is obvious that the dissolution of the Comintern DID NOT ABOLISH THE INTERNATIONAL CHARACTER OF THE COMMUNIST MOVEMENT, nor its adherence to doctrines enunciated at Moscow. Despite the absence of any central authority over other parties*, the prestige of the Russian Communist Party and the Red Army is now so immense, and the associations of many years exercise such a powerful centrifugal pull, that Soviet policy as expressed through its public press, in effect still serves as an INTERNATIONAL DIRECTIVE. It would be naive to suppose that all diplomats are not aware of this."

(*N. B. This allegation is disproved by the facts, since all Communist leaders in every country receive their directives from Moscow.)

In the chapter, "What Russians Think of Us", Mr. Snow refers to a "general book on America" called the "United States of America:" (he does not give the author's name:)—

> "At the Sixteenth Party Congress, (says this book), Stalin characterized America as 'the main capitalist country.' "

Throughout, it speaks of the world as divided between capitalism and the USSR.—That being the case, since the Communists admittedly are still bent on World-Communization, it is entirely obvious that they are bound to propagate Communism in the United States, and to attempt to overthrow what they regard as their chief rival in the world. Mr. Snow's book itself is pretty good propaganda for THEM: it is highly recommended by the Communist book-stores.

N. B. Do not confuse EDGAR Snow with the pro-American writer, JOHN HOWLAND Snow, author of America, Which Way?

DO WE TRUST IN GOD — OR MONEY?

OUR money is different just as is our destiny from any other. It carries on its face a set of spiritual symbols, which marks it as God's money as well as ours: at the same time the symbols signify our national destiny.

Every day we use money to buy our "daily bread"—but do we heed its spiritual message, with which to feed our souls? Never were these two basic needs so beautifully combined and symbolized, as in our money: and probably never so universally used, yet ignored. Our Founding Fathers were undoubtedly inspired when they placed the mottoes and symbols on our money.

For instance, on the face of our silver dollar is the head of a woman (who in Bible symbology represents the soul): over her head is the word LIBERTY: beneath, the legend, IN GOD WE TRUST. Do you know any better motto for America to adopt in these days? This would solve all her woes and problems IF SHE TRULY TRUSTED IN GOD.

On the reverse side of the dollar (or quarter) is the uncrowned BALD-headed eagle: an occult symbol of deep significance. This eagle is the national emblem of the United States, and any other use is expressly forbidden by Congress. In occult practice, the top of the head is used to signify the faculty of direct contact with God, as distinct from approach through any intermediate channel. Among ancient Priesthoods, the top of the candidate's head was shaved to symbolize this. Hence the BALD-headed eagle—telling us that it is the destiny of America to LEAD mankind into personal freedom and true self-realization, which will give him direct contact with God. The eagle clutches an olive branch (symbol of peace and good-will) in his right claw, while underneath him is the word PEACE—all of which tells us we cannot fulfill our destiny in the world UNLESS we are at peace, with ourselves and other nations. We cannot be involved in entangling alliances and wars (by which we try to FORCE our ideals on others), and which clip the eagle's wings, power and influence. Our job is to LEAD other nations and peoples by the EXAMPLE which we ourselves set. (He who is convinced against his will, is of the same opinion still.) Likewise, a household divided against itself or constantly waging war with its neighbors, can accomplish little that is constructive. But this does not mean that we should be unprepared to defend our country.

Over the eagle's head are the words, E PLURIBUS UNUM: many but one: ultimately to be the credo of the world. The eagle, of course, is the symbol of Victory. He it is, also, who neither fights a storm nor runs away from it. He SOARS ABOVE IT, into higher, calmer regions: and this signifies taking refuge in the realm of Spirit.

Again, the symbols of the Great Seal of the United States, which appear on our "greenbacks", are profoundly significant and inspiring, chosen by men wiser than we know. The front of the Seal shows the "heraldic" eagle, with 13 stars over his head, announcing the birth of the spiritual idea in the United States, and holding an olive branch in his right claw and 13 arrows in his left: again denoting that peace and good will should be our first consideration, and active warfare only a means of defense, or last resort.

On the reverse side of the Seal is an unfinished Pyramid, and above it a triangle containing the "all-seeing eye"—symbolizing the Single Eye of which Christ spoke, and meaning that when an individual or nation puts God FIRST, then he or it will prosper. It is this ideal which we must incorporate into our national life.

The motto ANNUIT COEPTIS (Meaning He, God, has favored our undertakings) appears over the Pyramid: and beneath it the words, NOVUS ORDO SECLORUM, meaning a "new series of ages", or a new order of things has commenced:—all beautiful symbols packed with meaning as to America's destiny.

America has NO ENEMY TO FEAR, save that of not living up to her own intended destiny:—which is to establish in the world Liberty, based upon true freedom of mind and spirit: tolerance: equal opportunity: reverence for things of the Spirit: the "I CAN" philosophy contained in the word AMERICAN. If this be "nationalism", amen: make the most of it. I am an ardent believer in American nationalism, because, if we live up to our heritage, our God-given Constitution, and follow the star of our inspired symbolism, we will truly be not ONLY Americans, but WORLD-CITIZENS —both mundane and celestial.

ON THE MOUNTAIN TOP

The swirling drifting snows,
The whistling flying winds
Are crashing round the crags
With pelting, primal force.

The heights, the depths of space
Are conscious of a Presence:
Vast solitude of sound
That hurts the heart with joy.

The harmony of noise
Is like celestial song:
It blots out lesser things:
Unveils the naked soul.

The measured rhythmic beat
In Nature's high retreat
Inspires the jaded heart
To climb to heights undreamed.

Beneath, above, all round,
The pulse of God resounds;
And one is lifted far
Beyond the sense of self.

Psalm 46

God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble.

Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea:

Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof.

There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High.

God is in the midst of her: she shall not be moved: God shall help her, and that right early.

The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved: he uttered his voice, the earth melted.

The lord of hosts is with us: the God of Jacob is our refuge.

Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations he hath made in the earth.

He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire.

Be still, and know that I am God: I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth.

The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge.

Whose Country Is This?

Does It Belong to Europe?

("SNAFU In Your Land and Mine")

In the new Fourth International COMMUNIST MANIFESTO, ALL the stress is placed on NATIONALISM and SOVEREIGNTY of separate States, with a revolutionary plea to the Fifth Columns in EVERY country to rise up and TAKE POSSESSION of those Governments in the name of the Kremlin-dominated COMMUNIST PARTY.

At the same time, Russia, and those 'Internationalists' in this country, who are so easily led by the nose, do everything they can to BREAK DOWN American sovereignty via the U.N. Anyone reading my dated booklets will observe that I said over a year and a half ago, that Russia would "scuttle the United NATIONS." Her ultimate objective is to SCUTTLE the United STATES. That is why she has re-formed her Communist Comintern, for World Revolution, and especially to align the world AGAINST its benefactor, the United STATES. She is now putting on an ideological warfare to the death, which must eventually develop into a shooting warfare to the death.

Our own investigators returning from Europe say that, despite all the blood and treasure WE have spent in Europe, it could now be taken over by Stalin IN A WEEK: so what price suckers, and why keep on keeping on? These investigators flay the openly immoral conditions that PREVAIL among our occupation troops: who have become diseased degenerates in many cases, officers and men alike. EVERYTHING WE DO, and HAVE DONE, in violation of our own Constitution, our own Monroe Doctrine, the precepts laid down by the illustrious Father of our Country, Washington, HAS LED US DEEPER AND DEEPER INTO THE QUICKSANDS OF DISASTER, from which it becomes increasingly impossible to disentangle ourselves. The Christian Bible tells us to WITHDRAW INTO OUR OWN BORDERS and mind our own business (just as does our Constitution:)—

> "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast.
> For, behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity: the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." (Isa. 26:20)

And yet, in face of all the lessons of experience, there are those FALSE leaders who advocate that the administration again put our people under RATIONING, so that it can the more readily conscript or CONFISCATE our cattle and the American people's FOOD, to GIVE TO FOREIGN NATIONS. The absolute UNCONSTITUTIONALITY and ILLEGALITY of such brazen STEALING of this people's resources is appalling: yet many people are so bemused and DUMB that they are content it should be so. It only goes to show that our people have so long been regimented and pushed around: told what we can have: what we can make: what we can eat: what we must do for FOREIGN nations, until they no longer understand their own rights in their own country. Instead of upstanding Americans, they have become a spineless species of hybrid Internationalist. Soon, they will arrive at that 'faceless' stage, where they can readily be taken over by some anti-Christ "World Ruler" who has only to make them all sorts of specious promises of 'security' and 'peace,' and they will bend their necks, as sheep to the slaughter.

In the FIRST place, CHARITY begins at HOME: in the SECOND place, charity is an INDIVIDUAL matter, NOT a NATIONAL matter, to be doled out by our Government. Private individuals and organizations could handle this matter in a much more efficient and less wasteful manner. BUT LET ME WARN YOU: if we whittle down the health and strength of our OWN people, especially our young people, by food of INSUFFICIENT QUALITY and QUANTITY, then we will not, one day, be able to meet the awesome challenge which even now stares us in the face. WE SHOULD BE STOCKPILING OUR FOOD FOR OUR OWN USE!

The Administration wastes and squanders our money and resources, and refuses to cut down its overstaffed bureaucracy: it throws away MILLIONS of dollars, as was done in the Howard Hughes airplane fiasco, and many similar "extravaganzas." It is THIS type of Administration which DEMANDS that our people 'pull in their belts' so that IT can play politics abroad with OUR food. Today, America truly STANDS at the CROSSROADS: It is up to US who love HER (not the cesspool of Europe) to see to it that SHE survives. Our scientists have said that we cannot possibly produce enough food in this country to feed the world.—Reason and good sense and concern for our OWN country, should precede emotionalism and altruism. We cannot permit America to be denuded of her rights and resources.

If Europe is going to 'collapse' unless we continue to wet-nurse her and if we are to live under the constant threat of what Russia is going to do in the event we do NOT continue stripping ourselves of our resources for foreign nations, then I say the SOONER THE COLLAPSE COMES, THE BETTER. Let's get it over with. There is no possibility of us preventing such a collapse, actually, if it IS in the cards. And WHOM are we going to hold responsible, IF ALL OUR SACRIFICE IS IN VAIN: if we strip and weaken ourselves, and STILL cannot prevent the Communist steamroller from going over Europe? Let's be realistic, as the Russians would say. There IS a strong probability of our OWN collapse by our playing into Russia's hands—which is what we do when we further strip our already bankrupt (to the tune of nearly 300 BILLION DOLLARS) nation. It is disgusting for OUR nation to be always 'pushed around' and told what to do by OTHERS who care nothing for OUR welfare. Sure, I believe in CHARITY: but NOT by wrecking the headstone of the corner, which is America. America has never yet been given either proper credit OR gratitude for all the tons upon tons of material we have ALREADY sent to Europe: MUCH of OUR material was actually used to promote COMMUNISM, and probably will be again.

The Jew, Henry Morgenthau, as Secretary of the Treasury, illegally gave the United States' MINT to Russia, who has printed untold HUNDRED MILLIONS OF DOLLARS; used to aid Communism in Europe, and to aid in bankrupting the USA. He was aided and abetted in this treason by the then Chief of Staff, George Marshall, who personally conveyed these printing plates to the Russian Occupation Forces. Does anybody know whether these plates have YET been returned? Are we ever going to try traitors in America, instead of in Germany? BILLIONS of dollars are still owing this Country from World War I loans: which will never be collected.

Anybody who advocates continued draining of our resources, for foreign countries, is NOT a GOOD AMERICAN!

Henry J. Taylor is MY idea of a REAL American commentator: he is always working and pulling FOR AMERICA, God Bless him. He is sympathetic toward Europe's problems, but he has the HONEST, TRUTHFUL COURAGE to come right out and say that the reason they cannot help themselves more is due to the terrific oppression and CONFUSION (Snafu, he calls it) caused by their Socialist (Communist) governmental bureaucracy. After an extended trip through Europe, he reports that these people need help now, NOT so much as the result and aftermath of war, but because they cannot live and PRODUCE under the smothering inefficiency of swarms of SOCIALIST bureaucrats, their ignorance and inability. Britain, France, Italy, are slowly stifling and strangling under what amounts to Communist-dictated socialization: and WE are expected to step in and contribute OUR money and resources to maintain in power a system which is INIMICAL and DIAMETRICALLY OPPOSED TO OUR OWN. The results, to us, of this kind of suicidal action will no doubt be far worse than if we let Europe either sink or swim by its own efforts, under its own power. NECESSITY is said to be the MOTHER OF INVENTION.—We have a sufficient plethora of Governmental bureaucrats to support here at home, without taking on all of Europe's.

As Mr. Taylor says, the Russians have TROOPS in ratio of 2 to 1 to ALL the other occupation troops in Germany. Our boys over there aren't actually stopping the Russians from doing anything they want to do. When the Bolsheviks get ready, they will swarm over those boys like a steamroller or a plague of locusts. Then we will have lost a great deal MORE of our money and spilled MORE of our own blood. Even now, a "shooting" war is going on: with the Russians almost daily FIRING ON THE SENTRIES AND OUTPOSTS OF OUR OCCUPATION FORCES. This comes direct from a Colonel in our occupation forces, who has just returned to Salt Lake, bringing his family with him. He says that WAR WITH RUSSIA IS INEVITABLE. Why? Peace-mongers take note: BECAUSE RUSSIA INSISTS UPON HAVING IT SO. While our betrayers (including our 'Internationalist' senators) cry peace, peace: ATTACK against us is being readied. Watch for ANOTHER Pearl Harbor which will come via the North Pole. Yet we STILL have REDS in our Administration who continue to betray us.

Britain's papers are now predicting war between Russia and the U. S. A., in which war she proposes to stay on the sidelines. In other words, despite all the extraordinary help and assistance of every kind that we have always poured out to Britain, if we are attacked by the most powerful coalition the world has ever known, SHE intends to "sit this one out." Or, perhaps she will condescend to "become the arsenal of democracy" for us. Well, if we have to depend on the pro-Russian-Communist striking labor unions in Britain to furnish us with the sinews of war, we will be licked BEFORE we start. I merely mention this instance to show how much gratitude and cooperation we are likely to receive from any of these parasite nations, when WE really need help. Ingratitude is the basest SIN! Again I say, we had better make America strong and be prepared to stand, alone with God, against the anti-Christ forces of darkness which are now gathering against America.

ALL THAT WE HAVE DONE, ALL THAT WE SHALL DO, in violation of our Christian precepts and our Christian CONSTITUTION, SHALL COME TO NAUGHT.

We shall reap the whirlwind of destruction, ON OUR OWN SOIL, for our disobedience.

If you will re-read the writer's booklet, AMERICA AT THE CROSSROADS, (25¢), in the light of the new Communist International pronouncement of WAR against us, you will see that it discusses and predicts this VERY situation, almost as if written yesterday, instead of early in 1946. Every word fits into today's picture. Also, on page 23 of same booklet, under title, IT MUST BE OF THE SPIRIT, you will find this endorsement of that brilliant military commander and statesman, General Douglas MacArthur:

> "Here is the kind of timber we need for our next President: a man of high spiritual, moral, and physical COURAGE: a man of integrity and stirling character: a MAN OF SPIRIT."

The writer favors General MacArthur for our next President: but it is my understanding (which comes straight from the General's headquarters) that he does not desire to be President. He feels he has done his job in Japan (and HOW!) and wants to return home to REST: not to take over the superhuman task of pulling our people out of the appalling MESS into which we have gotten ourselves. Whether he would serve if DRAFTED by the people, I do not know. Perhaps he would.

The writer is not and never has been a politician, and is not in position to tell the people of this nation for whom to vote (as Stalin told our people to vote for Roosevelt). But just this very serious suggestion: REAL Americans had better discard EVERY consideration except the WELFARE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, if they have the slightest desire to see this nation survive the perilous days ahead. The next election may be our last opportunity to bring this nation BACK TO OUR CONSTITUTION and to our own American principles.

ALL of the so-called Liberals, Progressives, Parlor Pinks, are absolutely OUT, unless you wish this nation to continue to pursue the path to UTTER and TOTAL DISASTER, which it has been following for the past 15 years. It will require the honest vote of every sincere American to defeat this radical element.

Personally, I do NOT favor Wallace, Stassen, Vandenburg, Eisenhower, Jew-Internationalist FEPC Dewey. Further, Dewey favors the vicious Stratton Bill to admit more hundreds of thousands of refugees: when this country is already glutted with them, to OUR great detriment. Eisenhower wasn't even a brilliant military commander: he has no capacity and no experience fitting him to be President of the USA. The mere fact that he was called, and accepted, the Presidency of Left-wing Columbia University, would DISqualify him in MY eyes. Birds of a feather flock together.

Any of the following are more genuine Americans, in the writer's opinion: Senators Robert A. Taft; John Bricker; Kenneth Wherry; Styles Bridges; ~~Congressman~~ Hugh Butler; Alvin O'Konski.
Sen.

Let us pray that God Himself will raise up a MAN, a Christian AMERICAN, to be our next President!

IN CHRIST'S NAME, LET'S HAVE FREE SPEECH IN AMERICA!

In October 3d, 1947 issue of Bnai Brith Messenger, there appears an article by Rabbi Milton Steinberg, WHAT DO

JEWS THINK OF JESUS, in which he arrogantly criticises the CHRISTIAN MESSIAH — the Founder of our Faith—to his heart's content, and makes unflattering as well as untrue statements and comparisons.

He says Christ Jesus "propounded no ethical doctrine in which Jewish Tradition had not anticipated Him. What He taught was the Jewish Tradition as He received it from Scripture and the sages." This is bald-faced UNTRUTH. Christ was NOT a Jew: He came to ABOLISH the Jewish Tradition of Mammon and love of SELF: His teachings were in direct opposition to the narrow sectarian doctrine of Jewish love of themselves, and HATRED OF EVERYBODY ELSE. He upset their Tradition and "made it of no effect." He came to tell them that the "Kingdom has been taken from you and given to those who shall do the Works."

If He did not teach a new faith and doctrine, then why did the Jews so violently oppose Him: seek and secure His death? Merely because, as Rabbi Steinberg says, "He was INTEMPERATE in his condemnation of the scribes and Pharisees?" Of COURSE He was: He was the leading anti-Jew of His day. He thoroughly understood and exposed the nature and character of the Jew: which was one of the main reasons they hated Him.—Here is our Example and Pattern: but, instead, most modern-day Clergy —like the Politicians—HANG ON TO THE JEWS' COATTAILS and follow THEM, instead of our Lord.

This Rabbi lowers himself by accusing the Messiah, in the language of COMMUNISM, of having "at least traces of CHAUVINISM in Him," because the Christ believed in PURITY OF RACE. Jewish organizations and publications have made common cause with Negroes and Communists in their fight AGAINST White Christian Americans. And here is PROOF of it, out of the mouth of this Jewish Rabbi. Jews encourage and promote fraternization, SOCIAL EQUALITY, between Whites and Negroes: with the idea of mongrelizing and degrading the White Race. But they themselves OSTRACISE ANY JEW who goes outside of HIS OWN RACE. They bitterly denounce one of their clan who would even 'lower' himself by marrying a White Christian. In other words, they stress continuously THEIR OWN RACE, THEIR OWN JEWISHNESS, THEIR OWN NATIONALISM, and certainly NO JEW would even remotely THINK of accepting the Negroes on an equal social basis.

It would seem that SOME day, our people would become fed up with this one-sided bald-faced hypocrisy and DISCRIMINATION AGAINST WHITE CHRISTIAN AMERICANS.

This Rabbi goes on to say that "the condition of the world since His advent has never impressed Jews as justifying such an appraisal of Him"—that is, that He came to inaugurate God's Kingdom on earth. Yet, in the preceding paragraph, the Rabbi says Christ "ONLY TAUGHT THE JEWISH TRADITION." One will certainly AGREE that the Jewish Tradition WILL NEVER PROMOTE GOD'S KINGDOM ON EARTH. According to their own testimony about THEMSELES, THEY have promoted ALL the Revolutions and wars of earth. The present situation in Palestine is an accurate picture of "incitement to murder" by Jews. The record of the Jews, in EVERY country, PROVES how little Judaism has done to ESTABLISH THE KINGDOM OF GOD ON EARTH.

Again, the Rabbi construes ISRAEL as meaning only Jews. This is a FALSE interpretation. The Bible ALWAYS refers to the "House of ISRAEL," (meaning White Anglo-Saxon people), and to the "House of Judah," of which the Jews were a part. Jews are never even mentioned in the Pentateuch (first five books of the Bible, and the Old Testament IS NOT A JEWISH BOOK) and Jews did not exist as such when the Pentateuch was written. Nor are Jews ever mentioned or named in the COVENANTS which God made with the HOUSE OF ISRAEL (who were Anglo-Saxons). Jews are only a REMNANT (the bad figs) of the HOUSE of JUDAH.

Christ did not come to set up a purely materialistic, pleasure-loving creature-comfort, mammon-worshipping religion, such as the Jews believe in. He said His Kingdom was NOT of this world: it is a SPIRITUAL KINGDOM IN THE HEARTS AND MINDS OF HIS PEOPLE: one which places the SPIRITUAL CONCEPT ahead of ANY materialistic concept. It is a Kingdom in which He DOES reign supreme, and ultimately it IS the sort of Kingdom of Righteousness which He WILL establish on EARTH. It is to block and prevent the setting up of such a Kingdom on Earth, that all the FORCES OF EVIL are fighting so desperately today.

Rabbi Steinberg says, "Judaism is jarred by the world-weariness Jesus displayed, His indifference to social affairs and day-by-day living, His absorption in life after death and in the Messianic Era." This statement contains untruth and MISrepresentation. Christ, by the record, was NOT indifferent to weddings, social affairs, to friendly gatherings: in fact, the opposite was true, because his ENEMIES (then, as now) falsely accused Him.

> "The Son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners." (St. Matt. 11:19)

He enjoyed life, and He wanted His followers to do likewise. His enemies were DISpleased because He DID seem to enjoy life and simple pleasures. Christ said: "I AM COME THAT YE MIGHT HAVE LIFE, AND HAVE IT MORE ABUNDANTLY. "I AM COME THAT YOUR JOY MIGHT BE MADE FULL. "BE OF GOOD CHEER, FOR I HAVE OVERCOME THE WORLD. "MY PEACE I GIVE UNTO YOU." The Apostle Peter said: "Thou hast made known to me the ways of LIFE: thou shalt make me FULL OF JOY with thy countenance." — So, He doesn't sound like a gloomy character, does He? Further, He was a LOVER OF NATURE, and spent much time in the open, by the sea, in the mountains.—And NEVER has a spiritual leader stressed more the necessity of incorporating one's beliefs INTO THE DAILY LIFE. "By their fruits, he shall know them." "Faith without works is dead."

So far as "world weariness" is concerned, what is the situation today? And what true disciple of Christ does not yearn for His just and righteous reign to be established on earth? WHO, today, (as in His time) is not utterly weary of the machinations of EVIL FORCES and EVIL MEN in the world, who seek to enslave the people and deprive them of everything which WOULD make life joyful and happy and free? WHO today is not utterly weary of the continued clamor of the JEWS for strictly selfish JEWISH desires and objectives? WHO is not weary of the strife and agitation which THEY stir up in ALL parts of the world, including America? WHO is not weary of their incessant emphasis on JEWISH rights and tender feelings, etc? As Prime Minister Attlee has said; when he grew weary of their clamor: "Are the JEWS the ONLY ones in the world who suffer hardship and vicissitudes?" One would think so: they turn the world upside down so that they might have that to which they have no rightful claim: Palestine.

In this connection, EVERY American who values life and liberty, should have a copy of THE PROTOCOLS OF THE LEARNED ELDERS OF ZION, and refer to it frequently for a clear understanding of the world program which is today being carried out. The JEWISH plot and plan of world domination (INTERNATIONALISM) is clearly set forth in all its details. For instance, in their Protocol No. 7, they state: "We must create ferments and hostility throughout Europe, and in other continents also." THIS THEY ARE DOING. You may obtain this book for 50¢ from WOMEN'S VOICE, 537 S. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.—Read also this author's, THE JEWISH PROTOCOLS and Their Application to Present Times (50¢): and JUDAIC-COMMUNISM versus CHRISTIAN-AMERICANISM ($1.00).

The Jew, Steinberg, accuses Jesus of ill-temper "when He denounced a fig tree for not yielding fruit to appease His hunger" . . . This ignorant Rabbi fails completely to understand the SYMBOLISM of Christ's curse, which He pronounced upon the fig tree, which is symbolical of JUDAH (Jews), BECAUSE THEY WERE NOT BRINGING FORTH FRUIT—meaning good works.

The Rabbi says Jesus instructed the Apostles not to give His message to NON-Jews. How inconsistent this Rabbi is. He says Jesus taught only the same sort of thing as the Jewish Tradition: nothing new or original. YET the Jews rejected Him AND his message and had Him crucified: while it is the Anglo-Saxon (Aryan) race—NON-Jews—who HAVE accepted His message, His sacrifice, and His Messiah-ship! Further, it is the White Anglo-Saxons who HAVE DONE THE WORKS: not the Jews.

The Rabbi goes on to say: "The very phrases of the Sermon on the Mount can be paralleled one by one from the Jewish devotional literature of His time." IF it is true that Jews believe in the PRINCIPLES laid down in the Sermon on the Mount, WHY THEN IS IT THAT THEY NEVER PRACTICE THEM? Why is THEIR doctrine (which includes that of COMMUNISM, by the Jew, Karl Marx) founded on HATE, VENGEANCE, VIOLENCE, ARMED RESISTANCE TO LAW AND ORDER, as exemplified by the REVOLUTIONS which they claim to have sponsored? And as carried out even now by their Underground organizations in Palestine, and unlawfully backed and promoted by JEWS and even some non-Jews, in America? Why does this Rabbi blame Christ for present world-conditions IF JEWRY CLAIMS TO HAVE BEEN TEACHING HIS SAME PHILOSOPHY (of LOVE) ALL THESE YEARS? Why does their Anti-Defamation League gestapo work incessantly and UNCONSTITUTIONALLY to put down and silence everyone who criticises or opposes them in any way? Are these actions Christ-like?

The TRUTH of the matter is that they OPPOSE and FIGHT His Gospel NOW as THEN: that is why they work so ardently to set up school after school in this country; organization after organization, and publication after publication, to SUBVERT Christian Americans to JUDAISM. Judaism is the antithesis of CHRISTIANITY and of AMERICANISM, as set up by our Founding Fathers.

The pro-Jew pro-Negro Cincinnati Post announces that an Institute on JUDAISM, of Christian Church Women, designed to 'interpret JUDAISM to NON-Jews' will be held beginning October 1st at Rockdale Avenue Temple (Jewish) under auspices of the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods. The beliefs, ritual and traditions of JUDAISM will be explained by three rabbis. WHY is it necessary or desirable for these supposed CHRISTIAN women to be instructed in JUDAISM? Why aren't the words, lives, and actions of JEWS sufficient to "interpret" their religion to the world: just as should also be true of the Christians?—This movement, which is nothing less than part of the nation-wide intensive campaign by JEWS to JUDAIZE America, is endorsed by Charles P. Taft, president of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ. This is about the sort of action one would expect from the president of that hybrid organization.—As stated and proved by this writer in many articles, JUDAISM is NOT AMERICANISM. All the emphasis is placed on JUDAIC education of our people, by these collaborators with JUDAISM, such as Dr. Everett R. Clinchy, president of National Conference of Christians and Jews.

The legally-discredited pro-Communist L. M. Birkhead and his Friends of Democracy (who sponsored smear-boy John Roy Carlson) work hand-in-glove with this phase of Jewish anti-Americanism. The Cincinnati Post of September 23d, 1947, states that Birkhead is to speak in this same Rockdale Temple, under auspices of Bnai Brith, and probably his subject will be: "Shall we jail the propagandists" who don't agree with the Jew-Communists? An affirmative answer would be in strict accord with the desire of Jew-Communists who sponsor Buckley Bill 2848 to FORBID anti-semitism, i. e., any criticism of Jews.

If this Buckley Bill had been law then, they would have imprisoned Christ, Paul, Peter, and ALL the apostles: and of course some of them DID suffer imprisonment for their outspokenness in proclaiming TRUTH. But Christ Himself was DESTROYED. "Then the Pharisees went out, and held a council AGAINST Him, how they might DESTROY Him." (St. Matthew 12:14).

Yet this Jewish Rabbi says Christ was "intemperate in his condemnation of the scribes and Pharisees:" just as there are those today who accuse me of the same thing, for the same reason. How do you suppose YOU would feel if someone wanted to imprison you or put you to death for expressing your inmost CONVICTIONS, in this supposedly FREE country? Would YOU think THEY were "intemperate?"

Christ, The MESSIAH, believed pre-eminently in FREEDOM of the INDIVIDUAL, under law and order. He CAME to FREE men from tyranny and oppression. He came to teach them the TRUTH that WOULD free them. Without freedom, life means nothing.

Was it any wonder that Christ was weary UNTO DEATH, with a RIGHTEOUS INDIGNATION, because of the Jews' HYPOCRISY, and their wickedness? He who is never able to work up a lather over EVIL, injustice, and hypocrisy, is UNWORTHY to BE a follower of the Christ. The Bible says, "Because ye are neither hot nor cold, I will spew you out."

And now, AGAIN, I want my readers to see the on-congruous, inconsistent, hypocritical attitude and actions of the Jews in this very same issue of Bnai Brith Messenger of October 3d, 1947. Here we have the arrogant Jewish Rabbi, Steinberg, giving his opinion—the JEWISH opinion —of the CHRISTIAN CHRIST, that Exalted Being whom America worships. He feels entirely FREE to express his own uncomplimentary opinion in uncensored language. BUT in that SAME issue of the SAME magazine, we have a picture of JEWISH leaders in Los Angeles exhibiting a petition containing the first 10,000 signatures, to PASS THE BUCKLEY BILL 2848, which would outlaw anti-semitism, and prevent ANY criticism of JEWS. These pictured persons represent the JEWISH People's Fraternal Order: the Emma Lazarus Division, AND the American Jewish LABOR Council. Passage of this Buckley Bill would make it IMPOSSIBLE for this writer to answer

Steinberg's article or to DEFEND THE CHRIST WHOM I FOLLOW.

While the FREEDOM TRAIN (about which the Jews yammer continually, so that THEY may have all the freedom THEY want) rolls across America, the JEWS work arduously to secure the passage of bills which would DESTROY OUR BILL OF RIGHTS: which would PREVENT and SILENCE FREE SPEECH AND FREE PRESS BY CHRISTIAN AMERICANS! They would go still further: they would IMPRISON and FINE Christian Americans who DO exercise their God-given RIGHTS of free speech and free press. Why don't those alleged CHRISTIANS, who are so interested in JUDAISM, get busy and organize to FIGHT the betrayal of their RIGHTS BY JEWS? These same Jews who pretend to be their friends!

Certainly, I regard as my enemy, anybody who attempts to deprive me of my fundamental American RIGHTS of free speech and free press. This is especially true when these very same people make use of these rights for the nefarious purpose of deriding the claims and attributes of the Founder of the CHRISTIAN religion.

Furthermore, I do not want people of this type and calibre of mind, to do MY thinking for me, and to decide what I can think and what I can say. THIS WRITER IS FIGHTING THAT TRUE FREEDOM MAY NOT PERISH FROM THE EARTH!

"INCITING TO MURDER"

Comes now Robert Young, who plays in the pro-Jewish anti-Christian moving picture, CROSSFIRE, and gives forth in it with a five-minute speech against anti-semitism: which speech has been made into a record, to be used to promote the same objective as this biased picture itself. This Robert Young is warmly endorsed in People's Daily World (Communist rag) dated September 24th, 1947, because of his desire to play in this type of pro-Jew pro-Negro picture. In other words, the sentiments which Young expresses and the side on which he has aligned himself, ARE THOSE ENDORSED BY THE JEW-COMMUNIST publications. And the Jew-Communist organizations and publications ALL endorse and promote "EQUALITY" (of the White and Colored races) and mongrelization.

Well, here is at least ONE fan that Robert Young has lost: anybody who is warmly endorsed by the subversive sheets, is not MY kind of American. Along this same line, in Bnai Brith Messenger of October 3, 1947, is a squib to the effect that "Charlie Chaplin is in a fighting mood . . . Intimates predict that at the hearing in Washington, D. C., he'll do to the Committee on UnAmerican Activities what Howard Hughes did to the Brewster Committee." This is only one of MANY complimentary references to Chaplin by means of which Jewish papers back HIM.

This writer seldom condescends to call any human being a LOUSE, but if that word were ever justified, it is in Chaplin's case. Who is this common ALIEN male street-walker, this pariah, this abetter and hobnobber with Communists, that HE dares to boast of discomfitting an authorized, duly-appointed committee of our Congress—whose business it is to protect decent American citizens against such as he? Long ago, he SHOULD have been deported from this too hospitable country, as an UNDESIRABLE ALIEN: and no doubt WOULD have been, if there were not those higher-ups who are in his same class.—The JEWISH papers only tip their hand when they come to the defense of such as he.

Robert Young is expansive and big-hearted: he says, "Get all his HATRED and BIGOTRY out in the open: let's TALK about it: that's the only way to lick it. We'll never get anywhere by whispering about race HATRED. Take the furor everybody raises when they found out CROSS-FIRE had the word 'Jew' in it. That's as taboo on the screen as "syphilis' was in the newspapers ten years ago."

In the first place, this writer is definitely fed up on the continual emotional Jew-Communist-inspired use of the words, "HATRED and BIGOTRY" as applied to all those who, WITHOUT RANCOR OR HATRED IN THEIR HEARTS, but only love for Christian America, DISCUSS THE JEWISH AND NEGRO QUESTIONS. All we are doing is telling the TRUTH about Jewish activities, and their own openly announced connection with America's deadly enemy, Communism, and we have just as much right to present OUR viewpoint as they have to present THEIRS.

We are fed up, too, on being accused of RACE HATRED —which is a lie—just because we uphold the Bible plan of separation of the Races. We are very tired of the vociferous Negro's claim that SEPARATION and SEGREGATION of the Negro is DISCRIMINATION and INJUSTICE against him: and that he is fully the equal of the WHITE in every way. This is NOT true: the NEGRO has in no way evolved to the status of the WHITE man, and all his claims to that effect will not make it so. HE should go back to his country of origin, and PROVE to the world that the Negro, left to his OWN resources, can build anything like a comparable civilization to that of the White man. He has never shown any such ability yet. In the meantime, we will stand on the Bible plan of separation and segregation of the White and Colored Races in America: we will stand for just treatment of the Negro, but NOT FOR THE FALSE CLAIM THAT HE IS THE EQUAL OF THE WHITE, nor entitled to FORCE himself upon, and into, all gatherings and activities of the Whites. —Is it better to STAND upon the DIVINE Laws of God: or to heed the raucous selfish unscientific and un-Scriptural DEMANDS and propaganda of these Minorities?

This propaganda is based upon a LIE. If it were not, there would not be so great and venomous HATRED toward us who expose the fallacy of this propaganda. Robert Young says to "get this whole subject OUT IN THE OPEN: and not whisper about it" etc. THAT is exactly what this writer, as well as some others, has been attempting to do: BUT THIS IS THE ONE THING MOST VIOLENTLY AND BITTERLY OPPOSED BY ORGANIZED JEWRY, and its gestapo, the Anti-Defamation League. It has the largest, most efficient, most highly-financed SECRET POLICE FORCE in the world (with possible exception of the Russian NKVD), for putting down ALL THOSE who attempt to discuss these controversial subjects openly and freely. Young is correct when he says that the word 'Jew' has been as taboo, for a subject of discussion, as 'syphilis' used to be. WHY? Because, as the Jews themselves have admitted in their Year Book of 1943-44, they made SECRET agreements with newspapers, film producers, and others, by means of which the latter were high-pressured, NEVER TO MENTION THE WORD 'JEW,' and most especially never to discuss anything which might be construed as derogatory to Jews.—So there is your answer, Mr. Young! It is only when, or because, they are able to get something on the screen which is entirely flattering to THEM, and derogatory to CHRISTIANS, that they graciously permit a pro-Jew picture to be made.

In the 50th Anniversary (very extravagant) number of Bnai Brith Messenger, Donald Oberdorfer, of Atlanta, Ga., had a long article extolling the multiple and varied activities of the Anti-Defamation League gestapo, in which he openly boasted of how this gestapo has succeeded in PUTTING DOWN ANY AND ALL DISCUSSION OR CRITICISM OF JEWS and their activities.—CHRISTIANS have NO organizations, no funds, no subsidized publications, to properly combat this UNAMERICAN pro-Jew anti-Christian activity on the part of the Jew HATE-mongers.

There is a humorous little squib in David Weissman's column, "Here's the Point" in Bnai Brith Messenger of September 26th, 1947. Writing about the FREEDOM TRAIN, he says, "That's one train that should not be single-tracked, BECAUSE FREEDOM IS A TWO-WAY PROPOSITION." Freedom for WHOM? Only Jews and Negroes? What about the rights of free speech, free thought, and free press for WHITE CHRISTIAN AMERICANS? This one-track train of JEWISH thought becomes very monotonous from OUR standpoint.

And so, right along this same one-track biased BIGOTED Jewish viewpoint, there is a venomous completely unfair article in The California JEWISH Voice, of September 26th, 1947, titled, WHAT MILITANT MEANS, by Benjamin R. Epstein, who is Acting National Director of the Jewish gestapo, Anti-Defamation League of Bnai Brith. "What does it mean to be militant? The Anti-Defamation League of Bnai Brith has its own interpretation." You bet your sweet life it has its own interpretation: which is that ALL methods, underhanded or otherwise, which the JEWS use, are O. K. The end justifies the means: which is also the slogan of Communism.

This article tells of the League's methods in 'silencing' the anti-semitic activity of Mr. Hunt Dietrich, of New York, who was merely distributing literature that told the TRUTH about Jewish activities. So the ADL accumulated 'documented' evidence against him, month after month: they got him fired from the National Institute of Arts and Letters, even though this man is an internationally-known sculptor of high repute. Then the League had him hailed into court on a charge of having disseminated defamatory material through the mail. When you tell the truth about Jewish activities, it is just naturally defamatory, scurrilous, and libelous. And so they use every avenue of approach to PREVENT CHRISTIAN AMERICANS FROM ENJOYING OUR "UNALIENABLE RIGHTS" under our Constitution—about which the Jews blabber so much. They are even demanding that, by legislative action, we be denied "second class mailing privileges: that the publishers of such material be required to print their names and designations."

So, in his article, Mr. Epstein says, "his release by a federal judge did NOT vindicate him one whit. The public, now aware of his true stature, SCORNS him." Epstein here reveals the TRUE Jewish nature. The Judge could not convict Mr. Dietrich of any crime, because he did not commit one: he was merely exercising his "unalienable rights:" but Epstein repudiates this vindication by a federal judge, and holds this innocent man up to public SCORN and VILLIFICATION.—What did you say about bringing this whole matter OUT INTO THE OPEN, Mr. Young? Would YOU be courageous enough to fight so deadly an enemy as the Jew, Mr. Young?

Mr. Epstein then goes on, in the same article, to similarly villify Mr. J. B. Stoner Jr., of Chattanooga, Tenn., who also has exposed certain facts regarding Jewish nature and activities. Epstein calls this young man "unstable, vicious, a crackpot, without stature." He criticises him because of his "lack of subtlety" which Epstein says induced the Christian-American anti-Jew Klu Klux Klan to repudiate Stone. BUT, as usual, the Jews are a bit inconsistent: they themselves are the most SUBTLE, DEVIOUS, UNDERHANDED of ALL people: and they will just as bitterly attack any one of us who do NOT hide behind anonymity: those of us who are bold and forthright. There is just no pleasing them, except one plays THEIR game, just as Robert Young and Robert Ryan are doing.—For instance, Jew-Communist John Roy Carlson, in his smear book, The Plotters, devotes three pages to me, and accuses me of being "one of the most outspoken Nationalists"—for which compliment I thank him. Certainly, nobody can accuse me of doing any WHISPERING about the beliefs which I hold.

How do these men reconcile the Jews' pretended championship of AMERICANISM and "unalienable rights" and "freedom as a two-way street" with the vicious attacks by such as Mr. Epstein and Rabbi Steinberg, as well as the unConstitutional FEPC laws originated, promulgated and sponsored by Jew-Communists: and with the absolutely UNCONSTITUTIONAL Federal gags on FREE Americans, introduced into Congress, such as Buckley Bill 2848? America today is largely a Country of the Jews, by the Jews, and FOR the Jews: and this is the basis on which they want to run the world.

Reverting to Mr. Epstein and his article as to what MILITANT means: he thoroughly discredits the word MILITANT as applied to Christian Americans, such as J. B. Stoner Jr. But who has ever known of a more MILITANT people than the JEWS, who themselves staunchly affirm that THEY are the greatest REVOLUTIONISTS of ALL time? For many quotations to this effect, from the writings of JEWS themselves, read my booklet, GOD MADE ME FREE (25¢). Here is just one, by Samuel Roth: "We come to the nations pretending to escape persecution: WE, the MOST DEADLY PERSECUTORS IN ALL THE WRETCHED ANNALS OF MAN . . . If you are in doubt, take a look at any Jew-ridden country in Europe." etc.

OR, take a look at Palestine. The Jews there do not "incite to murder" (as Epstein accuses Stoner): their Underground organizations actually COMMIT MURDER CONTINUOUSLY, killing many innocent people: all in the name of Race, religion, or their own nationalism. In other words, ANYTHING THEY DO IS ALRIGHT: but it is WICKED for anyone else to be "militant" on behalf of their own race, or their own country, or religion.

Epstein castigates Stoner because he says that Stoner advocates that Jews be eliminated from America by whatever means are available. "In other words, he was inciting to murder." Well, believe me, I've read PLENTY of inflammatory JEWISH literature (including their TALMUD) which incites to murder, of Christians. I recently received, through the mail, a Jewish HATE sheet, called The Shield, edited by a Samuel Esptein, in New York. It is strictly a REVOLUTIONARY propaganda sheet, on behalf of JEWS. It says that Jews should be ARMED and trained to use those arms. It quotes from sayings of the Jewish Underground organizations in Palestine — which frankly advocate MURDER of the BRITISH, or anyone else who opposes their taking over Palestine. I have never read more 'INCITING' literature, which was sent through the mails. So WHY should the ADL cite Mr. J. B. Stoner Jr. to the Department of Justice, for summary action against HIM; when THEY do exactly the IDENTICAL THING THEMSELVES? BUT the trouble is, the so-called Department of Justice is largely composed of Jews, and is biased in favor of Jews. It has never yet investigated or indicted a SINGLE JEW (citizens of this country) for unAmerican subversive activities: it probably never will.

This sheet, "The Shield," also contained propaganda by the Jewish-Palestine Underground organizations INCITING the purposeful propagation of Jew babies: which is being deliberately carried out by Jewish refugees, and is creating acute problems for those who have to care for and feed these people.

How CAN you swallow all this inconsistency, this BIAS, HATE and BIGOTRY, on the part of Jews, Messrs. Ryan and Young? I used to believe in the American sense of justice and FAIR PLAY: but if our people can swallow this kind of biased propaganda and action on the part of JEWS, and STILL pretend it is the JEWS who are getting a raw deal, then I must admit their thinking is too WARPED for me to follow.

Going back to the RACE question, here is what God has to say, in Deuteronomy 7: 6, 7—

> "For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God: the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto Himself, ABOVE ALL PEOPLE THAT ARE UPON THE FACE OF THE EARTH. The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people: for ye were the fewest of all people."

THIS HOLY PEOPLE OF GOD IS THE ANGLO-SAXON-CELTIC (White Christian) RACE, who form only about 10% of all the peoples of the world. It is NOT the Jewish race. Jews are not mentioned in this book of the Bible: nor are they "ISRAEL," as they falsely claim.—What is the matter with White Christian Americans, that they do not proudly CLAIM THEIR GOD-APPOINTED HERITAGE?

A CALL TO ACTION!

We Have Got To Clean House NOW.

AMERICA FOR AMERICANS, IN SPIRIT AND IN TRUTH

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Every newspaper, every patriotic organization, every legislator, every loyal American, should take up this cry. Every hour and every minute of every day, these TERMITES, boring from within, are working to betray us and to SCUTTLE AMERICA. We need less talk: MORE ACTION. "Should a man full of TALK be justified?" (Job 11:2) "Should he reason with unprofitable TALK? Or with speeches wherewith he can do no good?" (Job 15:3). We are a TALKING nation: when what we need now is ACTION. Tomorrow may be forever too late.

TIME GROWS VERY SHORT. Our Bible says, "No man knoweth the day nor the hour: but when everyone is crying PEACE, PEACE (as is Henry Wallace), THEN COMETH SUDDEN DESTRUCTION!" It will be more sudden and devastating than Pearl Harbor. Catastrophe stands knocking at the door.

We MUST rid America and our Administration of traitors, communists—ALIENS: both native-born and foreign-born traitors, whether they are Jew, Gentile, or Negro. They should be impeached, hung, or deported. All who are not for AMERICA FIRST, are against us. WE NEED ACTION NOW! Every other country has waited until it was TOO LATE. Every day, some treasonable traitorous act is being committed against our security, by those in position to do so. WHAT TRAITORS IN THE ADMINISTRATION ARE STILL SENDING OIL, WHEAT, STEEL, AUTOMOTIVE AND FARM MACHINERY TO OUR SELF-CONFESSED ENEMY — RUSSIA?? Not long ago, Mr. Truman said he "saw no harm" in sending heavy locomotives, and other machinery to Russia. (Remember the scrap iron for Japan?) Now, the Administration is GIVING AWAY OUR SHIPS. Yet high Army officials say our DEFENSE IS A HOLLOW SHELL! Many Russian divisions are massed just across narrow Bering Strait from ALASKA.

Alert war veterans in New Jersey are picketing and protesting the loading of ships for Russia with our vital materiel. This treason should be stopped by FORCE. These veterans rightly scorn the President's call for UMT and drafting them, under such conditions. Mothers of Sons, how do you sleep nights, with this sort of betrayal going on continually? Shall more Christian American boys perish—while traitors wax rich and fat, in our midst? Cowardice and indifference will not save these boys: only quick drastic ACTION can stave off utter ruin.

Mr. Truman's rubber-stamp (for Bernard M. Baruch) Administration has furnished no leadership for WHITE CHRISTIAN AMERICANS: his objectives have been those endorsed by Jew-Communist-Negro minorities: such as his "Civil Rights" program (drawn up by a hand-picked bunch of pro-Communists), which advocates invasion and abrogation of States' and individuals' rights. His Communistic F.E.P.C. program means a spy-ridden Police State.

Let's put ALL WHO WORK FOR RUSSIA'S INTERESTS ON A SHIP, AND SEND THEM THERE IMMEDIATELY, so they can work for PEACE in RUSSIA! Let's load THEM on Russian-bound ships instead of OUR RESOURCES. This includes Henry Wallace and his fellow-workers: as well as scientists such as Harlow Shapley, of Harvard University Observatory, who backs the ten convicted Hollywood subversives and who works to abolish the blessed Committee on UnAmerican Activities. I'd put unfrocked Leon Birkhead and his 'Friends of Democracy' on this same ship, together with European Alien, Kurt Singer: convicted Edward Barsky and his joint anti-fascist refugee committee: likewise Jas. H. Sheldon, of the New York sectarian spy league: as well as all of its officials and those active in the Jewish gestapo in the U.S.A.—the Anti-Defamation League. Probably our first export to Russia should be John L. Lewis.—And instead of hypocritically endeavoring to BAN the Klu Klux Klan—which stands bravely on the American Constitution, the Christian Bible, and White Christian Supremacy, I'd ask this fine organization to RIDE IN EVERY CITY AND EVERY HAMLET, UNTIL WE HAVE CLEANSED THIS COUNTRY OF SUBVERSIVE TRAITORS, native and alien.

When war comes (as it soon will), it will mean all the difference to us whether we have traitors and saboteurs in our midst, free to blow up vital plants and servives. WHY is the convicted Edward Barskey and his anti-fascist refugee committee STILL FREE TO CARRY ON THEIR SUBVERSION? WHY are Harry Bridges, the Alexander Bittelmans, and others of their ilk, who have been ordered deported, STILL IN OUR MIDST, and not even in jail?? After long delay, we are finally rid of the malefic Gerhardt Eislers.

From now on, we will have ONLY TWO CLASSES OF PEOPLE IN AMERICA: those who work to SAVE this Christian Republic: and those who work to SCUTTLE AMERICA. "The night cometh when no man can work." Let us deal with our enemies quickly. Even now, we will have to pay a heavy price for having tolerated EVIL in our midst for so long. WORK, while there is yet a little time. SHOW some love, zeal, and enthusiasm for our beloved country! The Christian Christ has said that these TARES (traitors, "children of the wicked one") shall be gathered together and burned in the fire in the last days." (St. Matt. 13: 30). These ARE the last days: they may be your last days unless you get busy.

Will you continue as 'sitting ducks' waiting to be sold into SLAVERY? Let's take into protective custody NOW such ALIEN REDS as Madame Joliet-Curie and other "scientists" who come to spy and betray. Let's place ALL doubtful, suspicious characters, as well as known, REDS in restricted areas, under guard, NOW, for our own protection. The FBI knows who these people are.

Every loyal citizen of this REPUBLIC has a solemn obligation to put aside ALL ELSE, and work for his Country. Only thus can he SAVE HIMSELF and his loved ones from deep misery and possible SLAVERY. You will never be able to carry out any of your life plans if this Country goes under Communistic totalitarian tyranny. IT IS TIME TO SHOW YOUR COLORS! A people without national spirit is dead and should be buried!

DON'T FORGET TO PRAY FOR AMERICA. The prayer of a righteous man availeth much.

AMERICA FOR AMERICANS, IN SPIRIT AND IN TRUTH!

O. K. the foregoing by signing your name and address, and forward to your legislators, newspaper editors, radio commentators, ministers, educators, and other leaders, before it is too late.

"SENATORS FOR EUROPE"

If, or when, BREAD LINES (such as they now have in Russia) form in the U.S.A. as a result of ERP (the Red alien-spawned 'Marshall Plan' for the benefit of FOREIGNERS, especially Communists: which will probably be administered by the same kind of people as was UNRRA), I hope that Arthur Vandenberg, "Senator for Europe," will be in that line.

I suggest that every poor, struggling family and bread-winner in America promptly appeal NOW to Senator Vandenberg personally for aid and for funds for their OWN families, so that they can meet the ever-rising cost of living. Senator Vandenberg is paid by American taxpayers: he has sworn a solemn oath to uphold and defend the Constitution of the USA and the welfare of the American people. I am not kidding when I say that every American family and every child in this country, should hold him personally responsible for throwing away BILLIONS of this Country's resources. ERP is HIS European baby and he has fought for it with the ferocity of a tiger. When ERP becomes only a maudlin BERP, and when the American people finally wake up to the enormity of how they have been SCUTTLED, let's remember Arthur Vandenberg—as well as Henry Morgenthau Jr., who gave our money plates to RUSSIA.—Very hard times are ahead for Americans (thanks to these two gentlemen, especially): and they had better 'trim their sails' accordingly.

Let's remember, too, that Utah's Senators, Arthur V. Watkins and Elbert D. Thomas (also "Senators for Europe") voted for this monstrous foreign "experiment" with American taxpayers' money. Of course, it was to be expected of Internationalist Elbert D. Thomas: but one did hope for more stamina and patriotism from Arthur V. Watkins.

PUSSYFOOTING PREACHERS

Why is it that most present-day alleged Christians (most especially ministers) have NO ZEAL, NO ENTHUSIASM, for the Cause of Christ, for FREEDOM, or for Christian America? Our Supreme Court and State Courts have ruled that this IS a Christian Republic.

We are living today in similar times as when the prophets of old thundered their bold courageous warnings to the people, who were about to be destroyed, because of their wickedness. These PROPHETS and APOSTLES, after that they had received the Holy Spirit from on high, were ENDUED with POWER, COURAGE, BOLDNESS. They were not timid, fearful, cowardly, soft-pedalers—like so many today, who have neither power nor courage: who have forgotten the Master's saying: "He that loseth his life for MY sake, shall find it." These MEN of old times were willing to LOSE their lives, or to be imprisoned, FOR HIS NAME'S SAKE. No man or woman CAN fight boldly who is continually worrying about what is going to happen to him or her, or who is afraid of what his neighbor will say. You have got to put your life in GOD'S hands, and THEN FIGHT FOR ALL YOU ARE WORTH, WITH BOLDNESS AND ENTHUSIASM, letting the chips fall where they may.

Would that Rev. Chas. E. Fuller, of Long Beach, Calif. (and many other preachers like him) would correct his own Biblical ignorance on the subject of Jews and Palestine. He says, "Christians should not hate Iraelites." Of COURSE, they shouldn't: White Christions ARE the TRUE Israelites: Jews are the "bad figs." Jews themselves, in all their literature, especially the Jewish TALMUD, proclaim their hatred for Christians. The Jewish TALMUD is the most anti-CHRISTIAN book in the world: just as the Christian Bible is the most anti-JEW.

Unfortunately, many of our ministers, like our Congressmen and politicians, are deadly afraid of the Jewish power of purse and persecution: so they keep silent on important truths. They, like the Disciples in the Garden of Gethsemane, sleep, while this Christian nation is betrayed. (Every minister and every American should read "OPEN LETTER TO CONGRESS" listed herein.) Right now, Radio Station KMPC, Hollywood, is being persecuted by the JEWISH Congress, who has appealed to Federal Communications Commission to revoke its license, because everything over this station is not slanted to JEWISH interests. Long ago, actual FREE SPEECH vanished in America: today only the most hardy dare exercise it.

After that America shall have been purged and cleansed of evil — evil people and evil ideologies — through sorrow, suffering, sacrifice—then "HE WHOSE RIGHT IT IS, SHALL RULE WITH A ROD OF IRON." The glory that WAS America's shall be re-established. Her light shall again shine forth. Old Glory will proudly wave over a people who are PROUD OF HER and her tradition. The most glorious possession of any FREE nation — the Divinely-inspired AMERICAN CONSTITUTION—will regain its rightful place in the minds and hearts of her people, who will truly evaluate its worth. The CHRISTIAN ideal—the Kingdom on Earth—will flower (as by first intent) in AMERICA.

THIS IS MY OWN, MY DEAR, AND NATIVE LAND

This is my own, my dear, and native Land.
This is the Promised Land of long ago,
To call the mystic Kingdom from the sky:
Establish it on this God-blessed Strand.

This is my own, my dear, and native Land,
Ordained to set a pattern in the world.
No foreign history or heritage
Can stir my soul as does American.

Betrayed ideals stab my heart with pain!
Her honor, glory, welfare, are my own.
She lives in me and I in her: each makes
The other what it has become: no gain

Except for both, in all sincerity.
Each answers for the vital part he plays:
For weal or woe, his fate is bound with hers,
Not only now, but through eternity!

In face of man-made menace: Nature's gales,
That seek to sink our Ship of State, let's pray
His Star may guide and guard America,
Until His Day of Righteousness prevails.

This is my own, my dear, and native Land:
Through life, or death, I'll wear no other Brand!

HAIL to the RED, WHITE and BLUE

Hail to the Red, White and Blue,
Mystic emblem of the true:
Symbol of our liberty,
Holy banner of the FREE!

Rally quickly round our flag;
Never for a moment lag.
Now's no time to doubt or falter,
Lest we too should wear a halter.

Hail to the Red, White and Blue!
How long she waves depends on YOU.
Will you write in scrolls of glory
All the worth of Freedom's story?

Now's no time to doubt or falter,
Lest we too should wear a halter.
FREE men always walk upright,
Facing ever toward the LIGHT.

DUE PROCESS IN WASHINGTON

If there is one thing above all others in our American way of life in which most thoughtful citizens take pride and in which they firmly believe, it is in the principles of civil rights enunciated in the first ten amendments to our Constitution. They were attached to the Constitution on the demand of the people of the thirteen colonies before they would accept the Constitution itself. They make up what is popularly called our Bill of Rights. Among these are a guarantee against being called to answer for an infamous crime except upon Grand Jury indictment, a promise of open trial by a jury of one's peers, the right to confront one's accusers in open court after having been previously informed of the nature and the cause of the accusations. We do not believe these fundamental rights are being observed today in Washington by the Congressional Committees investigating communism in the United States. Let us look at the record.

Two former high officials of the Government, and others, have been accused by Miss Elizabeth T. Bentley, herself a confessed former spy for the Communists, with having engaged in espionage during the war, with having violated their oaths of office, with having acted as unregistered agents of a foreign government. Did they learn of these charges of commission of infamous crimes through official channels, or on being called to answer an indictment? They did not. At least one first learned of Miss Bentley's testimony through a call from a newspaper reporter. They already had been broadcast to the world. How substantial are these charges?

Before appearing before the House Committee on Un-American Activities Miss Bentley testified before a Federal Grand Jury in New York City that was investigating wartime espionage activities. Presumably she gave the same testimony there that she did in Washington. Did the Grand Jury indict the men against whom she made the charges? It did not. Before appearing before the House Committee Miss Bentley also gave the same testimony before an executive session of the Senate sub-committee headed by Senator Ferguson that is conducting a parallel inquiry. Did they make public her testimony or allow her to give it in open hearing? They did not. Yet a day later Chairman Thomas of the House Committee calls her to the witness stand and lets her make the charges openly.

To grant Mr. Remington, Mr. Currie, Mr. White and others named by Miss Bentley an opportunity later to confront her in the Committee room and answer her charges does not rectify the basic wrong that has been done. Many will read, and perhaps believe, the charges but not the rebuttal. There is even no guarantee that these accused will ever have their day in court. Dr. Edward U. Condon was accused a year ago by the Thomas Committee of being "the weakest link in our atomic energy set-up" and he has yet to be given an opportunity to answer before the Committee.

There undoubtedly were, and still are, agents of the Soviet Government, and of other governments, in this country seeking information on military matters that is not available to them through official channels. They should be sought out, brought to trial and punished, if they are found guilty. There are legal ways of doing that, such as the Royal Commission used in Canada in investigating the leakage of information on atomic research. It conducted its hearings in private, weighed the evidence and only then made public the charges.

We have a precious heritage in this country of protection of the innocent against false accusation, of a fair trial even for the guilty. What price a few headlines if those rights are compromised or violated? A dubious security purchased by those means would be bought far too high.

CHALLENGE TO THE REPUBLICANS IN 1948

If the Republican Party had the courage and the patriotism to come out flatfootedly for an AMERICA FIRST program: leave all the radicals, communists and left-wingers to their "low-vaulted past:" nominate a genuine Christian AMERICAN — an honest, decent America-loving PATRIOT—who believes in the platform and the policies of our Founding Fathers, then the people of this Country would flock to its banner.

The hearts of our decent genuine American citizens are yearning, burning, for COURAGEOUS AMERICAN LEADERSHIP: not this cowardly "me-too" echo: they are tired of being pushed around in their own country by all sorts of isms and ALIENS: they are sick and tired of the shenanigans, hypocrisy, waste, and TREASON in Washington: they are plenty fed up with always being a tail to somebody else's kite.

What we MUST have in the White House during the next four critical years is CONCERN and ACTION, FOR AMERICA—FIRST, LAST and ALWAYS: else this country isn't going to survive as a FREE nation. We must have as President—for a change—a man of PRINCIPLE, moral courage, political cleanness: who stands up straight for America: who will not sell his soul in order to buy votes from the minorities. True Americans want some attention and interest devoted to THEIR welfare and that of their OWN country. We are fed up on being a catspaw for strictly JEWISH interests, either in Palestine OR America. We are definitely ANGRY over the HUGE amounts of the American taxpayers' money that is continually siphoned off to FOREIGN nations, for this, that and the other: with no adequate accounting or recompense to the American people.

We, the People, want to go back on the GOLD standard, and we want to have in OUR possession some GOLD pieces—not scraps of paper and promises—we are not interested in having ALL the gold buried in the ground at Fort Knox, or mortgaged to the House of Rothchild.

We, the People, want our kids taught to love and respect AMERICA, American ideals and institutions, (NOT UNESCO), and taught that this is the greatest and grandest country in ALL the world: that (up until lately) it has done more for its people than any other Government ever established on earth: as well as doing more for all other nations of earth.

We, the People, want the SKIDS PUT UNDER COMMUNISTS and the ALIEN philosophy of COMMUNISM, both in high and low places: and under all the subversive ALIEN isms being taught everywhere in this land today. We are tired of ALIEN Communists having the plums in our Administration.

WE WANT A REVIVAL OF AMERICANISM, Christian Americanism, and some REAL leaders who aren't afraid to BE Americans and to love their OWN Country. Unless we do have this enthusiastic revival of Americanism, of deep love and concern for the best country in all the earth, then we may as well hand it over to our enemies: in that case, they will TAKE it anyway. Half-hearted allegiance is NO ALLEGIANCE at all: the Lord said He will spew out the lukewarm. No "American" is worth his salt who doesn't love his country with a deep, heartwarming love.

Let "Harried Harry" Truman and 'Harry' A. Wallace (two peas in the same pod) represent organized minorities of Negroes, Jews, Communists, hybrids and malcontents: the REPUBLICANS should represent the UNorganized MAJORITY WHITE CHRISTIAN AMERICANS! It is time to call a halt on this "minority rule." It is always the militant MINORITY in Russia and Europe that destroys, divides, conquers, and rules. By this minority rule, every country inexorably disappears into the quicksands of Communism. Will America LEARN anything by observing this process in Europe? When OUR minorities succeed in passing laws to silence all criticism of their own subversive activities, then FREE America is dead.

It is the purpose of Buckley Bill 2848 (formerly Patterson 6897): of all State or Federal Fair Employment Practice (FEPC) laws: of the 'Civil Rights' program, to SILENCE CRITICISM and to set up a Federal nationwide bureaucratic snooping gestapo (just as exists in Russia) to SPY UPON THE PEOPLE, and to ENFORCE these discriminatory proposed laws AGAINST White Christian Americans, in favor of minorities. In every country, as is today being openly done in Czechoslavakia, the FIRST thing the Communists do is to LIQUIDATE White Christians. Christianity is their FIRST and greatest HATE.

The REPUBLICANS have the greatest opportunity of the ages to prove whether they are men or mice. If they too are MICE, then GOD SAVE US!

In a folder dated October 10th, 1946, titled, "AS ONE CHRISTIAN CONSTITUTIONAL AMERICAN TO MANY OTHERS," the writer said: "Only by returning to a representative Republican form of government: only by reverting to OUR Constitution and the Monroe Doctrine, to America for Americans, can we save this Republic! We repudiate 'liberal internationalism' (as advocated by Sen. Elbert D. Thomas, Harold Stassen, Arthur Vandenberg, Me-too Dewey), which drags us deeper into European and Asian troubles."—If this was prophetically true a year and a half ago, HOW MUCH MORE SO TODAY! This writer has steadfastly maintained that it is the INTERNATIONALIST who drags America down into WAR, DEBT, and CHAOS!

By MARILYN R. ALLEN, P. O. Box 2243, Salt Lake City, Utah. Feb. 22, 1948.

On Feb. 28th, 1948, at 6:30 p. m., Mrs. Martha (Robt. A.) Taft appeared on Albert L. Warner's MEET THE PRESS. In reply to a direct question on that subject, Mrs. Taft assented to the fact that she and her husband are Pro-Zionist: she believes that the displaced European Jews should be given a home in Palestine: that we should help the Jews: that since the U. N. voted for partition, WE should support that decision.—Probably the Tafts are ignorant of the very fine autonomous JEWISH Homeland already established solely for them, in Birobidjan, Russia.

Therefore, this writer will not vote for, nor back, Robt. A. Taft, nor anyone who definitely aligns himself with the ZIONIST Jews: with the unconstitutional U. N. or who is in favor of involving this nation in WAR to implement the unrighteous, illegal decision of the U. N. to take the ARABS' homeland away from them. Americans are tired of Jewism in the White House. The U. N., the ZIONISTS, and President Truman are responsible for the violent civil war raging in Palestine today: as well as for the present UNTENABLE position of the U. S. A. in this matter.

We must have as President a man whose Americanism is UNdiluted with political ZIONISM: such a man, for instance, as Sen. Harry F. Byrd, of Virginia: General Douglas MacArthur: or the very fine commentator, Henry J. Taylor, who exhibits more economic sense and pure Americanism in one of his 15-minute broadcasts than many of our Congressmen do in a lifetime.

Robert A. Taft's brother, Charles P. Taft, is President of the Federal Council of Churches in Cincinnati, Ohio: Chas. P. Taft, is one of the leading Jew-Negro MONGRELIZERS and collaborators in that city. Both brothers are close friends of the notorious ZIONIST, Rabbi Hillel Silver, of Cleveland, O. Rabbi Silver was one of those who exerted such great pressure to FORCE through the partition of Palestine.

I have copy of a religious pamphlet, THE MESSENGER, January 1948, which boasts of the fact that, "Our own Mrs. Chas. P. Taft, hearing that INDONESIA needed bicycles, bought ten of them, had them all repaired and delivered at the Dayton warehouse, from where they will be shipped." With all the crying, desperate need of many of our own people here at home, this sending of bicycles to INDONESIA only proves the silliness of this hysteria for FOREIGN nations, and ignores the fact that "Charity begins at home."

We cannot 'save Europe' with dollars or words: instead of actually saving the White Christian people of Europe, we have done nothing but betray them, beginning with the Jewish Rosenfelt regime. The day of saving freedom-loving White Christians in Europe has long gone by: millions of them are already dead. We fought Germany to rescue the JEWS: we have done NOTHING to rescue millions of White Christians, who have been mercilessly starved, raped and exterminated. The cruel pagan Bolshevik regime of the Kremlin recognizes and fears only power and force. They laugh gleefully as America is SCUTTLED, her military strength is NIL, her defences practically nil: and subversive minorities rule today in America. WE are rapidly being readied for the "take-over": it is not in the dim future.

If our people think their taxes are high NOW, let them wait until they begin to dig down into their jeans to pay for the Marshall Plan—which guarantees nothing except the SCUTTLING OF THE AMERICAN TAXPAYER! They are going to find out what genuine hardship and poverty are.

RAPE of FREEDOM
(Lidice — June 10, 1942)

In Memoriam

Helpless Nazi scapegoat—Lidice:
You represented Freedom at its best.
Peaceful, happy, free, your people lived:
Work and love and play your daily lot.

Trusted friends betrayed your country's trust:
Time was needed for their own defense.
Marching heinous hordes of bestial men
Blotted and effaced as best they could

Every trace of life and loveliness.
Pillage, razed, machine-gunned, murdered,
Lidice became a ghosted town:
Stamped indelibly on history's page.

Were it not for Hitler's vengeful hordes,
You would be a name upon a map:
Rather than a flaming torch to warn
Those who cherish Freedom's living breath.

Even if whole town's wiped out by those Who lust to rape man of his dearest prize:
Smug complacency too oft persists—
Long possession dulls appreciation.

Rise up, free men, everywhere:
Take your stand for God and man!
Freedom is for him who dares:
Not for cowards nor for sluggards.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

February 25th, 1948. The AFTERMATH: "Free men everywhere" did NOT rise up, either in America or elsewhere. Now the Russian Bolshevik Bear rapes not just one town, but the WHOLE STATE of little helpless Czechoslavakia. Next, Finland falls. LAST, and greatest prize of all—rich, indifferent, slothful AMERICA is on the agenda! She is too dumb to learn from history.

28-Prejudice Racial & Religious

How to Fight Discrimination

PUNISHMENT WITHOUT CRIME: What You Can Do About Prejudice. By S. Andhil Fineberg. New York: Doubleday & Co. 352 pp. $3.50.

By R. L. DUFFUS

ANY number of writers have argued that discrimination on racial or religious grounds is a bad thing. Dr. Fineberg agrees, but mere agreement would not justify another book. What does justify his book is his successful attempt to establish a technique for fighting discrimination. Good intentions are not enough and enthusiasm is not enough. We have to have, as he makes clear, common sense and skill. He wished to write, as he says, "a book which would discuss in detail the intricacies and perplexities of racial and religious prejudice * * * about the futility of easy generalizations and about the constant need to take concrete, practical steps on the way toward ultimate goals." Dr. Fineberg is the Community Service Director of the American Jewish Committee.

Prejudice, as anyone who gives the matter much thought must realize, is ignorance's big brother. It rests on defective information and faulty reasoning. Suppose, as Dr. Fineberg does, that a given person has a prejudice against a group. If "something praiseworthy" is done by a member of that group this person will consider it "the act of that individual." If a member of the group does something "objectionable" then "the prejudiced person extends the blame to all members of that group and becomes the more intolerant." To say that this doesn't make sense is no real answer. The real answer is to remove the ignorance on which the prejudice is founded. And this can't be done overnight.

We have to face facts. We cannot rely, Dr. Fineberg thinks, on a high-minded "public" that has no prejudices. There are "many publics." Practically all of them "believe that prejudice against their own group is utterly wrongful, but as yet only a small segment of humanity understands that all racial and religious prejudice is bad." The unprejudiced, found in all walks of life and all groups, must join hands. And they must be patient.

Naturally Dr. Fineberg supports the principles of the Fair Employment Practices Act. Yet he sees that the FEPC had to be preceded by an educational process and that education must continue. He reminds us that victims of discrimination must not make the same mistake that their opponents do and lump all members of other groups together. He believes that often the best treatment to give a rabble-rouser or preacher of hate is to ignore him.

Prejudice

IT is not surprising that racial and religious prejudice has been termed America's Number-One problem * * * In a very real sense the struggle for inter-group harmony and for better human relationships is the struggle to defend the American way of life. It is not the fate of someone else that is at stake here. It is our very own fates that are being decided.—S. Andhil Fineberg, in "Punishment Without Crime."

When discrimination leads to lawbreaking, Dr. Fineberg would treat it as such, punishing the offender as other lawbreakers are punished but not playing up the motive. For him the important fact is not that a member of some group has been abused but that a human being has been abused. When intolerance takes the form of statements made publicly or in a company of people Dr. Fineberg would use his judgment as to what to do. A person who is not incurably prejudiced may be influenced by a courteous remonstrance made in private, whereas a rebuke in the presence of others would anger him and strengthen his prejudice. Moreover, we must recognize that frustrations of various sorts sometimes drive people to "dangerous and destructive actions," and that this energy can perhaps be diverted into other channels. People working together in a common cause learn to respect each other.

Victims of prejudice can further their own cause, Dr. Fineberg believes, if they control their emotions and study how to influence others. In trying situations each one "has a splendid chance to demonstrate stability, character or poise on the part of at least one member of the disparaged group." "No minority group," the argument goes on, "can establish itself properly in a community if it creates the impression that it is a belligerent, unfriendly lot of self-seekers." Such a group, the author is convinced, must be concerned about the welfare of others. It must be a part of the whole community.

DR. FINEBERG devotes the latter part of his book to an examination of the techniques of cooperation — a far better word than tolerance, one would say. Schools, churches, government agencies, labor unions, employers, parents, writers—all have a part to play. The police can prevent violence before it ripens. Researchers can help us perfect community institutions, in which people meeting, working and talking together can forget their differences and emphasize what they have in common. These experiments have been tried, with success.

The whole drive of this excellent book is toward a more intelligent approach to democracy. As the author says, "In a very real sense the struggle [is one] to defend the American way of life." The emphasis is positive. The technique is more difficult than that of sitting in a chair and exercising "tolerance," but it is more rewarding.

Dr. Fineberg writes earnestly and interestingly. His case illustrations are good. One wishes he could have found some less clumsy word than "Victimian" for a person who is an object of unmerited discrimination. But he is possibly influenced by a minority group known as sociologists, who frequently think up clumsy words for familiar facts.

"People Working Together Learn to Respect Each Other."

The American Legion's Exposure of Hate Groups

Extension of Remarks of

Hon. Sidney R. Yates

of Illinois

in the

House of Representatives

Thursday, October 6, 1949

Not printed at Government expense

United States Government Printing Office, Washington : 1949

860767—31973

OF

HON. SIDNEY R. YATES

OF ILLINOIS

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report entitled "Subversive Activities of Hate Groups" of the Americanism commission, Department of Illinois of the American Legion:

The American public is becoming increasingly aware that there exist organizations which, under the guise of spreading the principles of Americanism, create discord and misunderstandings among all races, creeds, and colors, contrary to our basic democratic concepts. The American Legion membership has fought for a long time the dangerous and totalitarian precepts of the Communists and Communist front groups. During recent years, it has become aware of other types of anti-Democratic organizations. The Legion's exposure of these organizations has been a great factor in curbing the growth and, indeed, in some cases, putting out of business these potentially un-American organizations in the United States. It is our view that communism, fascism, socialism or any other form of totalitarianism cannot be countenanced by our membership which must fight these un-American activities.

At the Miami 1948 National Convention of the American Legion, two resolutions, in particular, were passed that form the basis and motivation of this report. These resolutions are quoted below:

"Resolution 264

"Whereas, for God and country, we have again assembled to renew our pledge of allegiance to the principles upon which the American Legion was founded, to consolidate the victories already won and to organize our resources for the battles still ahead; and

"Whereas, the events of the passing year have emphasized more than ever before those dangers to our liberty which spring to life during the slightest relaxation of that eternal and self-sacrificing vigilance which keeps men free: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the American Legion in national convention, assembled in Miami, Fla., October 18–21, 1948, That we again declare our undying allegiance to the faith of our fathers, the faith that founded a nation of free individuals creating and employing the powers of government only to make their freedom the more secure and their liberty the more desirable, a nation in legend and in fact the last great hope of a theretofore bewildered and enslaved humanity; be it further

"Resolved, That we propose to see to it that this last great hope of man be not lost either to enemies invading from without, or traitors corrupting from within; that this government of free men, by free men, and for the freedom of men shall not be lost either to those who would become tyrants for their own selfish interests or to those whose vulnerability to the songs of Utopia make them the easy prey of fascistic and communistic totalitarianisms; be it further

"Resolved, That we go forth from this convention to warn all those who believe in Americanism that in this hour of national peril, the time is later than we think; that their defense of the life they love must be prompt, thorough, united, and militant; that they and we, defending our Nation in its maturity, are not worthy of the trust given us if we do not pledge to the cause, as did those defending it in its infancy, our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor; be it further here and now highly

"Resolved, That we recognize the time of the battle as now, the place of the battle as here, and that we enter the fray in the firm determination that our zeal for Americanism shall be unmatched in degree by the fanaticism of its worst enemies, and that the ultimate victory shall certainly be ours, for God and country."

"Resolution 621

"Whereas it has been the policy of the American Legion, as part of its Americanism program, to condemn and oppose all forms of subversive activities, whether they be manifested by an appeal to racial hatreds and prejudices or by attempts to divide this Nation into industrial strife by agitating and fomenting trouble between capital and labor, and economic group against economic group; and

"Whereas communism is an ideology, a state of mind, a bundle of emotion, which has skillfully organized and developed, with many secret and conspiratorial aspects, to serve where required as a fifth column for the Government of Soviet Russia; and

"Whereas many Communists, Communist sympathizers, and their fellow travelers are reliably reported to have secured employment in confidential and key positions in public office, political and labor organizations, and particularly in the teaching profession in our schools and colleges; and

"Whereas subversive organizations and individuals are continuing their vicious campaigns of propaganda to disunite and divide the American people, setting class against class, race against race, and creed against creed; and

"Whereas these un-American forces are disrupting national unity in these critical postwar years, when victory on the home front and peace in the world are as important as was victory on the battle front; and

"Whereas some form of legitimate democratic action is necessary as a defense against Communist betrayal of our form of government and to insure the safety and security of our Nation: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled, That we call upon the people of our Nation to oppose this threat to American unity and urge our fellow citizens of all races, colors, and creeds to demonstrate that same spirit of cooperation that was evidenced by our armed forces on the battlefronts in our fight against aggression, bigotry, and intolerance, and fight every attempt of these un-American forces to destroy the fundamental principles of life, liberty, justice, and freedom guaranteed by our Constitution."

The American Legion has always stood for an Americanism based on the dignity and equality of all human beings and has been sternly vocal against false Americanism doctrines that attempt to foster religious, racial, or class hatred among the American people. The American Legion firmly believes that it has helped and can help further in the eradication of religious and racial strife in the United States by exposing to its membership and their families those organizations, groups, individuals, sometimes through publications, radio, and on public platforms, who seek to destroy a harmonious and democratic America.

Therefore, in this new 1949 report of the Americanism Commission Department of Illinois of the American Legion, we shall list and discuss many of the existing organizations whose purposes and techniques are contrary to the basic moral and legal values of American citizenship. We do this, strongly believing, that when the entire membership of the American Legion knows fully about these organizations, and individuals, it will not only not fall victim to them, but it will continue to expose the true character of these organizations and individuals to the entire American populations and individuals that foster racial and religious hatreds. The Department of Illinois, American Legion, has in other exposures emphasized and reiterated its opposition to the equally dangerous Communist groups in the United States. The same is true of the national organization.

After a careful study of the activities of many organizations, we have reached the conclusion that those listed below are inimical to the best interests of American democracy. These organizations are anti-American since they pit class against class, race against race, and creed against creed, and make appeals with varying degrees of emphasis—all with the purpose of creating chaos and disunity among our people.

Anglo-Saxon Federation, Haverhill, Mass., Howard Rand, leader.

The Anglo-Saxon Federation is a group which preaches the theory that they are the true descendants of Israel. They resort to anti-Catholicism and anti-Semitism. Operating under various names, the group has its counterpart in all of the English speaking countries. In the United States, it has chapters in Chicago, Dayton, Portland, Los Angeles, and Boston. The official publication of the Anglo-Saxon Federation is a monthly magazine called Destiny.

Christian Nationalist Crusade, Christian Nationalist Party, Patriotic Tract Society, St. Louis, Mo., Gerald L. K. Smith, leader.

Gerald L. K. Smith is probably the most vicious of the rabble-rousing and sensational hatemongers operating today. He has followers throughout the country, and his literature distribution has reached large proportions.

The Patriotic Tract Society is a paper organization that is used as a front for the distribution of this literature. The official publication of Smith's outfits is the Cross and the Flag. Typical of the false and dangerous doctrines that have appeared in this publication are the following excerpts from the May 1949, issue.

"We believe in the complete social and political segregation of the black and white races in America. * * *

"The danger to the white race comes from the aspirations of the Jewish race to dominate the world."

Citizens Protective League, New York, N. Y., Kurt Mertig, leader.

The Citizens Protective League has been a rallying point for Bund elements and native Fascists. On January 10, 1946, Mertig was arrested for unlawful assembly, and drew a sentence of 6 months in the workhouse and served his time. The Citizens Protective League was branded "subversive" by Attorney General Tom Clark in May 1948.

Constitutional Educational League, New York, N. Y., Joseph P. Kamp, leader.

The Constitutional Educational League's main activity is pamphleteering. Pamphlets issued by the group try to create religious hostility. In its accusations of "Communist infiltration," it makes malicious and irresponsible charges against responsible and respected groups and individuals who are working to strengthen and improve our democracy. The league is a personal vehicle of Kamp's which sells its pamphlets at profiteering prices in order to insure a good living for him.

Great Pyramid Club, Los Angeles, Calif., Ray and Sam Capt, leaders.

Among the leadership of this group are a number of former klansmen. Rev. Wesley Swift has been a regular speaker before this organization. Swift is a former klansman and a known rabble rouser. He has a reputation of being the west coast's most vicious hatemonger.

House of Prayer for All People, Denver, Colo., Rev. William L. Blessing, leader.

Blessing preaches the Anglo-Saxon Federation's type of religion, although he is not directly connected with the group. He is not only anti-Semitic, but frequently makes vitriolic attacks upon the Catholic Church. Blessing's official publication is called Showers of Blessing. A typical quote from his publication is the following taken from the May 13, 1949, issue:

"How much better off would we in this country be if Roman Catholicism were completely defeated—not a Roman Catholic left in the country?"

Judge Armstrong Foundation, Fort Worth, Tex., George W. Armstrong, leader.

The Judge Armstrong Foundation was set up to support financially those divisionist "nationalist" groups in which Armstrong was interested. Armstrong is an independently wealthy man, and has written several anti-Democratic pamphlets. In one of his pamphlets Armstrong urged the repeal of sections of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution "thereby limiting the franchise to the Nation's white Americans," another aspect of the "white supremacy" doctrine.

Ku Klux Klan (Association of Georgia Klans), Atlanta, Ga., Dr. Samuel Green, leader.

We have before us again the hooded secret order and its fiery cross. Its methods of intimidation and terrorism have long been the disgust and disdain of law-abiding citizens. Antimask laws have been passed in a number of southern States, in an attempt to curb the order. The Klan is, of course, not only anti-Negro, anti-Jewish, and anti-Catholic, but extends its cruel and inhuman activities against veterans. Recent indictments and resultant convictions of those guilty of these illegal acts are eagerly expected by all law-abiding and law-observing citizens.

Loyal American Group, Union, N. J., Conde McGinley, leader.

This organization was set up by McGinley for the purpose of promoting his hatemongering paper Common Sense. Numerous meetings have been held in New Jersey, at which some of the most poisonous literature published has been offered for sale. The Loyal American Group and Common Sense have been denounced by patriotic organizations and by official Catholic bodies. The official publication of this group is called Common Sense.

Lutheran Research Society, Detroit, Mich., Lawrence Reilly, leader.

The Lutheran Research Society is an independent venture and has no connection with the official Lutheran Synod, a respected organization. This society does not hold regular meetings but it has sponsored the appearance in Detroit of Don Lohbeck and Kenneth Goff, representatives of Gerald L. K. Smith. The official publication of this group is called Eleventh Hour.

National Blue Star Mothers, Philadelphia, Pa., Catherine V. Brown, leader.

A violently hatemongering group. It labels its critics as either "Jews" or "Reds." This group distributed masses of hate literature at the Democratic and Republican conventions held in Philadelphia in 1948. They tried to cause disturbances to focus attention on their activities. This group has recently been cited by the Attorney General's office as being subversive.

National Economic Council, New York, N. Y., Merwin K. Hart, leader.

Merwin K. Hart operates his National Economic Council with an aura of respectability. Recently, Hart abandoned his subtle innuendoes and showed his true character by resorting to anti-Semitic items in his publications and speeches. The official publication of this group is the Economic Council Letter.

National Renaissance Party, Beacon, N. Y., James H. Madole, leader.

The National Renaissance Party is a one-man paper antidemocratic organization. Madole is given to one-man crusades which have fancy titles, such as "The Animist Party," "National Renaissance Party," etc. He has made several attempts to unify the nationalist movement in the United States. The following are two of the published aims of this group:

1. "Nationalization of our people through an educational campaign among college, church, and labor groups."

2. "Termination of political bureaucracy and establishment of rule by the intellectual elite."

Nationalist Action League, Philadelphia, Pa., W. Henry MacFarland, Jr., leader.

The Nationalist Action League was recently set up by MacFarland, a Philadelphia extremist. It is a political action group, aimed at influencing voters and legislation. MacFarland works closely with such known rabble-rousers as Catherine V. Brown, of the National Blue Star Mothers, Gerald L. K. Smith, etc. The official publication of this group, National Progress, has, as of June 1, 1949, been consolidated with Common Sense, the official publication of the Loyal American group.

Organized Americans of German Ancestry, Chicago, Ill., Leonard Enders, leader.

A number of leaders of this group were former Bund members and key figures in the old pro-Nazi Einheitsfront. The ostensible purpose of the group is to weld all German-Americans together in order to form a powerful political bloc.

Original Southern Klans, Inc., Columbus, Ga., Alton E. Pate, leader.

A splinter Klan group which is openly anti-Negro, anti-Semitic, and anti-Catholic, and whose aim is the defense of white Protestant America. The official publication of this group is called the Klansman.

Pro-American Information Bureau, Hinckley, Ill., Andrew B. McAllister, leader.

The Pro-American Information Bureau is a clearing house for hate literature. McAllister has made several unsuccessful attempts to coordinate the hate groups and has held several conferences in Hinckley, attended by representatives of a number of these groups.

Protestant War Veterans of the United States, New York, N. Y., Edward James Smythe, leader.

A one-man paper organization, which publishes anti-Semitic and anti-Catholic leaflets and pamphlets. Apparently the funds solicited by Smythe through his organization are his sole source of income. He is a habitual drunkard with no ostensible means of support. In a recent brochure, published by this group, the following slogan was printed in bold type: "We stand opposed to racial and social equality."

Public Affairs Forum, Los Angeles, Calif., Earl Craig, leader.

A hate organization, which holds regular meetings. The gatherings of the forum are the rendezvous of a number of other notorious rabble-rousers and a distributing point for a great deal of hate literature.

Not only are there organizations which by their policies and techniques attempt to further disunity among the American people, but there are a number of publications that have no organizational affiliations which try to contribute to the same pernicious goal. Below are listed some of the more important of these publications (name, address, and editor):

American Digest, Americus, Ga., Dewey Taft.

Beacon Light Herald, Atascadero, Calif., William Kullgren.

Bible News Flashes, Faribault, Minn., William D. Herrstrom.

Boise Valley Herald, Middleton, Idaho, A. Boyd and I. W. Cornell.

Broom, San Diego, Calif., C. Leon DeAryan.

Christian Veterans Political Counsel, Chicago, Ill., Frederick Kister.

Dayton Independent, Dayton, Ohio, A. G. Silvey.

Defender, Wichita, Kans., Gerald B. Winrod.

Free Press, Redmond, Oreg., Syd D. Pierce.

Georgia Tribune, Columbus, Ga., "Parson" Jack Johnston.

Guildsman, Germantown, Ill., Edward A. Koch.

Kingdom Digest, Fort Worth, Tex., J. A. Lovell.

Malist, Meriden, Conn., Henry S. Sattler.

Methodist Challenge, Los Angeles, Calif., Robert P. Shuler.

Ohio Pioneer, Dayton, Ohio, Ohio Pioneer, Inc.

Prayer Circle Letter, Wichita, Kans., publisher, Gerald B. Winrod.

Truth and Liberty, Minneapolis, Minn., C. O. Stadaklev.

Williams' Intelligence Summary, Hollywood, Calif., Robert H. Williams.

The American Legion has on many occasions warned its membership of activities of some of the groups and publications listed above. Ever since the end of World War II the American Legion, Department of Illinois, has energetically gone on record every year in condemning all those organizations and publications which try to foster disunity in our country. Other sections of the Legion have opposed those groups similarly. For example, in January of 1949 the Legionnaire, official publication of the American Legion, Department of New York, warned its membership not to have anything to do with the publication Common Sense, the Union, N. J., paper published by Conde McGinley. The Legion publication referred to Common Sense as "a hate sheet," and said that Common Sense is "violently anti-Semitic and in direct conflict with the principles of the American Legion." In a recent issue, April-May 1949, of the Summary of Trends and Developments Exposing the Communist Conspiracy, published by the national Americanism commission, subcommittee on subversive activities, of the American Legion, a number of the organizations listed above were classified by this publication as subversive; for example, the National Blue Star Mothers of America and Original Southern Klans, Inc.

The chairman of Americanism commission of the American Legion, Department of Illinois, believes that it is the duty of every Americanism chairman of every post and that o. each liberty-loving American not only to familiarize himself with the contents of this report but to be responsible for the creation of positive Americanism programs on this subject throughout the year. This department invites post Americanism chairmen and other citizens to make use of its services in the creation of affirmative and effective Americanism programs in local communities. It is hoped that these programs will carry into effect American Legion mandates against those fostering religious hatreds, hate mongering, and rabble rousing as well as other mandates against those isms which place in peril our established institutions.

Chairman, Americanism Commission, Department of Illinois, American Legion.

MEMORANDUM

To: ADL Regional Offices

From: Arnold Forster

Date: February 27, 1950

Subject: Civil Rights Ordinance - Portland, Oregon

This is to advise you that, on February 21, 1950, the City of Portland, Oregon, adopted a Civil Rights ordinance. It is noteworthy that most of the Negroes residing in the State of Oregon live in Portland.

David Robinson, who took a leading role in obtaining the enactment of the ordinance, reports that the ordinance is the result of the cumulative effect of the distribution of large quantities of ADL literature over the years, the constant hammering away of the ADL program, the work of kindred organizations similarly motivated, such as the Urban League and the NAACP, and the work of the fine leadership of both men and women.

Attached hereto is the text of the ordinance which is based upon the model originally prepared by our Law Department.

Before the voting on the ordinance, the City Council of Portland, Oregon held a hearing on it which lasted for several hours. After those opposed to the ordinance, representing restaurants and hotel associations, had argued against it at some length, the Council listened for over two hours to a succession of representatives of every shade of political, religious, and social opinion, all supporting the ordinance. Thereafter, the mayor and all four commissioners joined in unanimously approving the ordinance.

ORDINANCE NO.

An Ordinance amending the Police Code by adding a new section relating to discrimination in certain places and by certain types of business on account of race, color, religion or national origin.

The City of Portland does ordain as follows:

Section 1. The Council finds that to further the objectives contained in the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of Oregon, and as an exercise of the police power of the City of Portland, provision should be made against discrimination on account of race, color or religion in public or quasi-public places; that in the interest of public health and as an exercise of the police power of the City such regulations should also extend to hospitals, ambulances, mortuaries, funeral conveyances and cemeteries; that civil rights of all persons within the police jurisdiction of the City should be safeguarded as provided herein; now, therefore, Article 27 of Ordinance No. 76339 (Police Code) hereby is amended by adding thereto a new section to be numbered, entitled and to read as follows:

Section 16-2703. PLACES OF PUBLIC ACCOMMODATION SHALL BE OPENED TO ALL PERSONS WITHOUT DISCRIMINATION BECAUSE OF RACE, COLOR, RELIGION, ANCESTRY OR NATIONAL ORIGIN. All persons within the police jurisdiction of the City of Portland shall be entitled to full and equal accommodation, advantages, facilities, and privileges in all places or businesses offering or holding out services or facilities to the general public, including but not limited to hotels, lodging houses and rooming houses as defined in the License and Business Code of the City of Portland, restaurants or other places where food or drink are offered to the public generally for consumption upon the premises, theaters or other places of amusement, public transportation carriers, public facilities in office buildings or other places open to the general public, retail stores, hospitals, ambulances, mortuaries, funeral conveyances and cemeteries. It shall be unlawful for the owner, lessee, manager, or proprietor of a place of business within the City offering or holding itself out as affording services or facilities to the general public including but not limited to the businesses mentioned in this section to discriminate against any person in such service or sale of privilege, facility or commodity on account of race, color, religion, ancestry or national origin.

THE MID-CENTURY SOUTH: LOOKING BOTH WAYS

Charles Horton Cooley, you remember, wrote a little classic called Life and the Student, which I have sometimes thought symbolized "Life and the Student at their Best." Tonight it seems likely that you may have "Life and the Professor at their best and their Worst" or words to that effect, in so far as the professor tries to be both dreamer and realist; tries to present current facts and normative perspective for the future; tries to liquidate prevailing pessimism with social morale for sure success; tries to combat sterile intellectualism with folk dynamics; tries to be more afraid of wrong judgments than of being labeled a liberal or non-liberal; envisages a peace where there is no peace, unity where there is no union; and posits a social relativity of time, region and process as unerring as ever was Einstein's relativity of time, place and motion.

Not long ago I heard of a little three year old boy, all mixed up in his play, and throwing his blocks all over the place. When his mother scolded him a little, he replied, "But, Mommie, I was angry." Then he threw his head back in a fine gesture of a great big belly laugh. Then I heard of another three year old who responded, "Watch out, I'm beginnin' to get mad." Well, if some of the things I put down in this "Looking Both Ways At The Mid-Century South" may give the impression that somebody is "angry" or may make everybody "mad", I am afraid there isn't very much we can laugh about except perhaps some of the things homo Americanus does, in the polarity of unreasonable extremes, but still characteristic of good old American human nature forever violently articulate in its tropism toward self-expression, freedom of speech, and challenge for every premise presented in every facet of our complex dilemma at this mid-century point.

And challenge is what we need for every assertion and every premise made in this discourse. Is it true? Is it all of the truth in realistic perspective to other truths? And is it nothing but the truth? If true, what of it? And if not true, what else is true? Are our implications and interpretations of current situations powerfully valid enough to form the basis of solid achievment? If so, how can we move on in unity and singleness of purpose and without over-weening fear? If not, what else if better?

My father, William P. Odum, who is still a good American in Georgia in his ninety-first year, reflecting something of his Irish and religious traits, has often been pretty positive in many of his assertions. For instance, he would say, "Any man who says he loves the Lord and hates the Negro is a liar and I'll tell him so." Then he would smile blandly and say, "At least, that's the say it seems to me;" now, what I am trying to say here, is presented as positively as I know how, but in the sense of "That's the way it seems to me" and how does it seem to you? And all along, we will keep asking whether what we say is seemly and true. And you will keep checking up to see if it is so. If our language is couched perhaps more in terms of "approach" than finality, remember that this is an academic gathering; that we do not know the answers; and that we must be willing to look at multiple and hidden meanings, through the liberalism of total perspectives, before we can arrive at enduring procedures. If someone says: if you mean if, why don't you say it; my answer is, "I do and I do, if you know what I mean."

There was another thing that my father said that seems relevant and symbolic of the folk-strength that we must continue to conserve on this earth. On his ninetieth birthday, with nearly all of the children and grandchildren gathered for the birthday dinner, I think some of us might have been afraid his dinner blessing would be a too long prayer, too full of feeling. But what he said was, in substance, " O Lord, we thank Thee for this country of ours with its freedom and opportunity and its Christian democracy. Help us to keep America so. Give us enough of Thy strength to guide us to the last day." And that was enough, but not too much, to be appropriate for all of us here and now, in the special decisions we must make in the widening and deepening dilemmas which come from within and without our own regional domain.

For it must be clear to all that the crises and problems of the South that are extra and distinctive from those of the other regions of the nation are not the figments of our imaginations nor primarily the fabric of our weaving. For even now there come requests for counsel and for judgment from national associations of American Universities; from State Departments of Education; from City Departments of Education; from universities, asking how shall we do this thing that is required of us? In addition to our consciousness of what must be done, and our conscience about what is not being done, the South is called upon day in and day out, year in and year out, to make new and important decisions; to abide by decisions made by others, to show cause why we should not adjust our bi-racial culture to the projected norms of the changing structure of a one-world society in conflict and travail. And besides, the impatient demands are for the present Southern generation to bear the burden, to pay the costs for past deficiencies, and show deeds meet for repentance for the sins of the fathers of all America unto the third and fourth generation of them that have gone before us. But let us not forget that it takes a stronger people to meet a greater crisis and that some have always had to carry the burden of what others have done and left undone. It is, then, wisdom and strength that we want more than bitterness and defeatism.

Now the "last day" reference to the need for strength for the profound tasks to which we must set our hands and seals at mid-century, would be the last long mile of 1999, from which vantage point, the end of the second half-century we need to ask: how will that which we are saying today and covenanting together to do tomorrow, look then? And can we afford a shorter time period or lesser maturity through which to envisage our prospects than so short a span as the second half of this century? But even that brief span is too long for a restless intellectual, and scientific leadership, endowing mass man with the vibrant tools of impatience, conflict and power. So, in the meantime, how do our beginnings in the first decade of the new half century look? And the second decade? And the third? And the fourth? And next steps, preview to still other next steps, how will they look? And how will some of the things we now say and do look in the light of what must be?

For we speak not just for today but for tomorrow and, fully understanding the total complex situation and its hazards, I propose that we underwrite and covenant together, in unity and integrity, with courage and faith, and without fear or favor to insure the accommodation and conversion of our Southern bi-racial civilization into a integrated multiple-cultured American democracy at its advanced best, providing for the integrity, rights, participation, opportunity, and cultural autonomy, of both the white and Negro people in the framework of the American Dream and in the regional setting of a Southern people more prosperous and happy, better integrated into the National fabric and contributing more to a greater America than we have ever done before.

And I propose that we shall achieve these ends adequately and more quickly than has ever been recorded in the annals of human society, provided we can attain Southern awakening and unity and can succeed in working out agenda for national and interregional cooperation and collective diplomacy, according to the rules of administrative and representative democracy, intercultural relationships, balance and equilibrium between voluntaristic and coercive pressures, according to the universal laws of cooperative and competitive processes of growth and stable progress.

Our appeal for unity is of several sorts; unity of the South and of the nation; unity of the white South; unity of the white and Negro South; and unity among the Negroes themselves - all in the search for working specifications more than for mere ideologies. And with unity we plead for understanding and sympathy - each unite of people trying to put itself in the place of the other. To this end we want the South to listen before protesting; we want the Nation to listen before attacking; we want the world to listen before generalizing. But we want us all to look more than listen, because our premises are more basic to achievement than to propaganda. And we want to look at the total conditions and specifications rather than to rationalize from a partial perspecitve. And we want to see the whole picture before we get too excited about a part of it.

But we shall not make the mistake of assuming the specifications are not difficult or that conditions are not extremely critical; for we know that our current dilemmas are such that, without wisdom, devotion, cooperation, compromise, and courage, we might lose this America of ours. And we know that such a loss would not come from any one-way hazard but from several. We must therefore comprehend our dilemmas and work out our specifications in relation to at least three main levels. First, what are the conditions and the situations inherent in a convulsively changing world society and America's role of leadership in it? Second, what are the conditions and the situatuions inherent in the changing South and its role in the new society? And, third, what are the conditions and the situations inherent in the changing national attitude toward the South's bi-racial culture and the federal government's coercive pressures? Within these three inseparable situations we find both the processes and products of our delemmas and the foundations of the future structure which we must build.

II.

First, then, how new and how different is the world at the mid-century and what has that got to do with the South's next fifty years of unprecedented growth and enrichment of its culture and integration into the national and world picture? Can we make the identification of the character of the new mores, and the answering of emergency questions about it, help us to insure adequate diagnosis and direction of the South's promise and prospect. For, from the East and West, from the North and South, and from all the hinterlands of this America; and from all the way-places of the earth where folk are articulate, men and women, elders and youth, mass and class come asking for answers to their troubled questionings about the complexity and dilemmas of this contemporary world of ours. And they want answers that satisfy. They not only want to know what we are and how we have come to be as we are, but they want to know what we may become tomorrow and how we shall go on from today. And they want somehow to understand the long succession of human strivings and achievements in some continuum which explains not only the ways in which we have come to now but in which also there is consistency enough to guide them well into the paths of the future.

In their searchings for truth and ways the people ask many specific questions. Why is it that there is so much doubt about survival? What is all this talk about fear and terror? Why do they tell us that the future of the human race will be decided in our life time or that we now live on borrowed time? Or that human society is well on the way to commit suicide? Why, in the most enlightened era of all mankind, is there so much darkness over the face of the earth? Why can't men learn to live together and resolve their differences? Why is it that in the most civilized communities on earth, men have the most jitters? Why are men in the upper brackets of culture and leadership so tired and discouraged? Why is it that often the profoundest expression of discouragement is found among the highest educated of the people?

More specifically, they ask why the dilemmas of race relations and the conflict of great moral ideologies cloud horizons and why the articulate aspirations of men exceed the capacity of any culture-economy yet devised to meet the needs. Why is it that science wants to substitute machines for men or study interplanetary life instead of human life on this earth? Why is it that the most intelligent and skilled men in the world devote their highest energies and abilities to means for destroying man? Why do men kill each other in multiplied ratios and why has the cost of killing a fighting man risen from seventy-five cents in Casear's day to $50,000 in western civilization? Why is it that production, the civilized index of rich living, is channelled into tragic dying? Why is it that men with the highest moral codes and ideology consent to the wholesome slaughter of masses of people in rationalized peace crusade? Why have the most "Christain" and humane people in the world sponsored "operation killer"? And why, just as man has achieved the miraculous and civilization has flowered into beauty and abundance, have men lost their faith or placed such low evaluation upon the spirit of man and his divine destiny?

Many writers have tried to answer these and many other questions. From among the historians, natural scientists, philosophers, and other scholars and writers, who have tried to diagnose contemporary civilization, the most common efforts have apparently been directed toward the understanding of society in terms of some continuum reflected in the rise and fall of civilizations. From among the social scientists and scholars who have sought the answers in terms of collective behaviour, the prevailing diagnosis seems to be in terms of the impact of science and technology upon culture and the resulting frustration and conflict arising from mass civilization sweeping away the moorings of tradition and norms of value and the lessening role of primary institutions. From among those who have preached from pulpit and press, the prevailing diagnosis has apparently been in terms of moral decay and the dulling of human aspiration and spititual faith.

Our first task, therefore, in the diagnosis of our own problem is to sense the nature and meaning of our current discontents and dilemmas in which science, technology and other forces have made our contemporary world so complex that it is hard to understand. In many ways it is a different and a new world with vast distance between the swift moving drama of current divilization and the slow journeyings of mankind in all earlier cultures and even in our own recent past. Yet, our world is still changing so rapidly that speed, bigness, technology, complexity and change appear to be the new masters, dominating the scene as they have never done before. There is, therefore, apparently a greater chasm of distance between the technological order of contemporary civilization and the folk-culture and capcaity of the people and their institutions than has hitherto been recorded. Yet, in spite of this unprecedented distance between technology and the folk, the restlessness and power of all the peoples, made articulate through science, communications, and intercultural ideologies, constitute perhaps the chief social dynamics of the time. Our world appears also to be a confused world lacking in focus of faith and purpose, bordering on despair and hysteria, in which doubts and fears for the total future and destiny of mankind appear as a central theme, perhaps for the first time. Our world, therefore, is fabricated of so many different levels and complexities of structure and function that it is not only difficult for the scientist to analyze and diagnose, but it is hard for the average individual to live in and for leadership to plan the way on.

This complex society of the world we live in may best be characterized by the term state civilization, as comprehending the total traits of the most advanced technological and organizational society in a continuum which has its genesis and constant growth and survival processes in the contrasting folk culture, symbol also of the close knit societal integration of all growing civilizations. The state civilization, symbolizing the secularization of the folk culture, is fabricated of five main threads so thoroughly interwoven in warp and woof as to make a clearly defined and powerful pattern of human relationships. The first is science, invention, and technology. The second is industrialization and urbanization. The third is intellectualism and cultural specialization. The fourth is centralization and power. The fifth is totalitarianism and the super-state society. Each of these is fabricated of still other weavings of multiple minor designs.

Interwoven with science, invention and technology are unprecedented achievement, with speed, technics, standardization. Interwoven with industry and urbanism are the machine economy, stratification, a new way of community living, an extraordinarily high standard of living, and great concentrations of art, drama, and wealth. Interwoven with intellectualism and cultural specialization are scientific humanism, the concept that the intellect is the supreme guide for living, the standard of living as a chief index of social values, and undreamed of contributions in creative art and literature, science for science's sake. Interwoven with centralization and power are bigness, concentration, corpocracy, organization, limitless production, efficiency like a miracle. Interwoven with totalitarianism and the super-state are coercion, regulation and secularization with power more relevant than liberty and with force as a living ideal. Needless to say, all these are inseparably related in an indescribably rich fabric of human achievement and constituting a continuum of interaction processes in the loom of societal development.

The state civilization is sequel to and an extension of the universal folk culture, the two constituting the main currents and levels of cultural development in the universal societal continuum from early folk society to late state society. The folk culture is also fabricated of a number of threads with their multiple qualities of interaction between the folk and nature, between the folk and their own cultural environment, and between the folk of one culture and of other cultures. First, the folk culture is identified with nature with reference to natural laws, time, climate, geographic environment, close to the soil. Folk culture is further characterized by primary relationships and institutions, kith and kin in ethnic relationships, and primary occupations. The folk culture conforms essentially to rural and religious institutional character reflecting primarily the solidarity of a moral order. It is essentially institutional, deriving its social character from societies that are small, isolated, reflecting love of liberty, locyalties, homogeneities of structure. The folk culture is closely knit, cohesive, non-organizational, with behaviour primarily spontaneous, personal, traditional, yet strongly integrated through its community of growth and moral order. The folk society is thus essentially in contrast to the state society, the one geared to nature and to ethnic and moral structure and the other to technology and to civil organization and specialized structure.

In contrast to the folk culture, where behaviour is characterized primarily by the folkways and mores, and by the solidarity of institutional character and sacred traditions, the state civilization is characterized primarily by the stateways and technicways and the consequent secularization of culture. In the folk culture there is gradualness of change with the usual corollary of culture lag, in which material progress seems to exceed cultural change, while in the state society ideological conceptualizations greatly accelerate change which then is followed by achievement lag in which the cultural and ideological specifications are in advance of material ways of achieving the specified ends.

Now, it is in the understanding and measurements of the processes of social change through the folkways and mores on the one hand, and the stateways and technicways on the other that the scientific study of contemporary society becomes realistic rather than through the mere cataloguing of the products of change brought about by such inventions and technological tools as the automobile, radio, television, other communication techniques and the revolutionary achievements of science, invention and technology. By the same token it will be through the utilization of the social technicways of social planning comprehending the organic survival values of the folk culture and matching the material technicways which evolve from technology, that the new directions of society may be effected, through balance and equilibrium between the folk culture and state civilization, rather than through mere moral imperatives or a moratorium on science, on the one hand, or through totalitarian directives, on the other.

Keeping in mind that both folk culture and state civilization are "ideal types" or mental constructs of which no known pure examples can be cited, and both of which occur in the social character of every society, we note that society changes from the folk culture to the state civilization when quick moving technological innovations exceed the slow developing traditional culture patterns and when the mode of mass behaviour is reflected in the secularization of culture within the framework of stateways and technicways which are in conflict with and subversive to the folkways and mores. Such a state civilization, flowering into its complex attainment of technology, industrialization, urbanization, intellectualism, cultural specialization, organization, centralization and power, tends to assume the nature of a technological order rather than a human society or a moral order the universal constant in all growing human societies. Inherent in such a technological order could be not only complexity as to accelerate antagonisms, conflict, derangement, breakdown and disintegration, but the capacity to weaken or destroy human society, through decay from non-use of cultural processes, from the exhausting and destructive power of science and technology, and from the assumption by the totalitarian state of the functions of all the other institutions which are the creators and creatures of the total healthy societal system. The decay of civilization, therefore, could reflect primarily, not cyclical inevitability but, on the one hand, the failure to conserve the growth and survival values of the folk culture, and on the other hand, the burden of demands of supertechnology and artificial society which exceed the capacity of the people and their resources and institutions. The crisis of contemporary society is reflected in two ways: on the one hand in continuing and accelerated trends now universally characterized as hazardous; and on the other in an apparent possibility of an alternative future direction in societal evolution which would achieve balance and equilibrium between the folk culture and the state civilization through the maturing services of science and social science in the framework of sound social planning. Inherent in such societal planning, in addition to the time quality and long time priority schedules; skills and expertness, specifications and integration, are research and the discovery, through comparative folk sociology, of the folk culture to be recaptured and reintroduced into the streamflow of civilization.

III.

Now the South, rich in its folk potentials, finds itself in fullfledged participation in contemporary state civilization with the same hazards of adjustment that all peoples have but with many special facets different from the other regions of the United States; and, due to its organic membership in the union of states, its problems are technically different from those of separate nationals or independent peoples' cultures; and due to the long and complex heritage of bi-racial culture, its conflicts and tensions are somewhat different from the conflicting ideologies of many world cultures, the resolving of which Northrop has estimated to be the crucial problem of this age. But there is one over-all way in which the South's situation is not different and that is in the fact that the sweep of time and technology has so made a new world that the radically different bases and directions of human behaviour require radical new adjustments and outmode isolationism and secession from the rest of the world. The South has little choice in determining the nature and tempo of pressures, communications, and impacts made upon it.

It comes to pass, therefore, that the social technicways of societal planning are powerfully relevant to the ongoings of our cultural and economic development, American style. Debate and argument, satire and caricature on the folkways and mores, or on superior and inferior races must be transcended by dynamics of arrangement and program. In particular, the South has a double portion of what we have identified as "achievement lag", due to the over-reach of ideologies and the consequent moral directives and coercive pressures often projected in the framework of vested frustration. For no culture economy or organization control has yet been devised capable of containing the ideological floodwaters of Winter downpour and Spring cloudbursts following in the wake of cold fronts and high pressure areas of irresponsible agitation for the quick equalization of all differentials of time, place, and process, with no retaining dykes of classification structures nor reservoirs of cumulative standards, covenants and agreements, comprehensive knowledge and administrative guaranties and integrity. The South might be likened to the Oklahoma of an old timer who, when asked if the wind blew like this all the time, replied, "Oh no, sometimes it blows from the North."

But the South, even at its stormiest periods of throwing up sandbags for temporary defense, is not altogether different from the rest of the country in its manifestation of excessive zeal whether in the orgies of seven league boots hot headed talkers or seven million mass man concentrate in New York shouting hosannas to an old man returning from the wars of "Operation Killer." All these, including the Rankins and McCarthys, are normal part and parcel of the powerful adjustment process as well as the hazards of survival and we take them in our democratic stride as we always have in America.

Now, since the South's adjustment to the industrial and technological demands of the new age tend to be equal or above the rate of the rest of the nation, as is the case with general overall advancement, it must be clear that our chief concern is in the mastery of our bi-racial culture, made imperative (1) because it is right; (2) because it is inevitable if we are to make history and meet destiny as a strong young people; and (3) because the nation and the courts, of which we are a democratic part, require it.

It is in the nature of our mastery, the specifications of our achievement, the tempo of our process and the soundness of our structure that the South and the Nation are to be tested in the crucibles of that destiny and the perpetuation and expansion of what this America has gained for the world.

Here are some of the facets of the Southern situation which are fundamental to the new history and destiny which we make, geared to a titanic struggle for balance and equilibrium and for the resolving of powerful and sacred differences for which the whole world works and prays. And here is laboratory for peace and permanence as concrete and critical as ever were Palestine and Pakistan, Arabia and Asia, Kremlin and Korea.

First in the southern situation is the cumulative racial and conflict heritage that has gone into the architecture of all cultures, whether in the bi-racial South or in India, in Pakistan, in China, in all the way-places of Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and in uncounted little culture islands of the Pacific; and in counted big nations and little democracies of the western world. This heritage, which is basic to conflict and war, is also the very heart of group loyalities, patriotism and institutional solidarity, symbolic of the universal formula by which men covenant "for God, for country and for home." The Southern culture structure rates the same diagnosis as any other.

In the Southern situation is the same cumulative heritage which leads India's powerful Nehru, as late as yesterday and in tomorrow's news, to beg for the preservation of world peace and world order with hope and faith, but with an appeal for character and patience. But he adds, "Anyway we can't have it suddenly or by decree. One has to grow up to it;"and again, in what he terms "an unbelievable varied world", he protests the quick "imposition of any form of foreign domination against the will of the people", on the structural grounds that "no solution which is not accepted by large masses of the people can have any possible enduring quality." Nor would Nehru relish the stereotype designation of being caricatured as a "gradualist", outmoded echo of superficial rationalization.

But the Southern heritage is more specific with reference to the main conflicts involved in the issues of equality and segregation; and this heritage is different from that of autonomous nations in two main ways. In the first place, in the South the heritage of slavery set the incidence for the patterns of caste and white supremacy. Slavery, however, was later abolished in a conflict of brothers stranger than fiction in which the South lost once and for all the physical and political foundations for its exclusive bi-racial structure. By the same token, then, remaining as a major region in a powerful democratic federation of states, the South is not free to decide those aspects of its bi-racial structure primarily bounded by constitutional guaranties and supported by public funds in the framework of free institutions. Agenda for collective negotiations between the nation and the South as a major region, therefore, must be projected on the informal voluntaristic levels such as those of arbitration procedures in other domestic disputes, rather than on formal diplomatic levels.

From the cumulative heritage of the South there has grown up a powerful backlog of both liabilities and hazards and of limited assets. The liabilities are primarily of five sorts. One is the unenviable record of injustice, inequalities, and brutality. Another is the collective mental and moral concept of the Negro as rating something less than human parity in Southern culture, a powerful construct that not only colors and explains nearly all of the South's deviate behaviour in inter-racial relationships but sometimes appears as well nigh indestructible. A third, following as a sort of corollary, assumes that "The South" is the "White South", a usage that ignores the Negro both by default and by intent. Still a fourth follows logically and that is the white South's lack of understanding and sympathy with the achievements of the Negro and their reasonable expectations and demands. Finally, the South's sensitiveness to outside criticism and its resistance to Federal direction and moral directives has continuously been revivified by pressures and propaganda.

The South's heritage also includes an extraordinary record of change and of advancement in nearly all of the facets of modern civilization. The fact that we are concerned in this discourse primarily with those aspects of change that have to do with our bi-racial civilization does not mean that this is the whole structural problem but it does imply that we have to master this situation before we can go on to any satisfacotry achievements in the quality and integration of the Southern and the National culture at their best. Yet, in this area of inter-racial relations we have achieved both absolute and relative change beyond the highest expectations of such saints as Mary White Ovington and Oswald Garrison Villard in the sense of going further and sooner in many aspects of life than they anticipated. I might illustrate in a personal instance. In the early part of this first half of the century which we celebrate, I had written Social and Mental Traits of the Negro. Professor E.R.A.Seligman, notable economist and philanthropist, and leader in inter-cultural relations, was Chairman of a committee which awarded this manuscript the Grant Squires prize as the best published sociological treatise in the five year period. Yet no University Press, not even in the South, would publish this book today because of its assumptions of segragation as a permanent pattern of social structure. This might well reflect the fact that in education, in politics, in transportation, in ideologies and other aspects of regional culture, measured by both quantity and quality indices, the societal profile is scarcely recognizable as compared with the beginning of the Century.

In particular, I suppose there would be no contesting the verdict that the Negro in the South has achieved the greatest progress in the shortest span of years that has ever been recorded in the history of cultures. And still more particularly the spectacle of many Southern Negro leaders achieving distinction, influence, character, and role, equal and often superior to many of their white contemporaries, reflects an epoch which history and biography must surely record as phenomenal. And still more particularly, the number and records of Negro educators and scientists in the fields of the humanities, the social sciences, and the natural sciences, adds up to an extraordianry total providing not only actual contributions of note but leverage for greater future achievements. In the total fabric of Southern bi-racial culture the Negro's weaving of warp and woof shows a distinctive pattern of patience, persistence, plodding, alongside the more colorful exploits of exceptional individuals. Finally, the Negro's total culture operating as a folk society within the state society of the white South has insured a continuum of stable and advanced cultural evolution that reflects both powerful survival values and societal process.

Now, to return to our heritage of liabilities, and with special reference to brutalities and gross injustices, there can be no possible justification of any of it and nothing can prevent those communities that encourage such practices from suffering the consequences in spiritual and business bankruptcy in the long run. The appeal is for every community to see that a minority of its members are neither encouraged nor allowed to assess such penalties upon them, for our record of brutality is a disgrace to any culture anywhere, any time.

There are several ways in which such community penalties are incurred. One is, of course, the mob and mob spirit - something that the South is rapidly liquidating as a main trait of its collective behaviour and something that the South has learned the hard way is costly beyond reason. Another is the brutality and treatment which a minority of police forces accord the Negro. Besides being inexcusable, this especially undermines the integrity of the South both because most people are not aware of it and because all over the South the movement for a fine police service is reaping substantial results. But even so there is no justification for the extent of such brutality either because of lack of community conscience or community action. This is a big job to be done with relatively little cost as compared with the phenomenal results to be achieved.

Another area is that of injustices and exploitation in the community, too often reflected in the minor courts and civil rulings with reference to the Negro. In community life this is reflected in discrimination and exploitation in prices and wages, in housing and community services and in lack of respect for personality.

Now turning again to the more constructive side and to the urgency of making the right decisions and undertaking the right actions immediately, in so far as the total situation may be characterized in terms of tasks to be undertaken there appear to be four main segments or levels calling for mature and quick action on a statesmanlike bases.

The first is to remedy the inexcusable situation with reference to brutalities, injustices, inequalities, and discrimination to which we have referred.

The second is to set up what would currently be designated as "Operation Equal Opportunity" to comprehend all phases of public education.

The third is to provide immediately for non-segregation in all university education on the graduate and professional level.

The fourth is to move judiciously but speedily toward agenda for negotiations and specifications for future achievement on the total front.

With reference to the monumental task of equalizing facilities for education, this is a big job challenging not only the will, strength and capacity of a strong people but the cooperation, judicial interpretation, and constitutional structure of the nation. The reconstruction of our educational facilities, including buildings, equipment, salaries, and administrative features, involves an extraordinary multibillion dollar industry, which, operated at its best, will enrich the South, develop its resources, raise its standards of work, income, and living. This done adequately will not only make the South prosperous beyond previous measure but will enable it through its increased prosperity to pay for its new investments and contribute powerfully in turn to the national wealth. But in turn there can be no doubt of the nation's obligation to share this investment both because of the Federal strategy of equalization of funds and reciprocal cooperation with states and regions but because of the Federal ruling which makes mandatory the South's rebuilding of its educational structure.

Now the South's part of the initial added increment for the reconstruction of its educational facilities, in terms of what specifications can be made available and of authorizations and priorities, would be no more than the first expenditure for the first atomic bomb and a small ratio of subsequent such expenditures. The South would surely ridicule the challenge that it could not appropriate two billion dollars for an investment which would net many billions of dollars in the future and contribute powerfully to conservation and development of its human and institutional resources, as well.

For there is here a tremendous difference between the two types of investment in that these new expenditures will be powerfully productive and constructively geared to the developement and wise use of resources in the increase of wealth and prosperity and the enrichment of people and institutions as opposed to the negative or destructive nature of atomic warfare. Instead, therefore, of doubts and fears, so far as fiscal capacities go, the "Operation Equal Opportunity" is something to challenge not only capacities but enthusiasm for the future. Such a raising of standards and doubling of facilities in a brilliant transitional period of our own reconstruction, will provide the structure and facilities, equitably distributed according to local geographic areas and administered through procedures consistent with educational standards, through which the problems of segregation may ultimately be adjusted in the American way of balance and equilibrium between voluntaristic effort and coercive decree; between compromise and inflexibility, as has been the prevailing mode of American democracy from the first.

The above agenda for equalizing educational opportunities applies to all levels of schooling and assumes the normal status and processes of segregation and non segregation consistent with the development and administration of educational systems everywhere. It assumes a certain inevitable continuity of the sub system featuring primarily segragation in the public schools but with both non segragation and segregation modes and privileges in institutions of higher learning. This is necessary to insure equality of opportunity for the extraordinary Negro institutions, teachers, students, and administrative officers in ways which will give maximum recognition and opportunity for Negro professional folk and students.

Now in the case of graduate and professional education the situation is both practically and judiciously relatively clear. In the first place the court rulings are increasingly unanimous and the South not only has no intention of not abiding by the equitable laws of the land but will take pride in achieving the best possible accommodation in conforming with the best traditions of fairness and sympathy. It must be clear, as I have often pointed out, that up to now the South has had no American universities but Southern universities in so far as the color of a man's skin would preclude him from receiving either instruction in the highest brackets of graduate and professional work or an honorary degree for cause of notable achievement or service. And it is not only from the Supreme Court but from the American associations of professional schools and universities that requirements are being imposed for validating the highest standards of graduates and professional instruction. That this is a structurally different situation from elementary and secondary schools, in the framework of America's private, religious, and public school system will be as manifest to the courts as it is to the executive and legislative units of government and to the practical administrative constituency of American education.

IV.

Now we come to our most definitive and difficult task, namely, the problem of providing agenda basic to the statesmanlike collective diplomacy through which region and nation may work together for the desired ends. I think Mr. Justice Brandis back in the 1930's had in mind this task of the integration and enrichment of the Negroes in the national fabric and the resolving of primary conflicts when, upon receiving an early copy of Southern Regions, he wrote offering his congratulations and best wishes, for what he designated "The first step in grappling with our most serious problem." Here again, we must keep asking the question whether what we are saying is true and is so what of it: and what else, besides is true, and how from the interrelations and perspectives of these truths, we may come to matured conclusions and right actions. For then it must be clear that we must be vigorously critical and honest in facing facts, raising questions, urging integrity and trying new ways geared more to enduring strategies of cultural excellence and democratic structure than to excessive zeal and unbalanced directives.

To begin, three major crucial points of emphasis loom large. First is the importance to the United States of not allowing world crisis and war scare either to obscure our obligations or warp our strategy to work harder than ever on our demestic situations, basic both to advancement and survival, or to reconstruction in case of catastrophe.

The second point of view is the importance, in the processes of resolving our bitterest conflicts, or utilizing peaceful methods of negotiation and understanding rather than challenge to conflict and the teaching of hate. Threats, name calling, hate mongering, inflexible dogmas and the imposition of coercive decrees, are no more defensible nor less disastrous in America than in the world of international tensions. It is true that any record of undemocratic practices will affect our influence abroad; but it is equally true that whether we achieve our advances by peaceful means of by violence and bloodshed, is equally important in a world-leading nation urging universal peace.

The third point of emphasis is that we are assuming not only that this accommodation and conversion of bi-racial civilization to a richer, integrated American culture can be done and that people everywhere want to know the best way to do it. This does not mean that we are so simple minded as not to understand the hazards involved. Stuart Chase in his forthcoming volume, Roads to Agreement, which I have reviewed for the Saturday Review of Literature for May 12, catalogues eighteen levels of conflict and firm principles of agreement for the resolving of differences. Yet few, if any of the experimental techniques recommended are utilized in the current conflict of ideologies and policies with reference to segregation which has become the sine qua non of all negotiations. And yet the United States, of all peoples, has built its democratic structure on the foundations of voluntaristic negotiations and freedom of discussions in the framework of administrative, legislative, and judicial procedures. What then, in addition to the heritage of liabilities which we have catalogued for the South, are obstacles and hazards in the way?

Our first and major task is a neglected one, namely the working out of agenda for programs of agreement and action on the part of the South and of the nation. These agenda are of two sorts, conforming to the American principles of balance and equilibrium between the voluntaristic effort and coercive mandates. One is on the level of negotiation between regional and national voluntary agencies, and their deputies, functioning in the field of interracial policies and practices. The other is on the level of official governmental commissions for research and negotiations between regional and federal agencies looking toward the achievement of equality of opportunity and fair practices. Here the assumption seems reasonable that our domestic conflicts merit the same sort of mature and extended peaceful negotiations that are accorded problems of international tensions and differences.

Our covenanting together to face facts, perspective, and responsibilities, challenges scrutiny of our total situation and dilemmas in the national picture. A little while ago we gave a typical American dinner honoring the Nobel Peace Prize winner with nearly 2000 guests from all regions of the nation and from many hinterlands of the mores. And from the mementum of this occasion emerged contributions of approximately a quarter million dollars as pace maker for a much larger sum, a part of which is to be devoted to procedures which will make the bitterness and conflict between Palestine and Arabia look like yesterday. Is the bitter drive for Federal coercive measures to eliminate segregation in the most difficult situations, say, in South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, really worthy of American standards of peace negotiations? Is it expecting too much for a really great leader like Ralph Bunche, to experiment with the same sort of diplomacy which justly earned his acclaim in the area of regional national conflict instead of name calling, bigotry accusing, guilt by association techniques now so conventional in America. On the other hand, is it expecting too much of Jimmy Byrnes, rich in years and experience and in opportunity and influence to utilize the best that he gleaned from his international diplomacy rather than to project threats and fan the flames of bitterness, in a surrender of the cause of millions of our children's children who have the right to expect opportunity commensurate with their heritage and capacities.

In the pressure propaganda for achieving the desired ends of societal conversion there are dangers inherent in the lack of integrity of purpose and method, in the partisan political balance of power, and in the advocacy to endanger the organic vitality of the nation through major operations for temporary eruptions. If there are those who hold that the South, having too many people of both races anyway, would profit by a certain amount of violent revolution, and slaughter of the people, as I have heard prominent metropolitan leaders say, that might be a democratic prerequisite; but to urge the Supreme Court to set the incidence of such a conflict is something else. To boast that one is not interested in the millions of Negroes as persons or in their present welfare but only in winning a cause; or, around cocktails to chuckle over the panic of the folk in Southern dilemma is still again the privilege of American democracy, but reflects little of the excellence and integrity of American statesmanship. Partisan "vested frustration," often in the past approaching dangerously near subversive activities, is not a satisfactory substitute for American fellowship and national counsels.

Now, manifestly, part and parcel of our diagnosis and direction must inhere in the comprehensive understanding of what this American democracy is in its total structure and changing profile. What is meant when we guarantee the conversion of the Southern compound bi-racial culture to an American complex integrated multicultured society? It must be clear that we mean exactly that: the moving of the South from isolation and separatism, from conflict and organic structures which prevent large segments of the people from having equal access to opportunity, resources, work, personality recognition, into cultural arrangements which permit free movement toward all opportunities. This means not only in the South but all over the nation. It means freedom for the Negro to take his place as an integer of cultural structure exactly as does the Jewish, the European Nationals, the Oriental peoples, as well as the many strands of a world society inevitable in the total fabric of America now the cultural as well as economic and political capital of the world. Such a conversion brings with it no more compulsion or specifications for negating the facets of race and ethnic minorities, supreme in whatever personality and cultural loyalties they may wish. Such a conversion automatically, as in any organic structure or process, carries with it the inevitable continuity of separateness, autonomy, and segregation inherent in not only the American ideal but in all the newer reaches of social science, philosophy, freedom for all the differential-groups to have a say in how they shall integrate themselves into the new world society.

One illustration of the limitations and difficulties of our problem of negotiation may be seen in the suggestion made by the Southern Regional Council a few years ago that President Franklin D. Roosevelt appoint a National advisory commission to work with Southern leaders on interracial relations. Yet at the national level, pressures were so varied and insistent about who should or should not be appointed on the Commission that, of course, the project was abandoned. But this is more than equalled in the South in the spectacle of a Southern Regional Council not being able to attract as president, or as prominent members of its board, or financial backers, the most prominent and influential leaders, exclusive of leaders in the fields of religion and sometimes education. It must be clear that their fear of assuming such responsibility is not always due to being afraid of criticism but it is also a fear of not being able to succeed and of being involved in issues and policies over which they have no control. As yet, from the present vantage point, the greatest opportunity in the whole nation might well be hidden in a million dollar contribution to the successful ordering of that Council and what it might mean to the South and the Nation. And it might well be that no federal commission of authorized deputies for discussion and agenda would be more significant than one appointed by the president of the United States to confer with governmental and administrative officers of Southern states.

There are several other aspects of the situation with reference to segregation in education that carry a heavy load of responsibility. One is the continuity of the remarkable record of self development, distinguished achievement and high morale of Negro schools and colleges. For those who know the high motivations, the effective work, the institutional loyalties, the student bodies, the professors - it is no easy decision to recommend anything but an increase of support and appreciation of both what they are doing and of the opportunity for students and faculty to work together without frustration and agression.

Another aspect of the situation is found in the terrible responsibility of those who teach hate and discouragement to Negro children and youth, millions of the finest youth of any race. For here the frame of referenc is bitterness and pessimism during the years which every one knows are years of transition, and at the particular time when impressionistic youth need high motivation and support. Anyone who is not naive enough to try to repeal the laws of individuation, of personality, of freedom, of opportunity, of classification, knows that the major construct is not segregation or non-segregation but non-segregation and segregation, developed through total processes of interaction and of growth, of means and ends, of moral imperatives and administrative reality.

One of the startling paradoxes of this era is found in the seeming inconsistencies of social scientists and philosophers, especially of anthropologists, sociologists, psychologists, and moralists. That is, in a notable era of increased emphasis upon the individual, personality, the autonomy of peoples and culture groups, and upon provisions for differentiation in education and schooling, directives are prepared and recommendations made for enforcing, in cultures throughout the world, conformity to standardized specifications of American urban and intellectual regimentation. Millions of dollars from private foundations, besides billions for governmental finances, are allocated to the acceleration of uniformities in the wake of the impact of technology upon the solidarity and cohesiveness of simpler folk and simpler cultures. The degree of resentment which thousands of folk cultures feel toward the luxurious living of American representatives, often assigned to make over old cultures, would appear astronomical if it could be measured. Yet measures are abundant in individual cases, whether in Japan of today, or China of yesterday, or in Africa, or Pakistan or India. At a time when the United States bemoans its past policy and treatment of the American Indian or the old patterns of imperialism in other lands, similar types of policies and standards set the incidence for the assumptions of the same old dominance over subject cultures.

A second paradox is almost equally startling. At a time when communications technique, and the highly motivated urge for freedom of speech dominates our ideology, the clearly dominant power is often that of minority potential control especially in the areas of economical commericalism, such that pressures from a few may overpower the facilities of the many. All this is powerfully evident in the pressures of the communications power structure and of political balance of power in urban national control, as they are structured in the national approach to the bi-racial situation of the Southern United States. Here again, and again, but finally, we must ask: Is it true? And what else is true? And what are the interrelations between these truths, in the projection of a cultural statesmanship which will integrate our regional cultures into an America at her best rather than to divide and conquer in another primary conflict that is inconsistent with all of the highest ideals of that America which presumes to lead the world.

Among the other contradictions so prevalent in the Southern picture is what might be termed the negation of all excellence in southern civilization in the verdicts of a majority whose judgments are based upon inflexible measures of non-segregation. This is nothing short of tragic. For nothing in the traditions of rich living, in the stability of institutions and the achievements of industry, agriculture, public works, and in the creative work of the South, receives more than a third or fourth rate appraisal so long as the South's culture balance remains in the red with reference to the Negro. Everywhere, here is a region which geographers have ranked near the top in all those resources and physiographic situations which make for greatness. Here is a region of beauty and abundance, with millions of people happy in the prospect of future prosperity - that is, happy until always and ever, the shadow of a tragic people, of two tragic peoples, falls athwart the path of progress and peace. It is not so in other regions where no single phase of culture and economy is allowed to determine the final verdict about the total. In no other region, again, are the achievements of a dynamic minority group, such as the Negro, rich in romance and realism, marked down with a price tag of "slightly blemished" or imperfect finish, as is the case in the South. It is a strange situation ripe for first hand observation and research by outside appraisers, the results of which might well provide the basis for intergroup and interregional accommodation; instead of which vast ignorance prevails about most of the structure and functioning of the Southern culture. A few million dollars from endowed funds, or from government appropriations, for full and normal inquiry and planning might well go a long way toward resolving conflicts and reducing the power structure of propaganda and threats if operations were pursued with the same impartiality as other research and negotiations. Instead, minds and doors appear closed on both fronts of the bitter-enders.

Just twenty years ago I wrote about the South in An American Epoch "So came an American Epoch that was the South. An era had ended. An era had begun. Old golden pages of history, shining parchment records of culture, then yellow and faded, scorched and seared with years of embattled conflict, and epic struggle . . . Gallant figures on black horses and white . . . and crude, simple folk, sore with the footfall of time, passing across an epoch which was to be destroyed by physical and cultural conflagration and to rise up again in another American Epoch strangely different and vivid and powerful. Cultures in the making, social processes at work, portraiture descriptive of how civilizations grow. All the South's yesterdays, with their brilliant episodes and with their sordid pictures receding, giving way to the South's tomorrows, through a sweeping American development reminiscent of universal culture."

I submit this anew feeling sure it is a fair appraisal. But we have not gone as far by 1950 as I had anticipated in another verdict at the same time, when I wrote "The picture of the South realizing its possibilities in the New American Epoch was therefore a colorful picture of an achieving region rather than a pale print of the sensitive South. It was a South thinking less highly of the past than of the future; a South seeking to do all things well rather than merely a few things big; a South which appraised work higher than talk, truth more than dogma, integrity more than acclaim. It was a South unafraid; not afraid of Sinaic thunders echoed by false prophets; not afraid to do its own thinking nor to create in pioneer fields; not afraid of the truth and the freedom which truth reveals; not afraid of the past, the present, or the future. It was a South devout with religio poetoe, with the humility of the scientist and seeking to conserve its fighting energies through eminence in achievement rather than in wasteful conflict. It was a South set to the task of conserving and developing its limitless resources in materials and men and to stopping its vast leakage from economic and social waste. It was a South seeking to extend the bounds of its work to the whole range of human endeavor; to measure its efforts only by the highest standards of excellence, and to appraise its contributions in terms of broader national and international application and of permanent values. It was, in fine, an American South of continuing and new achievements, transforming its deficits to a balance of gain, and becoming representative of the best that America could produce."

Now, finally, out of appreciation for this opportunity to address this notable assembly, representative of the best that sociology affords in the southern region in all its states, I have tried to envisage the next half century from the viewpoint of a science of society, looking at the continuities of growth, development, survival and in the framework of the changing structures of all society. Next I have tried to envisage this South and its dilemmas in the framework of what must be understood in any logical brief that should be studied by those who render judgments from the courts of this nation. For surely, there are judicial aspects of far reaching significance.

But, thirdly, I should like for a moment to forget all of us as social scientists or as educational leaders, or as colleagues striving to be critical of our theories and structures. I should like for a moment to look at you as a testing ground of communications and exhortations. And I should like to revert to our old time Southern custom of quoting Scriptures and giving affectionate saluation. I should like to ask you to say for us to all the Southern people:

Listen, Honey, let's make this the era of the Great Initiative, in which we achieve something better voluntaristically than something worse coercively. And we think we love the South more than all the fighters, and do-gooders, and publicity seekers, and those full of complexes, on the one hand of "vested frustration" from abroad, and of guilt and inferiority frustration from within our borders.

And listen, Honey, the saddest words of tongue or pen are not "It might have been," but "How oft would I and ye would not."

And, listen, Honey, destiny doesn't ask why we didn't do it, but did we?

America Heads Towards Communism; Intolerance, Race Bias; Joblessness and Inflation Will Destroy Democracy

Published in The Telegram Nov. 1949, and Reprinted by Request.

By DAVIS LEE, Publisher

Our nation today faces the greatest crisis in its history, with intolerance, race prejudice, unemployment and inflation providing fertile loam for the dissemination of the destructive seeds of communism.

Communism is easily spawned where there is poverty, unrest and mass discontent and unemployment; where the rich is getting richer and the poor is getting poorer.

Fear, madness and dissension seems to be sweeping our nation. Race prejudice is on the increase; intolerance and religious hate is in evidence everywhere.

15 million Negroes in America are aroused. Their smoldering embers of discontent over segregation, discrimination, the denial of first class citizenship, and many other rights and privileges, have been fanned into a dangerous prairie blaze by communistic agitation that threatens to create a racial gulf which it will take centuries to unite.

Black people the world over are chanting in unison a new song of freedom, of civil rights, and they will hitch their dream star to any vehicle that promises a lift in the direction in which they are headed.

In Africa a few days ago dissatisfied natives went on a hate rampage and killed two or three hundred of their supposed oppressors and exploiters. In China the little people became fed up with Chiang's regime and joined in the fight with Mas Tse-Tung for a new way of life. The dark races of the entire world are on the march.

The allies and loyal supporters of communism are unemployment, high prices, oppresion, exploitation and the denial of basic human rights.

The enemies of our way of life are on the alert for the slightest infringement of the rights of any minority. The lynching of Mallard at Lyons, Georgia, the killing of a Negro who sought to vote; the arrest of a Negro woman who was taken ff a Greyhund bus in Gergia last week; all of this adds to the propaganda material used by the communof our friends, nor can we afford to set one friend against the other.

Let every Negro be an embassador to tolerance and a builder of racial good will. There is an old saying we should put into daily use, "you can catch more flies with molasses than you can with vinegar."

Our Government has grown into a gigantic, involved machine, that will contribute to its own destruction if we are not careful. We cannot afford now to indulge in experiments, we cannot afford now to increase taxes ad further depress and impoverish our people. We must use the old reliable and trusted method to get back on a solid foundation —cut down on our overhead.

The heads of our Government need to return to the course charted by our founding fathers. Let's return and adopt once and for all the principles upon which this great nation was launched. Let's try to catch the spirit of that freedom that impelled, motivated and drove them to found this great nation.

Let's launch a national movement to unite all of uor people. We need to sell America and all she stands for to Americans. We Negroes need to learn and realize now that in an effort to right her he is accepting the views and exhor-tations of the left wing boys whose knowledge of national, econmic, plitical and industrial navigatin is il.

Champ Walcott Garners $1,500 For Sandlotters

Some 2,000 underprivileged young New York baseball fans are assured of $1,500 worth of free seats at the Polo Grounds for the annual Sandlot Classic on Wednesday, Aug 8, thanks to World Heavy Weight Champion Joe Walcott's appearance as a "Helping Hand" guest contestant on "Strike It Rich" — CBS radio and television program (CBS Radio, 4:00-4:30 P.M. EDT. CBS-TV, 11:30 a.m.-12.00 noon. EDT. Both Mon thru Fri. And CBS, Wednesdays, 9:00-9:30 p.m. EDT.)

Jersey Joe, famous as a parent as well as for his boxing career, volunteered to appear on the program because "I'm interested in everything connected with juvenile welfare."

He won $500 the program's maximum award by correct answers to emcee Warren Hull's round of five qquestions, but before he could complete his perfect score there was a telephone call to the studio from Phil Rizzuto, Yankee shortstop, offering to match Joe's winnings. Immediately after the broadcast, a baseball and boxing fan, who courts anonymity, phoned to say he had put a $500 check in the mail to swell Joe Walcott's fund.

ALL NEGRO EMPLOYEES QUIT CAFE OVER BIAS

The allies and loyal supporters of communism are unemployment, high prices, oppresion, exploitation and the denial of basic human rights.

The enemies of our way of life are on the alert for the slightest infringement of the rights of any minority. The lynching of Mallard at Lyons, Georgia, the killing of a Negro who sought to vote; the arrest of a Negro woman who was taken ff a Greyhund bus in Gergia last week; all of this adds to the propaganda material used by the communists to further arouse and embitter the Negro masses.

These violations of whites against Negroes are magnified and played up, yet a Negro kills two young white people in Maryland, a Negro rapes and kills a 16 year old white girl in South Jersey; Negroes commit the most atrocious crimes against white people throughout the nation, and it is played down, unless the agitators can find a reason to charge that the accused was framed.

While one group of our enemies are busy stirring up race hatred, another group is busy engendering religious and political intolerance. Several Catholic priests at Danbury, Conn. opposed the appearance of a national political figure at the local Lion's club last week.

These same priests condemned in no uncertain terms the action of the Government of Hungary i the arrest and conviction of Joseph Cardinal Mendszenty.

All of us want our individual rights protected to the ninth degree, but none of us have sufficient respect and regard for the rights of others.

Big business throughout our nation is contributing to the chaotic economic plight of the little people by dropping 2,000,000 from the payrolls in one mnth. A hungry man with no job and a wife and kiddies to feed will embrace communism and its glowing promises of everything for nothing, much quicker than a happy, contented man with a job.

The captain of our great ship of state is confused and is in a quandry. His ship has struck an economic reef, and even with its Jim Crowism and all of its faults, the United States is the greatest country in the world, and has given us our greatest opportunity in every sphere. We have made more progress in 83 years of freedom in this country than the natives in Africa.

The Negroes who set up the Government in Liberia where they are completely in control, have not made the progress we have made. In Haiti, Ethiopia and in Africa the Negro Governments are corupt, inefficient, and the Negro rulers treat their own much worse than any white man would dare to treat us in this country.

We need to shun all agitators and all isms, and let's solve our problems and difficulties around the conference table with the white leaders of this nation who have demonstrated a thousand times that they are interested in our welfare and our progress. We are a minoriy and we are not in a position where we can afford to make enemies out

SARATOGA, N. Y. — The entire crew of the Dog House Restaurant here quit cold late last week because they would not work in a place which discriminated brazenly against their own kind.

The four top employes in Mre. Margar et Vromon's swank eatery walked out without warning when her manager, Robert Luff, ordered a pair of Negro diners out of the place Thursday.

Chef George Mitchum, his wife, headwaiter John Bryant, sidewaiter William Gamble, a dishwasher and a busboy agreed between themselves that it was better to quit a $100 a week job rather than sacrifice self respect.

The incident developed, Gamble said, a few weeks ago when Luff reprimanded him for serving a Negro couple. Gamble discussed the matter with other employes and they decided they would not stand for a repetition of such an attitude.

ALL QUIT

Thursday another Negro couple came in to dine. In the middle of their meal Mrs. Vromon entered the restaurant and ordered that the coulpe be put out of the place. The staff held an emergency meeting and quit cold.

"I don't care," Gamble saild, "about the job. We all felt that we couldn't stand being kicked around like that. I'm buying a home myself, but I'd rather lose it than work in a place with attitudes like those shown toward my people. He had been employed at the Dog House fo rmore than a year and added that his salary often ran to $115 per week.

Headwaiter Bryant was a six-year employe.

NORTHERN NEGROES HATE SOUTHERN NEGROES; LIGHT ONES SHUN DARK ONES

By DAVIS LEE, PUBLISHER
(An Editorial Reprinted By Request)

The attitude and antics of Northern Negroes toward their Southern brothers would be most amusing if it were not for the fact that the progress of our race has been retarded and we suffer as the result.

Can you imagine one Negro hating another because of his birth?

Can you imagine one Negro setting up barrier against another because of his color or complexion? Well, whether you imagine it or not, it is true. Northern Negroes not only hate Negroes who come from the south but they shun them as if they had small pox. And the irony of it is the fact that many of the so-called northern Negroes were themselves born in Georgia, Mississippi or some other Southern state. If the individuals guilty of this attitude were not themselves born in the south, their parents were.

I have met many so-called northerners who claimed Michigan or New York as their nativity, but investigation revealed that they were born in the deep south. This adopted northerner accuses the recent southern arrival of making things bad for him, and for the race. He claims that this northern freedom intoxicates the southerner when he arrives and that his conduct not only reflects detrimentally upon the race, but many places of recreation and amusement bar all Negroes to keep out trouble making Southerners who feel that a switch blade is a passport to the enjoyment of this new found freedom.

In Winston-Salem and other North Carolina citieis the natives hate the Negroes from nearby South Carolina, and the brothers of sable hue in Virginia and Maryland hate Negroes from North Carolina.

This strange attitude on the past of one Negro towards another has created a division within the race that keeps us from getting together for the future protection and advancement of the race.

CUT OUT AGITATION

Sometime ago we printed an editorial in which we urged our people to cut out agitation as a means to advance our cause, but to adopt methods employed by Gandhi, the great Indian leader.

It was indeed refreshing to read news releases on a speech made in New York last week by Dr. Rammonohar Lohia, Indian Social leader, in which he told Negroes that they were going about the serious business of winning their civil rights the wrong way."

T eherudite leadeer told his listeners that legislation and pressure tactics are wrong; that the Gandhi method would win friends for our cause.

While we are running the story in this issue, we just wanted to mention our previous editorial views along this line.

WHAT IS THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN SEGREGATION?

By DAVIS LEE

Last week a group of Northern educators met at the Hotel Commodore in New ork and voted to bar Negroes from membership in The National Inter-Fraternity.

David A. Embury, Wall street lawyer, led the panel discussion and asked the following questions: "Should we favor and promote the organization of raternities that have no discrimination whatever regarding color — keeping in mind that whenever you get close social contact, marriage unvariably results — Negroes dancing with your sisters and sweethearts?"

Eugene McNally of Renesselaer Polytechnic Institute, declared "you join a fraternity because you want to know the people. If you don't care to have a Catholic or Jew as your brother, that's your privilege."

This discussion was carried on in New York City by Northerners who are suppose to not consider one on the basis of race or religion. These are the same people who condemn the racial customs of the South. If that discussion last week had been carried on by Southern whites in Atlanta or Birmingham, every Northern daily would have headlined it.

What happened and what was said in New York by those educators merely substantiates my previous editorial claims that there is just as much bigotry, intolerance and race prejudice in New York as there is in Georgia. Race prejudice is not a Southern product — it is a racial disease whose germs are universal.

In Winston-Salem and other North Carolina cities the natives hate the Negroes from nearby South Carolina, and the brothers of sable hue in Virginia and Maryland hate Negroes from North Carolina.

This strange attitude on the past of one Negro towards another has created a division within the race that keeps us from getting together for the future protection and advancement of the race.

While the Southern Negro has may more fine colleges and universities than the Northerners, white or black, want to admit, if the Northern Negro feels that Southerners are so ignorant and he really wants his race to get ahead he should organize reception committees in every city and state in the East and North to meet all new southerners and aid them in getting adjusted in the new community of their choice.

The committee should aid the new arrivals in getting located in the right environment; he should be informed of his rights and privileges. A book of do's and don'ts should be placed in his possession. The committee should keep in constant contact with the new arrival until he has become completely orientated.

This would do much to keep down crime and the new arrivals would become useful citizens immediately. This kind of race solidarity and cooperation would contribute more than anything else to the real progress of the race.

Again, these committees would also be Ambassadors of tolerance and good will. We would sympathize with our brother from the south because he had been denied many of the rights and privileges which we enjoy. We would be taught to love every member of our race no matter where he arrives from or whether he is jet black or near white.

To reach our place in the world; to be respected by others, we must love and respect ourselves. Let's not condemn another or hate him because of his complexion or birth place. Lets' judge him for what's in his heart.

Mrs. Napper To Work For NAACP In North Carolina

NEW YORK — Mrs. Berenice N. Napper, assistant field secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, will spend the remainder of this month and all of August in North Carolina organizing membership drives, Gloster B. Current, director of branches, announced recently.

Starting in Durham, Mrs. Napper will also visit and assist branches of the Association in Raleigh, Fayetteville, Hamlet, Scotland County, Wilmington, Onslow County, New Bern, Lenoir County, Goldsboro, Edgecombe County and Washington County.

Clearing White Man of Assault

Winston, N. C. — The jury which acquitted a New York white man of raping a 15-year-old Negro girl here "is a disgrace to the White raec, a disgrace to this country . . . and an outrage based solely on the fact that the defendant was a white man and the state's witness a colored girl," Superior Court Judge Henry A. Grady said angrily last week.

An all white, all male jury let Frank Newsome, 45, off scot free even though Judge Grady declared "the evidence was overwhelmingly in favor of the state."

Not to be outdone, Judge Grady issued a bench warrant for Newsome's arrest and had him rejailed pending presentation of the case to another Grand Jury in October.

A Grand Jury broke the first precedent by reducing the indictment from rape (which carried the death sentence) to carnal knowledge. The latter charge permits jail terms up to 30 years.

But the judge suggested to his prosecutor that the case be moved to another county, "to a jury with sense enough and character enough to do the right thing." He said, "I am ashamed of my state."

Newsome allegedly raped the girl after luring her to his brother's home on the promise of a baby-sitting job. She is Hattie Louise Hoggard. The incident occurred last June 30.

7-Year Terms For 4 GI's Who Bombed Police

COLUMBUS, Ga., — Four Fort Benning soldiers were found guilty last week of throwing grenades at a Columbus police car and sentenced to dishonorable discharges and seven years at hard labor.

Army officials at Benning identified the sentenced men as Pfc. Luther Smith, 21, of Columbus, Miss.; Pvts. David L. Freeman, 19, and Paul Newman, 25 both of Chicago; and Eddie Johnson, 19, of St. Louis.

Their sentences grew out of charges they hurled two grenades at a Columbus patrol car May 20, that came to a cafe in the City's Negro district to answer a disturbance call.

would have headlined it.

What happened and what was said in New York by those educators merely substantiates my previous editorial claims that there is just as much bigotry, intolerance and race prejudice in New York as there is in Georgia. Race prejudice is not a Southern product — it is a racial disease whose germs are universal.

If every Negro felt as I do about white people, North as well as South, there would be no racial friction in this nation. I have no desire to dance with a white woman or to marry one and I am bitterly opposed to white men dancing and marrying the women of my race.

I am not prejudiced. I like all races and nationalities and I limit my contact and cultivation of white people unless otherwise expressed by them. The rights and privileges I grant others I reserve for myself.

This whole race issue, North as well as South, is based on the belief by white people that Negroes want to intermarry, that Negroes want to associate with them as a social equal.

The Negro is regarded as an inferior being who is forever striving to be recognized and accepted by supposedly superior people. Of course Negroes themselves in many instances lend support to this illusion, by yelling to the house tops about a member of the race being the first Negro to do this or that, or by trying to break down this barrier or that one. Many whit e folk, who are actually not prejudiced, resent these gate crashing tactics.

I must agree that many supposedly intelligent Negroes by their own acts have created the impression that our race as a whole does desire intermarriage. Some outstanding Negroes like George Schuyler, Associate Editor of The Pittsburgh Courier, Richard Wright, the famous author, and many others have white wives.

But the majority of Negroes in this nation are as much opposed to intermarriage and race mixing as I am. Southerners, both white and black, are opposed to it from bitter experience. During slavery and directly thereafter there was so much mixing, illegally and illegitimately, until today it is hard to tell who is white and who is black.

We are living now in a more enlightened era in which both races desire to retain their own racial identity and integrity.

What we must do is conduct ourselves in such a manner that the entire world might understand that we are as proud of our heritage, of our race, as any other man, and that our pride will not permit us to want to go where we are not wanted.

We are Americans, and we believe in our country and its Constitution. That Constitution guarantees to us as loyal Americans certain rights which we claim and which we want respected and protected.

We want to enjoy every economic advantage and every opportunity accorded other Americans. We are 15,000,000 strong in this nation, and we desire proportionate representation in the direction of this nation's future and its welfare; because our future and our welfare is securely bound to that of our nation.

We are not interested in dancing with the women of other races, or in marrying them. We are interested in "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and in the engagement of all rights and privileges enjoyed by other good citizens.

The Negro Needs Sympathetic Friendship, Not Useless Laws

By DAVIS LEE, PUBLISHER

(Published in The Telegram, Feb. 1950 and Reprinted by Request)

Because of the renewed efforts of the Truman Administration to force a legislative show down on the Civil Rights issue, and because of the evident increase in racial unrest and antagonism, I decided to return south and go into every phase of the race question.

For several weeks now I have been touring these southern States. It is becoming convincingly more evident to me each day that the south does not only offer the Negro his greatest opportunity, but that the Negroe's only hope of achieving economic, industrial, agricultural, political and educational freedom, is in the south.

No other section of this nation understands him and his problems so well, and no other section is as sympathetic and willing to help him. And if the American Negro needs anything, it is sympathy, understanding; the right and privilege to engage in business and all other legitimate pursuits to advance himself and his race without restriction.

The Negro in the south now enjoys this. Then why all this national agitation?

I spent last week interviewing the white industrial leaders of Alabama. In Birmingham I met the heads of Connor Steel Company, Continental Cotton Gin, McWane Steel Company and many others. They employ thousands of Negroes

At the Crosby Hodges Flour Mill, Mr. Hodges spoke very highly of his Negro employees. One Negro has been with the firm 46 years. He owns property, has educated his children and has a son who is dean of a college.

While I was at the Western Feed Company an injured Negro employee limped into Mr. Jockson's office where we were in conference. The employer pulled up the man's trouser leg, anointed the wound, bandaged it up, and sent him home.

Mr. Jackson said that their three hundred Negro em-

Beauty Shop Licenses Extended To Aug. 31

TRENTON — The expiration date of beauty shop licenses has been extended to August 31 under the provisions of Chapter 144, P.L. 1951, effective May 31, 1951, according to an announcement of the State Board of Beauty Culture Conrtol. Stephen J. Bator, of Maplewood, is chairman of the Board. The Board functions under the Bureau on Examination and Licensing of the State Department of Health.

The new law further requires that all licenses must be renewed each year. Previously, only shop and school licenses had to be renewed each year. Other licenses had to be renewed within a two-year period.

Expiration dates for the various licenses issued are as follows:

Shop—August 31; Operator—September 30; — Manicurist — September 30.

Persons holding any of the above licenses are urged to renew same on or before the above expiration dates.

EVERYTHING HAS CHANGED IN BIRTH, EXCEPT SUPERSTITIONS

So someone in your family is going to have a baby.

If it is born in North Jersey, the chances this year are 52 to 1 that it will be born in a hospital against an almost even bet that its mother was born at home. The chances are 425 to 1 that it will be delivered by a doctor, against one to four odds that mother was delivered by a mid-wife. And its chances of being a healthy, bouncing youngster are three times as good in 1951 as the chances were when its parents were born.

Everything has changed since mother was born, except the superstitions. Believe it or not, superstitions and deep-seated family convictions still determine such things as what mama should eat before the child is born and who will wash the diapers.

Does the baby down the street wear a black or red ribbon around its wrist?

There's an old superstition that such a ribbon will keep away the evil spirits.

Here are some more prevalent New Jersey superstitions reported by doctors, nurses and public health officials.

The belief still exists in this area that if an expectant mother has an overwhelming desire for certain foods, such as strawberries, the child will bear a tell-tale birthmark.

An expectant mother should never look at ugly pictures. But if she concentrates on beautiful pictures, she will have a beautiful baby.

An infant's fingernails should not be cut unless there is money in the palm of its hands, otherwise it will grow up to be a thief. Baby's nails are frequently bitten off by grandmother or aunty.

Of course, none of these is true, but all are deep-rooted in some cultural groups.

And the cultural group to which the parents belong will determine to a large extent many elements of the baby's birth.

For instance, there are so many poor mothers giving birth in hospitals today as there are mothers of moderate or bountiful means. Every New Jersey community budgets large sums of public money each year for the state's most valuable product, the children of tommorw.

Here are some of the big changes in maternity patterns in the last generation.

The number of midwives has decreased drastically.

Most children are born in hos-

While I was at the Western Feed Company an injured Negro employee limped into Mr. Jockson's office where we were in conference. The employer pulled up the man's trouser leg, anointed the wound, bandaged it up, and sent him home.

Mr. Jackson said that their three hundred Negro employees are among their most loyal. He explained that recently the city engaged in a Zoning fight as the result of two Negro ministers moving into a nexclusive white neighborhood. It so happens, he pointed out, that one of their Negro employees owns a house not far from the section involved in the dispute. That emplyee had lived there fr years and that the Company was ready to protect him, if necessary.

Not only do Southern whites employ Negroes, but they take a personal interest in them and their problems. I went into a plant and asked to see the president. When I met him he turned out to be a Northerner. He told me that he didn't know too much about his colored employees. And what he said is true of most Northerners.

It is difficult to find a business of any size in Alabama that does not empoly Negroes. This is generally true throughout the south. And it did not require FEPC law to force these white people to give Negroes jobs.

One can find plenty of plants and businesses in the Northern and Eastern States that do not, and never have, employed Negroes. A FEPC law could help the Negroes in the North, but it is not needed down here. The Administration in Washington should seek to influenec the Democratic leaders in the Northern Statees to enact Fair Employment legislation.

It is becoming more apparent to me each day as I go through the South that someone has sold the Administration a bill of goods on this race issue.

Of course conditions are not completely ideal everywhere in the south, but progress has been made and every day finds the southern Negro closer to his goal.

What the Negro masses need more than anything else is intelligent leadership. Leaders who are not agitators for selfish, personal gain; leaders who will teach the masses how to be thirfty, and how to get the most out of available opportunities. Leaders who will strive to build good will and understanding.

In one city I found a Negro bank and eight of its officers with new Cadillacs. You would not find eight officers in the largest white bank in the South, each with a new Cadillac. I drove by a Negro high school, the principal had a new Cadillac, and lined up around the school were new Fords, Chevys and other makes. Just a few blocks away was a white high school. I saw no new Cadillac and most of the cars were old models.

Negroes need to be taught to buy what they need; to not buy what they want and cannot afford. They need to be taught to support their own hospitals and other charities, and stop begging whit people for money to support institutions which they themselves should support.

The Negores in America and in the south have no problems which cannot be solved by intelligent leadership.

The South has done a good job with most difficult and perplexing problem. The current census will no doubt show the Negro population in the nation to be between eighteen and twenty million. Over two thirds of these people live in the south.

The South not only has to find a solution to the new problems of poor, ignorant Negroes, but it has plenty of poor, ignorant whites. However, when one takes an inventory of the Negroe's progress in every sphere, he has to admit that a good job is being done.

But despite the achievements which we now enjoy, the Negro is still an infant, and he still needs the strong hand of someone to steady him until he is able to walk financially, economically, industrially and in education. This is true in the south despite the fact that our people down here own several solvent banks, million dollar insurance companies, other creditable businesses, and that Negroes own more real estate, finer homes, than you will find anywhere else in the nation.

He needs economic guidance badly so that he will not put his pennies in needless and profitless toys — like Cadillacs. Legislation cannot offer a solutilon to his many problems, but sympathetic friendship and understanding can.

An abrupt end to all of this race agitation would result if the southern senators and congressmen would persuade their Northern, Eastern and Western colleagues to spend one month in the south. After that the Southern Negroes and whites would be let alone to work out their own destiny.

The best operated city in the nation for Negroes is Montgomery, Alabama, and the most democratic city is Johnson City, Tenn. where Negroes live on practically every Street, and you cant' tell a Negro home from a white one by appear ance.

All of us, black and white, should realize that we are all Americans, and that race hatred in ont American. Let us all work and live together as friends, and you dont' need legislation to do that.

money each year for the state's most valuable product, the children of tommorw.

Here are some of the big changes in maternity patterns in the last generation.

The number of midwives has decreased drastically.

Most children are born in hospitals.

Mothers are usually up and about in five to seven days unless there are complicating factors.

An fathers as well as mothers are receiving pre-natal training.

For instance, if a visiting nurse is called in by the doctor, the chances are that she will make her first call on the expectant mother on a Saturday so she can talk to the father, too.

One of the big facts that hasn't changed is that poor people live in the cities and have the most children. Newark's 1950 birthrate was 29.7 babies per 1,000 estimated population, against 19.3 for Essex county as a whole. Nearby counties, Hudson, Union, Bergen, Middlesex and Monmouth, averaged 20.4 births per 1,000.

Of Newark's 13,174 new babies last year, only 252 were delivered at home. Of these, 31 were delivered by mid-wives, according to city records.

One of the big factors in the trend toward hospital births in the last generation, health authorities said, is the maternity benefits in many general coverage insurance policies purchased by workers.

Although the mid-wife is disappearing rapidly in New Jersey, the trend in some other parts of the country is toward more midwife deliveries. For instance, New York now licenses midwives. But the 1951 midwife in the progressive community which issues licenses is a graduate nurse who has taken a lengthy course in child delivery.

Medical authorities attribute this trend to experiments in some hospitals in keeping the baby in the same room as the mother. Some believe that this trend points to more home deliveries in the future with licensed, well-trained midwives cooperating with doctors.

Indian Has Plan To Fight Bias

HIS IDEA: RESISTANCE BE PASSIVE

American Negroes may be going about the serious business of winnig their civil rights the wrong way, Indian Socialist leader Dr. Rammonohar Lohia suggested last week.

Dr. Lohia is leader of the party which opposes the Nehru government in India, and was a close friend and follower of the late Gandhi. He is in New York this summer at the invitation of the Foundation for World Government.

The enegertic, scholarly Lohia said that where legislative action and pressure tactics for equality of opportunity have been inadequate, a vigorous policy of civil disobedience and passive resistance might well be the Negro's most potent weapon. He hastened to assure a gathering of Harlem leaders at the Urban League Thursday, however, that the plan must proceed by scrupulously means.

The Indian leader proposed that Negroes move up the social and economic scale by staging mass marches, picketing, sit-in and sit-out strikes, boycott and other such measures.

"By careful organization and planning of peaceful demonstrations, the minority group can attime committee be set up "to explore instances of discrimination and segregation, and work out the best plan to use in each case." From this point, the Indian political spokesman said, the masses of Negroes and whites can participate, and make their collective voice heard. The public temper, he said, cannot escape being affected by the attitudes of thousands upon thousands of determined people.

WOULD BE FOUR-FOLD

He said the benefits of the civil disobedience plan would be fourfold:

1. To restore the health of the American system.
2. Make the Negro community equal to any other in the world.
3. Reinforce the world attitude toward a change for the better by peaceful means.
4. Prove the civil disobedience technique 100 percent more effective than any other means yet devised.

Dr. Lohia foresaw no great difficulty in a changeover from the traditionally American "fight for what you want" ideal to a peaceful resistance plan. He said there is no fundamental difference in the cultural patterns between American Negroes and Indians.

"There is no reason why civil disobedience as Gandhi exploited it cannot be effective to improve the lot of Negroes," Lohia said. He also said the struggle of Indian and Negroe peoples was the same, with the dissimilarity only in the stage of progress.

At the Urban League conference were Garry Davis of world

The Indian leader proposed that Negroes move up the social and economic scale by staging mass marches, picketing, sit-in and sit-out strikes, boycott and other such measures.

"By careful organization and planning of peaceful demonstrations, the minority group can attract liberal sympathizers from the mapjority group and thereby make itself the majority," declared Lohia. He said the segregation pattern could be wiped out by the majority.

"Passive resistance could have been used in the Cicero, Illinois, riots," said Lohia. "If a dozen Negroes and whites pledged to occupy the building, come what may, they could have drawn the support of influential persons who otherwise would remain silent," he explained. This has been done in India for many years.

"Constructive legal action is not enough," Dr. Lohia declared. He said the civil disobedience policy made popular by Gandhi can wrok to the advantage of minorities.

He suggested a permanent, full-disobedience as Gandhi exploited it cannot be effective to improve the lot of Negroes," Lohia said. He also said the struggle of Indian and Negroe peoples was the same, with the dissimilarity only in the stage of progress.

Silicones Are Up-Coming

The use of silicone-base finishes has greatly increased during the last year. Since first marketed about five years ago, silicone finishes have been discovered to have extreme heat and weather-resistance. They are especially suited to space heaters, furnaces, steam generators mufflers and processing equipment. They make extremely weather resistent enamels for advertising and highway signs, street signs, metal awnings and siding.

S.C. CASE IN NEW PHASE AS NAACP FILES APPEAL

CHARLESTON, S. C. — With the filling of a petition of appeal in the United States District Court here today, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People entered the second stage of the fight to abolish segregation in the public elementary and secondary schools in nearby Clarendon County and thereby to set a precedent for the total abolition of segregation in public education.

The petition, filed by Thurgood Marshall, NAACP special counsel, appeals from the majority opinion handed down on June 21 by a three-judge federal court, upholding a provision of the South Carolina Constitution requiring the separation of the races in public schools. The NAACP suit, brought in behalf of Negro school-age children and their parents residing in School District No. 22 of Clarendon County and tried before the court on May 28-29, challenged the validity of the state's constitutional provision and sought a decision declaring it in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. With Judge J. Waties Waring Dissenting, Judges John J. Parker and George Bell Timmerman concurred in sustaining the right of the states to impose segration of the races in public education.

The petition filed today is a vital step in an effort to place squarely before the United States Supreme Court the issue of the validity of states' constitutions and statutes requiring segregation. Recent decisions, as in the Sweatt case, the petition points out, tend to undermine the doctrine of "separate but equal" formulated in the famous Plessy v. Ferguson case. The NAACP notes that these decisions, together with current social trends, have created "serious and widespread question as to the legality and the duration of segrated public elementary and high schools." Such doubts, the petition asserts, "the Suprme Court should settle by a definite decision as to whether racial separation in public elementary and secondary schools is a constitutionally possible pattern which may serve to giude the future endeavors of scholars and school officials."

RACIAL LAWS ILLEGAL

The appeal is based upon the contention that statutory classifications based soley upon race or color violate the federal Constitution. Citing legal precedents, the petition asserts that "race or color can not be made the basis of a statutory classification." It further contends that there is no reasonable basis for allocating educational facilities on the basis of race, and also denies that segregation laws can be upheld on the basis that they are necessary to preserve public peace and order. Moreover, the NAACP asserts, the majority of the lower court erred in refusing to follow the applicable decisions of the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court, the petition says, "has always recognized the importance of segregation in public education. Although the Supreme Court has clarified the issue as to graduate an dproefessional schools, the Court has never had the opportunity to consider the question as to elementary and high schools on the basis of a full and complete record with the issue clearly drawn and with competent expert testimony as appears in the record in this case. A clear cut decision on this issue will remove all doubts in the field of public education."

Majority Opinion Challenged

Challenging the majority opinion in the Clarendon County case, the NAACP brief charges that that decision "subordinated the individual rights of the plaintiffs to the state's segregation policy" and ignored the psychological injury to the segragated pupils. The individual's rights cannot be sustained nor his psychic injury repaired through the provision of physical plants substantially equal to the facilities available to white pupils, the NAACP contends.

Ample opportunity has been given the southern states to provide equal facilities under the decision in Plessy v. Ferguson. However, the petition points out, "after more than three-quarters of a century of judicial effort to attain equality of educational opportunity within the framework of racial segration, the widespread inequalities and discriminations yet existent demonstrate the futility of such acourse."

While the South has been blindly adhering to the separate but equal doctrine, the NAACP concludes, inequalities within the segragated system have increased. It further notes that none of the harmful effects predicted have materialized with the breakdown of segregration in southern graduate and professional schools. Because racial segregation in elementary and secondary schools "exerts a far greater effect on a far larger number of persons at a for more important stage of the person's life," the need for eliminating it is certainly no less urgent than at the graduate and professional levels, the petition maintains.

Associated with Mr. Marshall as counsel for the plaintiffs—appellants are Robert L. Carter, NAACP assistant special counsel of New York; Harold R. Boulware of Columbia, S.C.: and Spottswood W. Robinson, III, of Richmond, Va. Other counsel are Arthur D. Shores of Birmingham and A. T. Walden of Atlanta.

Brighter Future Ahead For Negro Entertainers

NEW YORK — Josephine Baker's reception in America may mean a brighter future for all Negro show people, declares the August 13 issue of Quick magazine, which features Miss Baker on the cover.

In a penetrating article titled "The Negro in Entertainment," Quick points out that when Miss Baker broke the color line in Miami's strict Copa City, another Florida Cafe owner, noting her success, said: "I don't care if people are green — if they can pay their check."

But things are still difficult. Says Tallulah Bankhead: "The Negro actor, no matter how great, is Broadway's stepchild."

But her success led Jo Baker to say: "I haven't changed, so it must be the people here that have."

Juano Hernandez, Quick points out, has made four films in one year — and all his roles "have been dignified, intelligent." Advances have been made in television, too, "where appearances by Negro greats are bringing all Negroes new respect."

The recent uproar concerning the TV "Amos 'n' Andy" is discussed in the article, and it reports the approval of this show by the Coordinating Council for Negro Performers. This show points up two difficulties for Negro entertainers (1) finding work, (2), finding roles that do not slur their people. Both of these pribblems are gradually being met.

As Bing Crosby sums up in Quick: "Show business will be forever indebted to the Negro . . . Surely what they have contributed gives them the right to expect nothing but the best from the industry in return."

Video Demands Comfort

Since the advent of television, the sales of slipcovered matresses and spring-on-legs for living room use have increased. It seems that people enjoy the programs much more while comfortably stretched out on a good bed.

Scottsboro Boy Faces Trial

ALBANY — Jawn A. Sandifer, chairman of the New York State NAACP Legal Redress Committee, charged here Thursday that the Albany Grand Jury is trying "Scottsboro Boy," James Andy Wright, indicted here last week on a first-degree rape charge of a 13-year-old Negro girl, for the crime he was convicted of committing 19 years ago and not for the alleged current crime.

Mr. Sandifer made this charge after the 39-year-old Wright, refusing bail, pleaded innocent to the indictment which charged him with first degree rape allegedly committed on July 3.

PARIS-INSPIRED STYLES AND COLORS DRAMATIC IN NEW FALL COATS AND SUITS

The three-piece suit, the pencil slim suit skirt with a torso jacket and the pyramid coat, such as these styled by Betty Rose, will dominate Milady's wardrobe this fall. More vivid colors than usual for fall will be seen in both coats and suits. It will be the pyramid for fashion in coats again. The pyramid is modified, with the fullness coming from the sides, rather than from the back, and the hemline sweep is lessened. But the basic silhouette is that of a long, full coat, slimmed at the shoulders rather than at the hemline. Shoulders are a real style story this year, sloping, raglan, saddle. Sleeves of all types combine with collar, pocket and button interest to give coats a new look. A sprinkling of novelties, such as the three-piece suit shown here, will brighten the style picture, and the short coat will be more popular than ever this fall and winter. It is liked for its contrast, effectiveness in textured fabrics and because it is less expensive. The suit silhouette is slim, high-lighted by interest in detail, such as insets of fabric, novelty buttons and jewel trim. The average length of the torso or sheath jacket is 26 inches.

Mr. Sandifer made this charge after the 39-year-old Wright, refusing bail, pleaded innocent to the indictment which charged him with first degree rape allegedly committed on July 3.

Claiming that the Grand Jury's action was biased the NAACP official said that he would ask for a change of venue and an inspection of the Grand Jury minutes before the trial begins in September. Mr. Sandifer said that the publicity given the case in that area would make it impossible for any jury to decide the case in a fair mind.

Wright, freed on parole some 15 months ago after having served 19 years of a 99-year sentence for alleged rape of two white girls, had been working in Albany as a mill hand before his arrest. He is currently in the county jail awaiting trial. If convicted, he faces return to Alabama as a parole violator, and must serve the remaining years of his term.

Civic Clubs Send Cards On Hoover Report

An estimated 100,000 penny postcards urging immediate action on Hoover Report economy legislation have been sent to congressmen by New Jersey service clubs and civic organizations in the past two months, Donald V. Lowe of Ridgefield, chairman of the New Jersey Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report declared today.

An average of slightly under 60 postcards was supplied by the Committee to each of more than 200 organizations and, Mr. Lowe said, over 90 per cent of them have informed Committee headquarters that they participated in the mail campaign. In each case, every member got a card and filled it out with his own views on government economy, based on statistics furnished by the Citizens Committee.

One service club objected to the idea on the grounds that it was constituted as a "non-political" organization. But when Mr. Lowe explained that the Report is based on the findings of a bi-partisan committee formed on orders of President Truman with Former President Hoover as chairman, and that legislation embodying its recommendations has been introduced under joint sponsorship of both parties, the objection was withdrawn.

NEW CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS

The United States Civil Service Commission today announced examinations for Meteorologist $3,100 and $3,825 a year, and Research and Development Meteorologist, $4,600 to $6,400 a year. The positions are located in Washington, D. C., and throughout the United States, including the Territories. A few positions may also be filled in U. S. possessions and in foreign countries.

To qualify for both types of meteorologist positions, applicants must have had appropriate education or experience or a combination of education and experience. No written test is required. The age limits, waived for persons entitled to veteran preference, are from 18 to 35 years for the $3,100 jobs and 18 to 62 for the others.

Applications should be sent to the U. S. Civil Service Commission, Washington 25, D. C. They will be accepted until further notice.

Further information and application forms may be obtained from the Commission's Local Secretary, Mr. James J. Capone, located at Westfield, New Jersey Post Office from Civil Service regional offices, or from the U. S. Civil Service Commission, Washington 25, D. C.

FOR RELEASE: MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1951

The American Civil Liberties Union called upon the Board of Higher Education today to suspend a set of rules in force at Brooklyn College for "judging Communist and Communist-related student groups". The standards for judging left-wing student groups, adopted last June for use by the Faculty-Student Committee on Student Activities, are patterned after those in the McCarran Act, passed by Congress in 1950.

Vigorously protesting the stringent regulations as a "fatal blow to freedom of the mind", the Union declared:

"A democratic educational experience cannot be achieved in merely theoretical terms; if we are to train our students in the fundamentals of American citizenship, their education must be conducted within the framework of a democratic campus governance."

In a letter to Dr. Ordway Tead, chairman of the Board of Higher Education, the ACLU urged also that the board order the Brooklyn College faculty and administration to reconsider their action in setting up the criteria.

"To apply a law designed for the protection of the nation in times of crisis against criticism which a group of students may, wisely or unwisely, direct against the administration of a college, is close to the realization of the police state on an American campus," said the letter. It was signed by Ruth Gillette Hardy, vice chairman of the ACLU Academic Freedom Committee, and by the Rev. John Paul Jones, chairman of the New York Civil Liberties Union, the ACLU's local organization.

The Union's letter pointed out further:

"The McCarran Act as Federal law will be administered by officers of the executive branch of our government and ultimate appeal will lie to the courts. To provide that similar rulings and appeals be within the authority of a joint faculty-student committee is unreasonable and unwise; a committee of teachers of chemistry and English and college students is not expert or mature enough for such responsibility.

"The McCarran Act is intended to safeguard the security of the United States. This college legislation provides for protection against subversion of 'the national welfare'. National welfare is a much more general term than national security, and its meaning in this situation will be extremely vague and broad. In effect, subversion of the national welfare will be determinable by the mere opinion of the committee concerned."

The set of regulations defines methods for judging "Communist and Communist-related groups", "groups subversive of the College", and "groups subversive of the national welfare".

The Union, which has just received a copy of the rules, told Dr. Tead it assumed the criteria was based on faculty action and subsequent administrative approval.

NOTE TO EDITORS: A copy of the regulations is attached for your information.

Criteria Employed by the Faculty-Student Committee on Student Activites in Judging Communist and Communist-related Student Groups.

(Adopted on June 10, 1951)

A. Definitions:

Subversive - militating strongly against something specified; destructive.

Subvert - to overthrow from or as from the very foundation; utterly destroy; bring to ruin: now generally figuratively as of moral or political ruin, but formerly also of physical overthrow.

B. Communist and communist-related groups shall be judged by the following criteria:

1. The extent to which members of officers of the group are

   a. Members of the Communist Party who have openly avowed their affiliation.

   b. Members of the Communist Party, not openly avowed, but shown to be such on the basis of documentary or other proof.

   c. Persons who accept Communist Party discipline as exemplified by the regularity with which they follow or have followed the line of the Communist Party and the number of different unrepudiated affiliations with communist or communist front groups.

2. The extent to which meetings of the group are addressed by Communists or those who regularly or have regularly followed the Communist Party line.

3. The extent to which publications of the group follow the Communist Party line or advertise communist activities.

4. The extent to which the group cooperates with campaigns and activities of the Communist Party or communist front organizations.

5. The extent to which articles written by members of the group are published by communist or communist front organizations.

6. The extent to which films, plays, musicals and entertainers are made use of by the group for subversive propaganda.

7. The extent to which the group is given favorable reports in the communist press.

8. The extent to which the cause of Soviet Russia is espoused by the group as against that of the United States.

9. The extent to which financial aid is received by the group from a person or organization sympathetic to the Communist Party.

C. Groups subversive of the College shall be judged by the following criteria:

1. The extent to which the group considers matters not directly related to its avowed purposes and objectives as defined by its constitution.

2. The extent to which the group flagrantly and deliberately violates the rules of the College set up by the Faculty Council or its agents, or by the officers of the administration for the control of student activities.

3. The extent to which the group or the officials thereof publish or officially present false statements.

4. The extent to which the actions of the group exhibit as its main activity the subversion of the objectives of the College.

D. Groups subversive of the national welfare shall be judged by the following criteria:

1. The extent to which the policies of the group are formulated to effectuate the policies of a foreign government that is an enemy of the United States.

2. The extent to which the group has leaders who consider the allegiance they owe to the United States as subordinate to their obligations to a foreign government that is an enemy of the Unted States or seeks to subvert the Government of the United States.

3. The extent to which the group has leaders who advocate, abet, teach the duty, necessity or desirability, or propriety of overthrowing the Government of the United States by force or violence or by assassination, or has leaders about whom there is reasonable doubt as to their loyalty to the Government of the Unted States.

4. The extent to which the group gives reports, information, aid, or comfort to a person or group of persons who seek to violate the laws of the state or nation, or to use unlawful means to change such laws.

In all cases it is understood that members of the Committee are to use their judgment as to whether or not words or actions are subversive.

Terms are used as defined for the Internal Security Act of 1950.

INVOKES CIVIL RIGHTS LAW:
CINCY JUDGE STYMIES CAFE DISCRIMINATION

By - Al Roman

Cincinnati - History was made last week in Hamilton County when John Held, counter man at the Hub Cafe, 42 East Fifth Street was convicted in Municipal Court for violation of the Ohio Civil Rights Code, and fined $50 and costs.

The complainant was Cyril Michael, Jr., 28, 947 Armory Ave., a designer for the Tag Designer, Main Street, who arrived in Cincinnati from New York on March 6.

Michael told the Call and Post that he didn't make a habit of eating in the same place every day and that he had eaten at the Hub Cafe on two other occasions. Both times he had been served without any trouble.

On March 15 however when he stopped in to eat lunch, he was ignored by the counter man John Held. Finally a Miss Inez Jett, a waitress there, took his order and gave it to the counterman, Michael said he waited another ten minutes and when Miss Jett came to receive the order she was told that it wasn't fixed yet and that he'd do it when he got around to it.

Michael then went to the Manager, who came to the counter and told Held to serve the order for Mr. Michael. After another wait the manager was again called, and this time Held started cleaning the grill, saying he'd fix it "as soon as I'm through cleaning the grill."

Michael had to leave, without eating, because his lunch period was up, but he went to the city hall and swore out a warrant, after first consulting an attorney, William A. Banks.

At the hearing both the judge and prosecutor, former grill-men, said that the grill is never cleaned at noon time. Held was fined $50 and costs, the first person in Hamilton County, reliable sources say, to be convicted of violating Section 12940 of Ohio's General Code.

Michael, a citizen of St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, has been in this country for ten years. He pointed out the difference of the Virgin Island, about 13 miles long and six or seven miles across, and this country about the lack of discrimination because of color. In the Islands, a person is classified according to the money or income he has.

Cincinnati Call Post
April 5, 1952

Ninety-nine per-cent of the population, Michael said, is of the colored race. No business can survive if they attempt to discriminate, citing the example of a New York businessman who opened a cafe, denying service to Negroes and that night he was forced to close his doors.

Michael, a former service man suffered a scalp wound and has a plate in his head. A member of the family, who refused to identify herself, gave food for thought when she told the writer: "It took a foreigner to get a conviction of your civil rights law."

Michael, through his attorney William A. Banks, is filing suit against John Held and the Hub Cafe in civil court as a follow-up of the initial victory. He expects to be awarded the maximum sum of $500.

Virginia Gov. Signs Anti-Ku Klux Klan Law

By CARTER JEWEL

RICHMOND, Va.—(ANP)— Gov. John S. Battle last week signed in to law a measure forbidding public masking by the Ku Klux Klan or similar organizations. The measure also makes unlawful the burning of crosses in public places or on private land without the consent of the owner.

The aim of the law, which was recommended by the governor, is to put a curb on the Ku Klux Klan and similar terroristic organizations It was adopted by state senate as Klan leaders announced their intention of reviving the organization throughout Virginia.

Though crosses have been burned in several communities in the eastern part of Virginia within the past few years, Klan activities have been limited almost entirely to routine programs, initiations, ritual ceremonies and parades. On the contrary in North Carolina Klan members and their sympathizers have figured in several floggings and beating in which both Negroes and whites have been the victims.

In Florida, Illinois, California, Alabama and a few communities in other southern cities Klan members or similar groups have bombed Negro homes and other places in an effort to stem the trend of Negro settlement in good neighborhoods heretofore considered for white families only.

Meawhile, only Virginia and North Carolina and Georgia have taken strong steps to curb the activities of the Klan. The other southern states seem little concerned with Klan terrorism.

Miss Anna Holden

Room 432, 63 Auburn Avenue, N. E.
Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Miss Holden:

Your letter of November 19th addressed to Mrs. Lucy Smith, Director of theDivision of Parks, has been referred to me.

I am very happy to give you a review of the situation in Kentucky about which you inquired. Kentucky is one of those states where a separation of races in public schools, theatres, and any other public place has been an accepted policy for so many years that a reversal of that policy can not be expected to be accomplished over night. However, I believe we are making progress toward recognition of the right of all of our citizens regardless of color.

In a great number of Kentucky Shrines and Museums, which are administered by this department, the general public is invited and no restrictions are imposed. This is true of My Old Kentucky Home, Bardstown; Jefferson Davis Monument, Fairview; Audubon Museum, Henderson; Blue Lick Museum, near Mt. Olivet; Isaac Shelby Memorial, near Danville; Wilderness Road Museum, London; Lincoln Homestead, Springfield; Old Mulkey Meeting House, Tompkinsville; Perryville Battlefield, Perryville; Pioneer Memorial, Harrodsburg; Dr. Thomas Walker Museum, near Barbourville; William Whitley House, near Stanford; and Constitution Square, Danville.

There are a number of other scenic points of interest such as Cumberland Falls, Natural Bridge and Carter Caves which have never been regarded as anything other than belonging to all the people and are for their enjoyment. The accepted custom of separate lodging and eating establishments and recreational areas such as those for picnicking and swimming has been followed.

Kentucky has only one state park set aside exclusively for the colored people. This is Cherokee State Park an area of about 500 acres on Kentucky Lake in Western Kentucky. This park has been under construction for the past two years but a bathhouse, picnic area and boat dock have been operated. We have just completed two cottages and have eight more cottages and a dining room under construction which we expect will be completed by next June 1st. All of these facilities we consider to be comparable to what are provided in parks set aside exclusively for white people, for which similar charges are made. I would like to elaborate on this point. When we began planning for the vacation facilities at Cherokee State Park I had a meeting with a committee of representative colored citizens of Western Kentucky, I raised the question with this committee whether we should build exactly the same type of cottages at Cherokee as those which had been constructed for white people at nearby Kentucky Lake State Park. I explained that we were perfectly willing to build the same type with the understanding that we would have to charge the same rate. The minimum rate for two people in a cottage at Kentucky Lake State Park is $42.00 per week. Members of the committee advised me that they felt that the majority of colored people who would like to take a vacation could not afford to pay such rates and that they felt it would be better to build facilities which could be rented at a more moderate rate. Accordingly, in our plans we have been trying to follow this policy; however, you may find on investigation that the facilities we have built are very fine and are wholly acceptable by those who have been interested in this development.

I do not know of any recent legislation in Kentucky related to amusement and recreational facilities available to white and colored people and do not know of any proposed legislation in this connection.

I believe we can make good progress in Kentucky in developing improved relations between the races if we do not go too fast in trying to impose a pattern on people reluctant because of the background of prejudice and tradition. My personal belief has been that the colored people are entitled to recreational opportunities of their own which they can enjoy until the day arrives that there will not be any restrictions on use of facilities. I have discussed this matter with representative colored citizens and find that there are many who prefer to take this course rather than wait until the day when this problem will not exist.

If I can give you any additional information please call on me.

Yours very truly,

Newspapers of Deep South Liberalize Negro Policies

Survey Shows Significant Change In News Style, Pictures, Personnel

By Robert W. Brown
Editor, Columbus (Ga.) Ledger

MORE than one-half of 34 Deep South daily newspapers responding to a survey are using the titles "Miss" and "Mrs." in referring to Negroes, and some of them are using the title "Mr."

Eleven of the 34 have a daily or weekly column of Negro news, six have a daily or weekly page devoted to the Negro community, and all but four use pictures of Negroes to illustrate news or features.

These facts disclose a significant change in attitudes of the press toward the Negro in the last decade. They also indicate that a new field for Negro professionals is opening in the Deep South—that of journalism.

10 Have Negro Reporters

Ten of the 34 newspapers have Negro reporters on their staffs. Four are contemplating adding a Negro. One editor complained that he has not been able to find a Negro "qualified" for the work.

The survey questionnaire was in five parts designed to develop social and economic, as well as journalistic, factors in the new trend toward a more liberal treatment of the colored community.

Socially, it was developed that those newspapers inaugurating "liberal" Negro news policies have had few or no protests from white subscribers. (One newspaper reported that all of its complaints had originated in the composing room.)

And economically, there was a close and not unexpected correlation between a progressive Negro news policy and the number of Negro subscribers. In one instance, however, a newspaper reported objections from advertisers who did not want their ads appearing on pages carrying columns of Negro news.

Considering a Change

Some of the comments accompanying the survey were interesting and revealing of the new thought in the Deep South. "Frankly," wrote Publisher H. M. Ayers, Anniston (Ala.) Star, "I think it is rather stupid for us not to use the word 'Mr.' or 'Mrs.' in all cases, as it is difficult fully to identify a person when this is not done." (The Star carries a Sunday Negro news column, edited by a Negro with "full free rein," and runs "pictures of prominent Negroes occasionally.")

The Clarksdale (Miss.) Press Register, serving a population approximately 50-50 white and colored, has six Negro correspondents on a string basis. Managing Editor Harry B. Abernethy wrote that while the newspaper has not been using the courtesy titles, he is finding the policy "increasingly difficult to follow, and we are considering a change. (The Press Register "integrates" Negro news, instead of separating it in a special column or on a page designated for the purpose.)

Editor Marian D. Gaines, Pensacola (Fla.) News-Journal, argues for "integration" as against "segregation" of Negro news. The News-Journal uses the titles, and also stresses Negro pictures when they can be published in a "constructive" sense. The use of photos showing Negroes in constructive activities, by the way, has become something of a fetish among a preponderant majority of Deep South editors, the survey indicates.

"We refuse to print special columns or pages on the ground that Negro news should stand on its own, according to merit," Mr. Gaines wrote. "Most newspapers with special pages do not go to white subscribers. Thus whites do not know of the good activities of Negro citizens."

Policies Detailed

State-by-state, here are some of the findings (reporting, of course, only on those newspapers which responded to the questionnaire):

ALABAMA

Anniston Star — Publishes Sunday Negro news column, using titles, publishes photos of Negroes in constructive activities; employs Negro to run Sunday column.

Birmingham News—Carries daily Negro news column, using titles; publishes constructive photos; employs Negro to handle (straight salary), and provides him with Negro news service.

Dothan Eagle — Runs weekly Negro news column, uses titles both in column and ROP, publishes constructive photos, and employs Negro (space rate) to handle column.

Montgomery Advertiser — Carries daily-weekly Negro news page which goes to Negro subscribers only, with titles used on this page. News of "sufficient interest" is picked up for white edition. Negro photos used in white edition only in exceptional cases. Employs Negro to handle page (salary).

Selma Times-Journal—Publishes daily Negro news column, using titles in column only, uses photos ROP on features or constructive news, employs Negro for column (salary).

Tuscaloosa News — Uses titles ROP, with no daily or weekly column or page, uses photos, particularly of Stillman college activities, no Negro employed, none contemplated.

ARKANSAS

El Dorado News—Has no Negro news column or page, does not use titles, but "encourages Negroes to give us news of their activities and occasionally used pictures, has no Negro on staff, does not contemplate adding one.

Little Rock Gazette—No column or page, uses "Mrs." and "Mr." in obits; handles pictures "without discrimination" ROP, has no Negro on staff, but contemplates employing one.

Texarkana Gazette—Uses titles ROP, has no special column or page, uses constructive art, employs no Negro and doesn't plan to.

GEORGIA

Augusta Chronicle — Dropped daily page which went to Negroes only in favor of Sunday page to all subscribers, titles used on page only, employs Negro news editor and assistant, with office maintained in Negro district. Also publishes daily obit column for Negroes, using titles therein.

Negro Page for 30 Years

Gainesville Times — Uses titles ROP, no special column or page, publishes constructive art, and has "tried to obtain a Negro correspondent to cover community and do weekly personal column, but never found a "capable person."

Macon Telegraph — Has carried a Negro news page for 30 years, going to Negro subscribers only, publishes constructive art in both editions, but uses titles only on Negro page. Employs Negro editor for stipulated fee.

Columbus Ledger — Uses titles ROP, publishes constructive art, employs no Negro but contemplates doing so.

Thomasville Times-Enterprise—Uses titles ROP, publishes constructive art, employs no Negro, no plans for one.

LOUISIANA

Alexandria Town Talk — Does not use titles, has no column or page, submits photos to "ordinary test of newsworthiness," employs no Negro, contemplates none.

Baton Rouge Advocate and State Times—Uses titles ROP, uses constructive art, employs no Negro, contemplates none.

MISSISSIPPI

Clarksdale Press Register—Does not use titles, but considering change, publishes weekly Negro news column and also spot news daily ROP, uses constructive art, and employs six Negro correspondents (space rate).

Columbus Commercial Dispatch—Does not use titles, does not use pictures, has no Negro on staff and contemplates none, but uses Negro news ROP according to newsworthiness.

Greenville Delta Democrat — Uses titles ROP, carries no column or page, uses constructive art, employs no Negro but has organized plan of covering the community, and contemplates hiring Negro.

Gulfport Herald — Uses title "Mrs." ROP, with no column or page, uses pictures of Negroes only in sports section, has no Negro on staff, contemplates none.

FLORIDA

Lakeland Ledger—Not presently using titles or running special page or column, but using sports pictures and newsworthy items ROP. "Our paper is expanding and we plan to give organized weekly coverage to Negroes eventually, possibly with special page, including pictures," reports Editor Harris G. Sims.

Miami Herald—Uses title "Mrs." ROP, has no special column or page but "is studying steps to expand its coverage of Negro news" . . . finds Negro leaders feeling that separate column or page "is carrying segregation into the newspaper." Covers newsworthy Negro events, includes Negro schools in annual Herald Essay Contest and contest winners met with white at presentation luncheon this year with no complaints. In time, might employ Negro reporter.

Constructive Art

Pensacola News-Journal — Uses titles ROP, no column or page, uses constructive art, employs no

Mark 125th Year Of Negro Press

CHICAGO—A dinner, observing the 125th aniversary of the first American Negro newspaper, was held here, Dec. 7. The meeting marked the opening of a drive by the Chicago Urban League to raise $100,000 for a new headquarters.

Enoc Waters, Jr., executive editor of the Chicago Defender, told of the original Negro newspaper, Freedom's Journal, started in New York in 1827 by John B. Russwurm, who was the first of his race to receive a college education in America.

The speaker said names given to early newspapers were indicative of their militant character.

Covering the War Front With President-Elect

THREE REPORTERS . . . THREE ENGINES—Riding aboard MATS Constellation No. 8609 high above the Pacific Ocean, Bob Considine of INS, Don Whitehead of AP, and Merriman Smith of INS haven't a care in the world except to keep the American public informed about every phase of President-Elect Eisenhower's dramatic and historic visit to Korea . . . and the sudden news that their big plane is cruising into Wake Island on three out of four motors. Five hours late, they caught up with Ike's party on Iwo Jima and "hot dinner in quonset hut, officers mess and to bed." Up at daybreak to report Ike's ascent of Mount Suribachi in a jeep (re-enacted by special request).

POKER FACED Jim Hagerty, the General's press secretary, shuffles the cards and chuckles to himself at the way he and the reporters kept a secret since Nov. 13 when he advised the "select few" at Augusta to "get the shots" for cholera, etc. An unidentified player (aces back-to-back) takes the dough.

FILM FOOTAGE is the only thing on the mind of Dave Oliver, Pathe News, while relaxing. (Meanwhile Merriman Smith is writing in his diary: "Colder than the devil. Two more people than bunks on our plane, so I blew up my air mattress and picked out a bench in the men's room. Fairly pleasant."

Dear Mr. Clement:

I went out on a limb and told the Southern Regional Conference that you would be able to help them get some information that they want in connection with a survey that is being made. Now I am asking, will you?

We are enclosing a copy of their last letter to me which shows the questions for which they would like to have answers.

Will you let me know if you can do?

With kindest personal regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

Memo to: Mr. Robert McKay

From: Anna Holden, Southern Regional Council

Attached is summary of the recreation material we gathered for the law journal article.

All letters and pamphlets material was drawn from are segregated in a box at the office. If you would like use of any or all you are welcome to them.

There is an article in the December, 1952 CRISIS entitled "Yonder Sits the Rocking Chair" which surveys recreational facilities available to Negroes. You may borrow our copy if you like.

Will be glad to answer any questions about this.

Dear Anna:

I delayed for a few days acknowledging the collection of materials you left for me in the belief that I would be able to go through the papers fairly carefully the first part of this week. Now I see that it will be several days yet before I can give them more than cursory attention; so let me thank you now for what is obviously an extensive and helpful survey. It makes me hope that I will be able to go ahead and assemble my own data in a fashion that will make possible completion of an article a matter of only six weeks or so from now.

I am sure that I will have questions once I get back into the problem; so of course I will take advantage of your offer to come back to you for more assistance. Thank you again.

You might tell Harold that we managed our lunch on Saturday on a non-segregated basis without incident. I was interested to note the eagerness of all coaches and debaters (so far as I could tell) to participate in the event, so that it turned out my estimate of numbers was too cautious.

Sincerely,

Bob McKay

A Velde Committee 'File' Dissected

WHEN Chairman Harold H. Velde (R.-Ill.) recently indicated the possibility that his House Committee on Un-American Activities might investigate alleged subversion among America's churches and churchmen, one of the first to denounce the idea was G. Bromley Oxnam, Methodist Bishop of Washington.

Soon thereafter, Rep. Donald L. Jackson, a member of the committee, came to Velde's defense in a House speech on March 17. In the course of his address, he assailed Bishop Oxnam in one of the most violent attacks on a clergyman ever made in Congress.

"Bishop Oxnam has been to the Communist front what Man O' War was to thoroughbred racing," Jackson said. He went on to describe Bishop Oxnam as a man who "served God on Sunday and the Communist front for the balance of the week."

Jackson then added: "If reprinting Bishop Oxnam's record of aid and comfort to the Communist front would serve any useful purpose, I would ask permission to insert it here, but suffice it to say that the record is available to any member who cares to request it from the (House Un-American Activities) Committee."

Two days later, Rep. Jackson declined to make public this information that he said was available. In response to a request for it, he wrote: "The detailed documentation is very voluminous and would be much too lengthy to include in a letter of this kind. However, in general, Bishop Oxnam is alleged to have been associated in the past with the following groups and organizations which have been cited as subversive and Communist." He then listed 12 agencies which were mentioned in Bishop Oxnam's file.

The Washington Post believed that reprinting the committee record would in fact serve a useful purpose, to see if it was one "of aid and comfort to the Communist front," to determine just what the "detailed documentation" and "very voluminous" record was, how accurate it was, and whether Bishop Oxnam did have associations with the cited organizations.

The newspaper obtained the committee file and submitted it to Bishop Oxnam for his comment. His reply, printed below, reproduces the committee file in full (except for a summary condensation of one newspaper article).

Comment on Item No. 1

I did deliver an address at the Indiana State Reformatory, entitled, "International Understanding as a Basis for World Peace." It was delivered at a time, if I recall correctly, when the oil issue in Mexico was current and the question of using military force was being discussed.

The important thing in this connection is that this paragraph should not be in the files of the committee; there is no reference here to any subversive organization. Nor is there any subversive idea expressed. My statement will stand moral scrutiny and is in keeping with the best traditions of this land.

Item No. 2

A LETTERHEAD of the League for the Organization of Progress dated February 2, 1931, reflects the name of G. Bromley Oxman, president of De Pauw University, as a member of the board. The League for the Organization of Progress has never been cited as a front organization. It was an international organization founded in Paris in 1912, with headquarters in Bern, Switzerland. The American office was located at Yellow Springs, Ohio. The league has long been out of existence.

Comment on Item No. 2

The paragraph itself states that the organization was never cited as a front group. Why, then, does it appear here? Actually, the league was founded in 1912 by such men as Thomas Masaryk, later President of Czechoslovakia; Ramsay MacDonald, later British Prime Minister, and Edouard Herriot, later French Prime Minister. It was composed of scholars and political leaders, and dedicated to deepening international understanding, strengthening international cooperation and maintaining the free way of life. Its publications had a distinguished list of contributors, including Sir Gilbert Murray of Oxford, F. W. Taussig of Harvard, Quincy Wright of Chicago and Irving Fisher of Yale.

Item No. 3

A LETTERHEAD of the National Religion and Labor Foundation, dated 1932, reflects the name of G. Bromley Oxnam as a member of the national committee.

was organized in 1915 and is the American section of the International Fellowship of Reconciliation. Organized under the alleged motive to reconcile people, it maintains that class war is necessary and that all must work for the reorganization of society, and replace the present system of individual capitalism by collective ownership. The public records and files of this committee contain no further reference to any affiliation of Bishop Oxnam with the Fellowship of Reconciliation.

Comment on Item No. 4

The organization is, I believe, an absolute pacifist group. I have never held the absolute pacifist view and therefore could not have belonged to such a group. I was never a member and never signed any statement put out by it. In any case, the two paragraphs are quite irrelevant, since the Fellowship is not listed as subversive and as far as I know has never been cited as such by any Government agency.

Item No. 5

A LETTERHEAD of the Committee on Militarism in Education, dated October 1, 1935, reflects the name of Bromley Oxnam as a member of its national council. Kirby Page, a member of the national council, testified before the Special Committee on Un-American Activities on June 15, 1943. He stated that the Committee on Militarism in Education was opposed to military education in civilian schools. The following is quoted from a letter of the Committee on Militarism in Education dated September 22, 1930.

". . . Militarism in education goes on, accumulating power and tradition, aided by War Department money and resources . . . by propaganda, glorified by every device of military romance in literally hundreds of American colleges, universities and high schools, building that blind, unreasoning, emotional response of military symbols which has so often swayed and deceived men in a crisis. Against this glorification of the military method and machine, the peace movement has accomplished little as yet. The spearhead of the struggle against militarism in schools and colleges has been this committee. It has waged peace with intelligence and courage, showing not only the zeal of the peace advocate but the sound methods of the social scientist. Specializing on this one issue, it occupies a unique place in current peace endeavors, duplicating no other agency . . ."

In November, 1942, when Bishop Oxnam spoke at a Boston meeting sponsored by the Congress of American-Soviet Friendship, he "thought he was in good company." A letterhead of the organization at that time shows why.

Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam as a national sponsor.

Comment on Item No. 7

It is quite true that my sympathies were with the Republicans in Spain. I abhor the Franco regime just as I abhor the Stalin regime in Russia and opposed wherever I could the Hitler regime and the Mussolini regime.

I did authorize my name to be included in what I think was called the Inter-Faith Division of the American Committee for Spanish Freedom. If it was originally Communist-sponsored I did not know it, but I did subsequently resign when it became apparent to me that Communist sympathizers, at least, had moved into positions of influence in this organization.

Anyone acquainted with the facts knows name of Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam as chairman of the executive board.

The Washington Daily News of April 7, 1947, contains a news item concerning the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship. In the article, the name of Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam is listed as one who had withdrawn from the organization. The date of Bishop Oxnam's withdrawal is not mentioned.

Comment on Item No. 10

On November 8, 1942, I addressed a Boston meeting known as "Salute to Our Russian Ally." Among the sponsors were Secretary and Mrs. Cordell Hull, Lord and Lady Halifax, Secretary and Mrs. Jesse Jones, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Stettinius, jr., Maj. George Fielding Eliot,

Item No. 12

The Citizens Victory Committee for Harry Bridges issued an undated press release in regard to an open letter addressed to President Roosevelt by more than 300 clergymen throughout the country, urging that the deportation order against Harry Bridges be set aside. The letter, dated April 22, 1943, and signed by the Right Rev. Edward L. Parsons, states, in part: "Clearly, Mr. Bridges has aroused the animosity of an influential minority because of his successful union activities and his political and economics beliefs." The name of the Right Rev. G. Bromley Oxnam, Methodist Bishop, Boston, Mass., is listed as one who joined with Bishop Parsons in signing the letter.

tailed documentation" and "very voluminous" record was, how accurate it was, and whether Bishop Oxnam did have associations with the cited organizations.

The newspaper obtained the committee file and submitted it to Bishop Oxnam for his comment. His reply, printed below, reproduces the committee file in full (except for a summary condensation of one newspaper article).

In 40 years of work in the Methodist Church, Bishop Oxnam has been Bishop of Omaha, Boston, New York and now Washington. He has held, among other high clerical positions, that of president of the Federal Council of Churches. He is now one of the presidents of the World Council of Churches.

By G. Bromley Oxnam

Methodist Bishop of Washington

IN referring to my file in the House Committee on Un-American Activities, but in not disclosing it, Rep. Jackson deftly invited his colleagues and Americans in general to draw the most sinister conclusions about me. Yet at the same time he provided no evidence or data for them to examine objectively or for me to comment upon, explain or refute if I could.

Fortunately, The Washington Post has secured the dossier on me in the House Un-American Activities Committee and has given it to me for comment. What follows is the committee file, which I have divided into numbered items, and my response in setting forth the facts.

Item No. 1

THE Washington Star of February 10, 1930, carries a news item datelined Indiana State Reformatory, February 9. The article refers to a speech made by Dr. G. Bromley Oxnam, president of De Pauw University, to the inmates of the reformatory. Dr. Oxnam is reported as decrying the practice of nations in entering into secret treaties, and declaring that the slogan of "America First" must be interpreted as meaning America first in world service, and not "to be the first to go into Mexico to steal oil lands."

INFORMATION FROM THE FILES OF THE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

SUBJECT: G. Bromley Oxnam

While records, files, and publications of this Committee reveal the following information concerning the individual named above:

The Washington Star of February 10, 1930, carries a news item datelined Indiana State Reformatory, February 9. The article refers to a speech made by Dr. G. Bromley Oxnam, President of De Pauw University, to the inmates of the reformatory. Dr. Oxnam is reported as decrying the practice of nations in entering into secret treaties, and declaring that the slogan of "America First" must be interpreted as meaning America first in world service, and not "to be the first to go into Mexico to steal oil lands."

A letterhead of the League for the Organization of Japanese Aliens, February 8, 1936, includes the name of G. Bromley Oxnam [illegible] as a member of this board. The League for the Organization of Japanese Aliens is cited as a Japan organization [illegible] contributors, including Sir Gilbert Murray of Oxford, F. W. Taussig of Harvard, Quincy Wright of Chicago and Irving Fisher of Yale.

Item No. 3

A LETTERHEAD of the National Religion and Labor Foundation, dated 1932, reflects the name of G. Bromley Oxnam as a member of the national committee.

The National Religion and Labor Foundation, which has not been cited as a front organization, was founded in 1932 by Francis J. McConnell, Jerome Davis and John A. Ryan. The official publication was Economic Justice. The first issue of Economic Justice (November, 1932) printed a cartoon of Jesus by Art Young, New Masses cartoonist. With the cartoon of Jesus appeared these words: "Reward for Information Leading to Apprehension of Jesus Christ. Wanted—for Sedition, Criminal Anarchy, Vagrancy, and Conspiring to 'Overthrow the Established Government.'" The National Religion and Labor Foundation apparently is still in existence. There is no record in the public files of this committee showing Dr. Oxnam's disaffiliation with that organization.

Comment on Item No. 3

Once again, the report states that the organization was never cited as subversive, so why does the material in these two paragraphs appear in the report? I was a member for some years and subsequently resigned, not because I regarded the group as subversive, but because I did not have the time to sit in on meetings when policy was being determined. It is worth noting that one of the founders, Monsignor John A. Ryan, was a revered leader of the Roman Catholic Church and one of its most distinguished sociologists.

Item No. 4

ON January 30, 1933, the Fellowship of Reconcilation released a petition addressed to the President of the United States urging the recognition of the Soviet Union. The name of G. Bromley Oxnam, president of De Pauw University, appears as one of the signers.

The Fellowship of Reconcilation, allegedly a strictly pacifist organization, of the struggle against militarism in schools and colleges has been this committee. It has waged peace with intelligence and courage, showing not only the zeal of the peace advocate but the sound methods of the social scientist. Specializing on this one issue, it occupies a unique place in current peace endeavors, duplicating no other agency . . ."

Comment on Item No. 5

Once again, the report lists an organization never listed as subversive, as far as I know. I belonged to the organization; its purpose was to block what was regarded as growing militarism in education. The church to which I have the honor to belong has gone on record as opposed to compulsory military training. I believe in a strong national defense but I do not believe that compulsory military training contributes significantly to it.

This, clearly, is a debatable issue, but it has nothing whatsoever to do with subversion.

BISHOP G. BROMLEY OXNAM

Item No. 6

THE DAILY WORKER of September 24, 1937 (page 6), contains an article about a meeting to be held at Madison Square Garden on October 1. This meeting, held under the auspices of the American League Against War and Fascism and the American Friends of the Chinese People, featured William E. Dodd as the speaker. The name of Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam appears as a sponsor of the meeting.

Comment on Item No. 6

I was unaware that the Daily Worker is to be regarded as competent testimony. I never belonged to the American League Against War and Fascism nor to the American Friends of the Chinese People. I never sponsored any meeting under the auspices of these organizations. I was fundamentally opposed to the whole idea of the so-called "United Front" and at exactly the time when it enjoyed greatest support. A column of mine, reproduced elsewhere with this article and entitled, "United Front, a Menace," must make it perfectly clear that I could not have cooperated and did not cooperate with such an agency.

Item No. 7

LETTERHEADS of the Medical Bureau and North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy dated July 6, 1938, and February 2, 1939, list the name of the Mussolini regime.

I did authorize my name to be included in what I think was called the Inter-Faith Division of the American Committee for Spanish Freedom. If it was originally Communist-sponsored I did not know it, but I did subsequently resign when it became apparent to me that Communist sympathizers, at least, had moved into positions of influence in this organization.

Anyone acquainted with the facts knows that Franco was an ally of Hitler and I believe that opposition to Franco was thoroughly justified. As World War II came to a close, however, I received communications from this organization which aroused my suspicions. In March, 1945, I refused to become a member of its executive board. In October of that year, I declined to go along with a suggestion from the group on setting aside a day of prayer for Franco prisoners. In November, 1946, I received a letter from a group called "Action Committee to Free Spain Now," which I had never joined, and found my name on the letterhead under the heading, "American Committee for Spanish Freedom." I wrote at once asking my name to be withdrawn from the list of sponsors.

Item No. 8

A PHOTOSTATIC copy of a letterhead of the American League for Peace and Democracy dated April 6, 1939, reflected the name of Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam as a national sponsor.

Comment on Item No. 8

I was never a member of the American League for Peace and Democracy, never a national sponsor and never had anything whatsoever to do with the organization.

Item No. 9

THE June-July, 1941, issue of the Protestant Digest reflects the name of G. Bromley Oxnam as an editorial adviser.

Comment on Item No. 9

I was invited to serve on the editorial advisory board of the Protestant Digest in March, 1940, and accepted, having noted that members of the editorial board included some of the most distinguished religious and education leaders in the Nation. Less than two years later, in February, 1942, I wrote the editor of the journal submitting my resignation and asking that my name be dropped from the list of editorial advisers. I told the editor that the magazine was engaged in many activities relating to national policy and legislation quite apart from the magazine itself, and that statements were issued from it implying that these had the approval of the editorial advisers whereas in fact they had never been considered by that group.

Item No. 10

A CALL to the Congress of American-Soviet Friendship, to be held November 6-8, 1943, reflects the name of Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam as a sponsor of that congress.

The Daily Worker of October 6, 1944 (Page 9), carries a news item concerning a rally sponsored by the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship, celebrating the Twenty-Seventh Anniversary of the Founding of the Soviet Union and the Eleventh Anniversary of Diplomatic Relations Between the United States and the Soviet Union. Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam is listed as one of the sponsors.

A letterhead of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship dated March 13, 1946, reflects the name of Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam as a sponsor.

A letterhead of the Massachusetts Council of American-Soviet Friendship dated December 15, 1943, reflects the drawal is not mentioned.

Comment on Item No. 10

On November 8, 1942, I addressed a Boston meeting known as "Salute to Our Russian Ally." Among the sponsors were Secretary and Mrs. Cordell Hull, Lord and Lady Halifax, Secretary and Mrs. Jesse Jones, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Stettinius, jr., Maj. George Fielding Eliot, William Green, Robert A. Millikan, Owen D. Young and, if I may say so to cap the climax, Sen. Kenneth McKellar. There were also distinguished leaders of religion such as the Right Rev. Henry Knox Sherrill. Frankly, I thought I was in good company.

In March, 1943, I believe I agreed to serve as sponsor for a Madison Square Garden meeting of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship. Among those who had already accepted were William L. Batt, then vice chairman of the War Production Board; Dean Christan Gauss of Princeton University; Prof. Albert Einstein, and Bishop Henry St. George Tucker. I believed that we ought to give the fullest cooperation to cementing Russian-American friendship since Russia was our ally in a war in which our very life was at stake. I might point out that both of my sons were in the Army.

But in that same month of April, 1943, I received a proposed open letter from the organization which I did not believe temperate and wise, and refused to sign it or subsequent amended drafts. I also ignored a request from Corliss Lamont to serve as a member of a special ministers' committee.

I was elected chairman of a Massachusetts Council of American-Soviet Friendship on April 6, 1943. In August, 1943, I resigned the chairmanship and told the group that I would not have accepted the post had I known that it intended to undertake a financial appeal. In December, 1945, three years later, I found that the Massachusetts group had been carrying my name as "Honorary Chairman" and requested that it be dropped.

In April, 1944, I declined to accept membership on the board of directors of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship. In November of that year, however, I did offer prayer at the mass meeting held in Madison Square Garden under the auspices of that group. The prayer was later reprinted on the cover of "Reader's Scope."

Item No. 11

ON December 26, 1941, the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties issued a press release to the effect that an open letter had been addressed to the President and Congress of the United States, opposing antilabor legislation as a dire threat to the unity essential for the defeat of Japan and her Axis partners. The name of Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam appears as one of the signers of the letter.

In January, 1943, the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties addressed a message to the House of Representatives. This message was a plea for the discontinuance of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities. One of the reasons given was: "The Dies Committee, by continuing and repeated attacks on our great ally, the Soviet Union, has utilized its resources to obstruct the cooperation of the United Nations, which is a prerequisite for victory." The name of Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam appears as one of the signers of this message.

Comment on Item No. 11

I never at any time belonged to the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties, and never signed any statement for or on behalf of this organization.

The letter, dated April 14, 1943, and signed by the Right Rev. Edward L. Parsons, states, in part: "Clearly, Mr. Bridges has aroused the animosity of an influential minority because of his successful union activities and his political and economics beliefs." The name of the Right Rev. G. Bromley Oxnam, Methodist Bishop, Boston, Mass., is listed as one who joined with Bishop Parsons in signing the letter.

The Citizens Victory Committee for Harry Bridges, located at 1775 Broadway, New York City, was one of four such organizations created for the defense of Harry Bridges. The others were: the Citizens Committee for Harry Bridges at 1265 Broadway, New York City; the Harry Bridges Defense Committee of San Francisco, with branches in Los Angeles, Seattle and Portland, and the Harry Bridges Victory Committee of San Francisco.

The Attorney General of the United States has listed the Citizens' Committee for Harry Bridges as a Communist organization. The same classification applies to the other three organizations.

Comment on Item No. 12

The clear inference from these paragraphs (although they never say so in that many words) is that I belonged to the Citizens Victory Committee for Harry Bridges, an organization cited as subversive. I never belonged to this organization.

I cannot say whether I ever signed the letter referred to, drafted by Bishop Parsons, for my files covering letters written in Boston are not available to me here. Nor do I know if the Citizens Victory Committee referred to in the record ever used Bishop Parsons' letter. The important matter is that I never belonged to that organization and never signed any letter for it.

Item No. 13

A LETTERHEAD of the American Civil Liberties Union, dated February 8, 1946, reflects the name of Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam as a member of its national committee. A Special Committee to Investigate Communist Activities in the United States (Fish Committee), in a report dated January 17, 1931, said:

"The American Civil Liberties Union is closely affiliated with the Communist movement in the United States, and fully 90 percent of its efforts are on behalf of Communists who have come into conflict with the law. It claims to stand for free speech, free press and free assembly, but it is quite apparent that the main function of the ACLU is to attempt to protect the Communists in their advocacy of force and violence to overthow the Government, replacing the American flag and erecting a Soviet government in place of the republican form of government guaranteed to each State by the Federal Constitution."

In a report dated January 3, 1939, a Special Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities and Propaganda in the United States (Dies Committee) said:

"The committee heard testimony with reference to the Civil Liberties Union. Some witnesses listed this organization as communistic, while other witnesses denied it was communistic. We received in evidence a number of pamphlets distributed by the Civil Liberties Union, which speak for themselves. From the evidence before us, we are not in a position to definitely state whether or not this organization can properly be classed as a Communist organization."

Comment on Item No. 13

The transcript of the proceedings of the House Committee on Un-American Activities of October 23, 1939, quotes the committee chairman as saying, "This committee found last year, in its reports,

The Citizen 'Can Be Damaged Without Redress'

there was not any evidence that the American Civil Liberties Union was a Communist organization . . . So far as the chair is concerned . . . here is an organization that the committee has already said is not a Communist organization."

Again, on February 17, 1952, in a document issued by the House Un-American Activities Committee, the statement is made: "The American Civil Liberties Committee has never been cited as Red-dominated, or as Communist, by any official organization charged with the duty of investigating subversive activity."

Thus we have the fantastic situation of the House Un-American Activities Committee using material from another committee (the Fish Committee), apparently for purposes of discrediting me, when its official record has come to precisely the opposite conclusion about the organization in question. For purposes of denouncing me, the American Civil Liberties Committee is characterized as a Red-front organization in the files of the very committee which has twice declared that the organization is no such thing.

Item No. 14

THE letterhead of the American Committee for Spanish Freedom dated January 21, 1946, reflects the name of Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam as a sponsor.

Comment on Item No. 14

See comment under Item 7 above.

Item No. 15

A LETTERHEAD of the Methodist Federation for Social Service dated October 4, 1928, reflects the name of G. Bromley Oxnam as executive secretary, while another letterhead of the same organization dated April 12, 1946, reflects the name of G. Bromley Oxnam as a member of the executive committee.

The Bureau County Republican (otherwise unidentified) of May 18, 1939, carries a front-page story concerning the Methodist Federation for Social Services.

[The article is then quoted in full. Too long for reproduction here, its pertinent points are:

[At a meeting of the Federation in Kansas City in May, 1939, Oxnam was one of the five bishops who "endorsed the Federation's platform for the overthrow of the present capitalistic system in the United States and favored its replacement with a social planning order." Pamphlets of the Federation circulated at the meeting "declare that under the new social order, private ownership of property is to come to an end. Under their system, there are to be no capitalists. Private property . . . is to be taken over without compensation to the owners."

[Oxnam said he thoroughly endorses the Federation and the thing it stands for. He read from the masthead of the Federation's literature a statement of the Federation's purposes, declaring:

["(The Federation) rejects the method of the struggle for profit as the economic basis for society; (and) seeks to replace it with social, economic planning in order to develop a society without class distinction profit as the economic base for society and seeks to replace it with social-economic planning to develop a society without class or group discriminations and privileges."

I personally objected to this in writing to Dr. Ward. I stated that this was pledging the Federation to a particular economic program, and that I did not think it became a religious organization to be so pledged. I do not believe in identifying the Gospel with a particular economic, political or social system.

This marked the beginning of a fundamental difference of opinion, as far as I was concerned, within the organization. I opposed Dr. Ward's proposed statement at the 1932 General Conference of the Methodist Church. There was a debate and floor fight, and Dr. Ward's position failed to carry.

Later, however, it was the turn of the group with which I was associated to fail. With the comnig of Rev. Jack McMichael to the executive secretaryship of the Federation, its publications became less factual and more propagandistic. When I took up my work in the New York area in 1944, I found myself in growing disagreement with the Federation's activities. I believed that the only answer to the problem was to create an official Commission on Social Service. At a New York meeting of a chapter of the Federation, I took its bulletins and showed how irresponsible they had become. I particularly objected to the continual misrepresentation in them of John Foster Dulles, Toyohito Kagawa and Martin Niemoller. Jack McMichael and others who were present were incensed by my address.

The necessary corrections were not made, despite my arguments with McMichael about their need, and the attacks on Dulles continued. I therefore resigned from the Federation and have had no relationship with it since. I do not have the date, but I should judge it was 1947 or 1948.

The House Un-American Activities Committee file on me in this connection, it should be noted, is comprised almost entirely in the reprint of the article in the Bureau County Republican, which the committee does not identify. Actually, it is a small paper published in Princeton, Ill. Why this little paper should give its front-page story to a meeting of the Federation in Kansas City no one knows. Whether a reporter was present at the meeting or not, the reporting is so inaccurate as to reveal journalism at its lowest level. This is not reporting; it is deliberate falsification.

The statement that I "endorsed the Federation's platform for the overthrow of the present capitalistic system in the United States" is absolutely false.

Also, I categorically deny the statement that I read aloud and endorsed the masthead of the Federation's literature denouncing the profit motive. I was not in favor of this part of the Federation's program, and had opposed it, as stated above.

As for being trained by Dr. Ward and taking dictation from him, the facts are that I had done secretarial work for Dr. Ward and took the dictation of his little book, "Poverty and Wealth," which was a Sunday School textbook and not a volume "known to all radical leaders."

Bishop Flayed 'United Front'

IN 1935, WHEN Bishop Oxnam was writing a newspaper column, he had occasion to comment on the all-too-popular movement of the day known as "The United Front." His column may conceivably be a more accurate representation of his views than the material gathered in his House Un-American Activities Committee file. It is reprinted below.

The United Front—A Menace

AMERICANS MUST NOT accept Communist leadership in order to avoid Fascist leadership.

Communists tell us that a Fascist dictatorship is inevitable in the United States. Hence, they urge "The United Front" to combat war and fascism. By that they mean the union of socialists, liberals, pacifists, churchmen and progressives of evry stripe, for the purpose of insuring peace and resisting fascism. Heretofore, these groups have never united. In fact, they have been convinced enemies of communism. Unfortunately, many liberals who fear fascism have been duped by the idea of the United Front. Its fundamental purpose is NOT to fight fascism.

Earl Browder, secretary of the Communist Party of the United States, has revealed its menacing objective. He writes, "The United Front is not a peace pact with the reformists. The United Front is a method of struggle against the reformists, against the social-fascists, for the possession of the masses."

THE OFFICIAL ORGAN of the Communist Party of the United States, The Communist, in its January, 1935, issue stated, "The United Front is at the present time the main road along which the masses will be prepared for the struggle for Soviet power under the leadership of the Communist Party."

Intelligent Americans will denounce the proposal and seek to reveal its essential purpose. The Communist has no other purpose in the United Front program than to disrupt the American Federation of Labor and to insinuate himself into progressive movements in order to control them. Americans who are interested in maintaining the liberties of political democracy will repudiate the United Front.

Its real purpose is Divided Ranks. It is "the main road along which the masses will be prepared for the struggle." And the struggle, to use the Communist's own words, is "the violent overthrow of the whole existing capitalistic order, for the establishment of the proletariat."

The United Front is a dangerous Gift Horse.

Comment on Item No. 18

Does anyone object to the statement that we must not flirt with Franco in order to stop Stalin? Why is this recorded? Franco was an ally of Hitler. He is a Fascist dictator. I do not care to deal with him. If we need bases in Spain, we will consider that upon its military merits; but to deal with this man is to say to the peoples of the world that our objection to dictatorship and violence is not based upon a moral principle but upon expediency.

Item No. 19

THE DAILY Worker of June 22, 1949, carries a news item datelined Boston, June 21, to the effect that Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam assailed congressional witch-hunts and said:

"Free men may well be alarmed at the action of the House Un-American Activities Committee in asking for a list of textbooks used by schools and colleges. At the very moment calm and critical minds are essential, leaders in the grip of fear become hysterical and adopt procedures destructive of democracy. More time given to constructive legislation designed to demonstrate the effectiveness of dynamic democracy, and less time to character assassination, would produce greater benefits."

Comment on Item No. 19

May I ask, again, what is the objection to this statement? Does the committee believe it is beyond criticism? Does it think itself competent to pass upon textbooks in the Nation? The paragraph quoted stands on its own feet.

Item No. 20

THE WASHINGTON Evening Star of May 26, 1950, carries a news item datelined Boston, May 26. Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam is reported as calling for joint action between Protestants and Catholics to meet the onslaught of communism.

Comment on Item No. 20

Why is this included—as criticism or commendation? Is this an attempt, after first recording hearsay and false testimony in my file, to appear balanced by presenting a commendatory item?

Item No. 21

BISHOP Oxnam addressed a letter to the Committee on Un-American Activities on May 11, 1950. In it, he stated that he never belonged to the American League Against War and Fascism. He further stated he thought it would be fundamentally unfair to say he belonged to the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship wtihout saying that his affiliation with this organization was during the war, when Russia was one of our allies.

Comment on Item No. 21

If the House committee now knows that I do not now belong to the organization,

Comment on Item No. 24

This is the most inexcusable and vicious section of the entire report. This list would lead a reader to believe that I have been related to the organizations listed.

From the material presented above, I think it is clear to anyone that I had no relation with the American Friends of the Chinese People, the American League

Conclusions

THE DISCLOSURE above of the committee file on me invites a few conclusions on the nature of the Un-American Activities Committee's files in general.

First of all, what is a Committee file? It is obvious that it is nothing more than a collection of newspaper clippings, letterheads, letters and excerpts of speeches, etc. Clearly it can and does include any statements, true or false, that a personal enemy or crackpot may submit.

One might naively suppose that the purpose of the file was to give a Committee member some sort of indication of the true nature of the individual in question—his leanings, activities, point of view and associations in a balanced way so some informed judgment could be reached. If my file is typical, it is certain that nothing of the sort was intended; the effort was devoted almost exclusively to present me in the worst possible light, to collect all invidious references to me without any attempt to check their accuracy, and made no reference to the essential nature of my work over years, which has been public, open and easily available.

The next question is what use is made of the file. The answer is that a "research staff" selects from the file and prepares a report which, I have discovered from personal experience, is released in full or in part to citizens who request it.

It would appear that the "research staff" would be under obligation to find out whether the material selected and broadcast is true or false. But nothing of the sort takes place. When pinned down and asked explicitly, and only then, Committee members piously assert to an inquirer that the report "carries no conclusion of this Committee" and that the Committee never vouches for the correctness of any newspaper item.

This is deceit at its most vicious. What usually happens is demonstrated by the [illegible] last month by Rep. Jackson owners."

[Oxnam said he thoroughly endorses the Federation and the thing it stands for. He read from the masthead of the Federation's literature a statement of the Federation's purposes, declaring:

["(The Federation) rejects the method of the struggle for profit as the economic basis for society; (and) seeks to replace it with social, economic planning in order to develop a society without class distinction and privilege."

[Other Federation literature praises social ownership, and lauds the Soviet Union as being the only country "that has a complete social action plan."

[Oxnam also paid high tribute to a leading Federation figure, Dr. Harry F. Ward, was trained by him and as a student took dictation from Dr. Ward "in the writing of some of his books known to all radical readers."]

Comment on Item No. 15

I was never executive secretary of the Federation although I was a member and served on its executive committee for many years.

The Federation was founded in 1907, but history on it in the files of the House Un-American Committee begins only in 1928. The best answer to any criticism of the Federation up to that period, or up to 1932, for that matter, is in the work of an official commission of the General Conference of the Methodist Church, which surveyed the whole field of social service and filed a unanimous report in 1932. It gave complete endorsement to the Federation and its work.

At that time, the Federation's constitution declared that its object "shall be to deepen within the Church the sense of social obligation and opportunity, to study social problems from the Christian point of view and to promote social service in the spirit of Jesus Christ."

To be referred to in the House Committee files as an officer of the Federation in 1928 in such a way as to indicate subversive interests on my part is hardly worthy of any investigating committee.

I do not recall the exact date when the purpose of the Federation referred to in the quotation just above was changed. I believe its revision was drafted by Dr. Ward. The proposed revision included a statement declaring: "The Federation rejects the method of the struggle for [illegible] head of the Federation's literature denouncing the profit motive. I was not in favor of this part of the Federation's program, and had opposed it, as stated above.

As for being trained by Dr. Ward and taking dictation from him, the facts are that I had done secretarial work for Dr. Ward and took the dictation of his little book, "Poverty and Wealth," which was a Sunday School textbook and not a volume "known to all radical leaders."

As for the story declaring that I favored confiscation of property, the truth is I believe in private property and find the whole idea of confiscation abhorrent.

Item No. 16

THE WASHINGTON Post of November 24, 1948, page 1, carries a news item datelined Newark, N. J., regarding a speech made by Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam before the Newark Conference of the Methodist Church. Bishop Oxnam is reported to have denounced the Committee on Un-American Activities. He is quoted as saying:

"Protestants believe that the conspirators who would destroy our freedom can be ferreted out and properly punished better by the painstaking and patriotic procedures of the Federal Bureau of Investigation than by the hearsay and un-American procedures of this committee."

Bishop Oxnam was evidently referring to a pamphlet issued by the Committee on Un-American Activities entitled "100 Things You Should Know About Communism and Religion," wherein it was reported that the Methodist Federation for Social Action, while not an official church unit, is trying to use the prestige of the Methodist Church to promote the line of the Communist Party.

Comment on Item No. 16

Is it to be assumed that an American who criticizes the Committee on Un-American Activities has become subversive? Surely the committee does not think itself sacrosanct. At that time the chairman of the committee was under indictment for criminal activities, and was later convicted of them.

The paragraph of my speech that was quoted will stand scrutiny.

I was not, as it happens, referring to [illegible] the main road along which the masses will be prepared for the struggle." And the struggle, to use the Communist's own words, is "the violent overthrow of the whole existing capitalistic order, for the establishment of the proletariat."

The United Front is a dangerous Gift Horse.

the pamphlet issued by the committee, "100 Things You Should Know About Communism." The full text of my speech makes it clear that I was referring to the un-American activities of the Un-American Activities Committee, which was aping totalitarian practices in a current campaign to identify Protestant churches with communism.

Item No. 17

THE WASHINGTON Star of December 8, 1948, at page 7, carries a news item datelined Buck Hills Falls, Pa., December 8, in which Bishop Oxnam is reported as having said that the House Committee on Un-American Activities is un-American itself for attempting to pin the Communist label on some churchmen and church groups. Also, Bishop Oxnam is reported as saying that such "absurd charges" are "disguised efforts to silence men on the pulpit by threatening to call them Communist."

Comment on Item No. 17

I do not have a summary of this address before me, but whether I did or did not criticize the committee has nothing to do with subversion.

Item No. 18

THE NEW York Times of February 24, 1949, pages 1 and 3, contains a news item regarding the presentation of the annual award of The Churchman to Bishop Oxnam. It was reported that Bishop Oxnam said that the United States must not flirt with Franco to stop Stalin. Bishop Oxnam is quoted as saying: "We cannot expect the common man to believe in democratic pronouncements if we make deals with dictators, or ally ourselves with political, economic or ecclesiastical reaction."

[illegible] fundamentally unfair to say he belonged to the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship wtihout saying that his affiliation with this organization was during the war, when Russia was one of our allies.

Comment on Item No. 21

If the House committee now knows that I do not now belong to the organization, and understands the circumstances under which I did belong, why was the material quoted in Item 10 above in my file?

Item No. 22

IN ANOTHER letter dated May 16, 1950, Bishop Oxnam states that the American Civil Liberties Union is not, and has never been, a Communist organization; that the Committee on Militarism in Education was never a Communist organization; that the Fellowship of Reconciliation is an absolute pacifist organization and he never belonged to it; that he did belong to the Methodist Federation for Social Action but no longer is a member; that he did serve on the advisory committee of the Protestant Digest but resigned.

Comment on Item No. 22

No comment is necessary here.

Item No. 23

IN THE third letter he wrote to the committee, dated February 12, 1951, Bishop Oxnam stated that he was never a member of the American Friends of the Chinese People; that he was never a member of the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties and never signed any statement of that organization; that he did authorize the use of his name by the American Friends for Spanish Freedom, and that he resigned from the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship following the war.

Comment on Item No. 23

These matters have been dealt with above.

Comment on Item No. 24

This is the most inexcusable and vicious section of the entire report. This list would lead a reader to believe that I have been related to the organizations listed.

From the material presented above, I think it is clear to anyone that I had no relation with the American Friends of the Chinese People, the American League Against War and Fascism, the American League for Peace and Democracy, Citizens Victory Committee for Harry Bridges or the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties. Of the 12 organizations listed, five I never belonged to.

Why were the Daily Worker and the New Masses listed in this compilation about me? Does the committee cite a man as subversive because the Daily Worker reports a speech he has given, or falsely includes his name in a list of petitioners? Similarly with the New Masses. I have never had any relationship with these journals, direct or indirect.

My relationship with the other organizations listed has been explained in detail above.

The Statistics

A BRIEF statistical recapitulation may be in order:

The committee report on me consists of 305 typewritten lines. Of these:

Two are introduction;

Sixteen are a summary of the organizations mentioned in the report;

One hundred twenty-eight concern organizations never listed as subversive, or quotations from journals that are not related to subversive organizations or activities;

Seventy-two are from an obscure newspaper in Princeton, Ill., the utter falsity of which might have been disclosed in half an hour's conversation had a committee investigator bothered to walk the 300 yards from the Capitol to my office;

Sixty-four are devoted to organizations which I never belonged to;

Twenty-three refer to organizations listed as Communist fronts to which I once belonged but from which I had resigned prior to the publication of the Attorney General's list of subversive organizations and concerning which I have made full explanation above.

[illegible] broadcast is true or false. But nothing of the sort takes place. When pinned down and asked explicitly, and only then, Committee members piously assert to an inquirer that the report "carries no conclusion of this Committee" and that the Committee never vouches for the correctness of any newspaper item.

This is deceit at its most vicious. What usually happens is demonstrated by the letter written last month by Rep. Jackson in response to a request for the information which he said was available about me.

He did not make the file available, but only hinted darkly at its detail and volume. He then went on to list the 12 agencies that appear in the summary of my report, including those with which I never had any relationship. He included, of course, the Daily Worker and the New Masses, where my alleged relationship was the fact that my name appeared in some news item carried by them.

The letter clearly conveys to the reader that "detailed documentation," which is "very voluminous," lies back of these reports. This letter, on the stationery of the Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, signed by a Congressman who is a member of the Committee, is patently designed to convey the conclusion that the material is an opinion of the Committee.

What does this mean, then, for the American citizen on whom the Committee has made a file? It means that he can be damaged without redress. It means that instead of the community knowing the positions he has held, the service he has rendered, the views he holds and the estimates of the people who know him, he is judged by a document that appears to be deliberately designed to discredit.

A citizen receiving such a report from the Committee understandably assumes that the material does in fact represent the judgment and conclusion of the Committee. It does not carry any statement to the contrary, or any disclaimer by the Committee on the accuracy of the newspaper reports included in the file, or any warning that some of the material may be allegation and not fact. These reports have been reprinted by private agencies and circulated as the judgment of the Committee, as I have had occasion to know in my own case.

The Committee, I suggest, is using methods that in ordinary parlance would be called blackmail.

Malicious Gossip

The Washington Post publishes today a calm, factual, detailed analysis by Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam of a dossier on himself in the files of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Bishop Oxnam's point-by-point refutation of the accusations, innuendoes and insinuations contained in the dossier, his exposure of its slovenliness and downright fraudulence, reveal a dangerous sort of evil which the House of Representatives ought not to countenance. What is a committee of Congress doing with a compilation of this sort of groundless gossip about a distinguished minister of religion?

Read Bishop Oxnam's full statement. The committee dossier on him records entirely innocent activities as though they had some sinister implication; for example, it contains a news clipping from 1930 to the effect that he made a speech to the inmates of the Indiana State Reformatory and wrests what he said on that ancient occasion entirely out of context. It reports that he was a member of the National Committee of the American Civil Liberties Union, an honorable, respected and extremely useful organization, and then quotes a statement smearing the ACLU put out by the long-discredited Fish Commission in 1931—and this, despite a statement issued as recently as February 17, 1952, by the Un-American Activities Committee itself that the ACLU "has never been cited as Red-dominated, or as Communist by any official organization charged with the duty of investigating subversive activity."

The dossier reports public statements by Bishop Oxnam assailing "witch hunts" and criticizing the Un-American Activities Committee, as though these statements were in themselves evidence against him. It reports that the bishop expressed the view in 1949 that the United States must not "flirt with Franco to stop Stalin" or "ally ourselves with political, economic or ecclesiastical reaction." What in the world is wrong with the expression of such an opinion in a free country?

The committee apparently regards as "subversive" any opinion of which it disapproves. The dossier compiled on Bishop Oxnam is the kind of dossier compiled by the political police behind the Iron Curtain. It does not represent investigation; it represents a naked and ugly attempt at intimidation.

American Nurses' Association

INTERGROUP RELATIONS PROGRAM

Why an Intergroup Relations Program?

- Prior to World War II
  - More than 15 state nurses' associations excluded Negro nurses from membership.
  - Only 42 of over 1,200 schools of nursing accepted Negro applicants.
  - Negro nurses were not accepted by the armed services.
  - Employment opportunities for Negro nurses were markedly limited.
  - Negro nurses were seldom upgraded according to their ability and preparation.
  - Few Negro nurses were appointed to ANA committees or elected to office.
  - Similar conditions prevailed for members of other racial minority groups.
- Fundamentally nurses believe in ethical and democratic principles.
- More nurses are needed to meet health needs.
- A sound program provides some - principles and methods by which to achieve improved intergroup relations.
  - resources: personnel, literature, names of related local community agencies.
  - means of exchange of ideas, progress and problems.
  - opportunity for every interested nurse to contribute to the betterment of intergroup relations.

What is the Intergroup Relations Program?

- Assisting state and district nurses' associations in achieving integration of nurses of racial minority groups in all phases of nursing by
  - helping to devise a plan by which integration can proceed on a sound and satisfying basis.
  - helping to solve problems if and when they arise.
  - highlighting positive achievements.
- Cooperating with all ANA programs
  - for the speedier realization of the goals of each program.
  - for achieving these goals in the most economical and wholesome manner.
- Cooperating with the staff of the American Journal of Nursing
  - to feature articles which highlight successful efforts toward integration and the reasons why these efforts were successful.
  - to encourage nurses of all races to write in the field of their competence.
  - to keep nurses informed of the progress being made with the intergroup relations program.
- Cooperating with the NLN by - sharing information.
  - discussion of common problems.
- Cooperating with other Intergroup Relations Agencies
  - to exchange information about goals and techniques.

  - to pave the way for state and district nurses' associations to contact the local units of these agencies for support and assistance.
  - to foster good will for the ANA program.
- Developing tools and techniques such as
  - a study guide which the local nurses' associations can use to determine the status of intergroup relations in their districts.
  - a kit of materials to provide authentic information about minority groups; techniques to use in developing an intergroup relations program; resource agencies in local communities and a bibliography of additional reading materials.
  - a demonstration project to test sound methods by which to achieve integration in nursing.
- A program of inclusiveness
  - to achieve the integration of nurses of all racial and religious minorities.
  - to protect the rights and privileges of all nurses.

What has been accomplished to date?

- All except two state nurses' associations admit Negro nurses to membership.
- 710 schools of nursing accept students on the basis of qualifications rather than ethnic group.
- The armed services accept and upgrade nurses of all races.
- In student nurses' associations generally, students of all ethnic groups are considered for membership, committee membership and officers on the basis of competence.

- Increasingly
  - Agencies employing graduate professional and practical nurses are using competence in nursing as the sole criterion for employment.
  - Nursing organizations are appointing committee members and electing officers solely on the basis of ability.

What can the nurses in my district and state do?

- Determine the current status of intergroup relations in nursing in your community.
  - Form a committee on intergroup relations.
  - Obtain (free) and use the study guide.
  - Seek assistance from the social science department in the local university or from other local intergroup relations agencies.
- Plan a program based on the findings in your community.
  - Every district can do something; every agency can do something.
  - Find out what other agencies in your community have done.
  - Proceed wisely - but proceed.
- Seek available materials and guidance from A.N.A. headquarters.
- Tell A.N.A. headquarters what your needs are so additional information and materials can be obtained or prepared.
- Share your experiences with others.
  - notify headquarters in order that your achievements will be publicized.
  - interest your local papers, radio stations, magazines, etc.

AMERICAN NURSES' ASSOCIATION
Intergroup Relations Program
Staff Orientation Conference
June 9, 1953

Some of the most typical questions relating to the intergroup relations program on which various staff members have felt need for expert advice are indicated below. During the last part of the session opportunity will be given to the staff to raise additional questions.

I. When members of our professional staff are in the field, how shall we respond or behave when

A. We are told

1. "We have segregation laws, what can we as an association do to carry out the ANA program on integration?"?

2. "How far can we as a professional organization go ahead of the community (especially in the South) in the area of racial integration?"?

3. "Discussion of the possibility of conducting an intergroup relations program, or of actively working for the integration of nurses of racial minority groups, will increase resistance to the program."?

4. "If we accept Negro nurses into our organization, isn't that discrimination against the majority since we will have to give up our social activities?"? (Asked in a southern district where refreshments are served routinely following a business meeting.)

5. "We would employ Negroes, but our patients will object."?

6. "It is not so much a matter of the patients objecting as of the white nurses themselves objecting."?

7. "Our Negroes know their place --."?

8. "We can't invite a Negro staff member to our state because we have segregation laws and we do not wish to embarrass her."?

9. "We have no problem."? (Stated by persons from northern communities and by one district in the deep south.)

10. "Look at all we have done and now the nurses of minority groups won't

a. join the association."?

b. attend meetings of the association."?

c. participate in discussion during meetings."?

d. intermingle with majority group members."?

e. apply to our school of nursing."?

B. The following situations occur:

1. The city has segregation laws and one member of our group will have to sit in the back of the bus as we go to our destination?

2. Negro members of our staff will not be accommodated in restaurants in a city with segregation laws?

3. Members of racial minority groups are referred to as "they", "niggers", "those ---- goons (nurses from other countries)."?

4. Nurses of racial minority groups are designated as Nurse Doe or Jane Doe rather than as "Miss" Doe, as are nurses of the majority group?

5. A registrar who places private duty nurses telephones the patient, doctor and hospital to ask "Is it all right to send a Negro nurse?"?

II. In relation to the questions under I above, when is it desirable to give and not to give publicity to changes we wish to make towards greater integration of nurses of minority groups?

III. When we are in the field, or during our social activities during non-working hours, we may be asked questions concerning our personal beliefs and attitudes as they relate to the intergroup relations program. If our opinions are divergent to the policies of the ANA, what is our responsibility?

IV. The following facts are known to exist. How can we stimulate leadership to work for desirable changes in each case?

A. There are salary differentials for white and non-white nurses for the same level of responsibility in some communities.

B. In some instances, nurses of racial minority groups are assigned to the least desirable working situations and hours.

C. Employment and upgrading of nurses of racial minority groups on the basis of their education and experience is seldom (but increasingly) done. This is true in the North and South.

D. Nurses of racial minority groups are seldom (but increasingly) appointed to committees or elected to office in the association.

Dear Mr Angelo Herndon

Having read of the organization of the Negro Publication Society I should like to be enrolled as a member, and enclose $5.00 to cover my dues for this year. I have just sent you a book on Inter-Racial organizations. If you do not care for it for the Society's library will you please give it to someone interested in the subject. Wishing you all success in your admirable undertaking, I am,

Sincerely yours,

New York, N Y

Dear Bob:

We are wondering how the segregation-in-recreation article is coming--specifically, if it will be in print in the near future.

As you well know, some of the background data we got together dates back to August and September of 1952. Harold thought he would go ahead and use our survey as a NEW SOUTH article if 1) your article is still in the works and not likely to appear this fall and 2) our printing an independent piece focused on public recreational facilities by race (not tackling the legal aspects) would not detract from your article.

Would like to hear from you about this soon.

Also, S O S on the 1953 file of recreation and professional entertainment clips. We need them from time to time and would like to have them if you no longer need them.

Regards from S R C. Kack and I are sitting out the Emory night classes this quarter.

Sincerely,

ase Against Stoner Taken To Department of Justice

Leader of So-called Anti-Jewish 'Party' Here Is Accused of 'Inciting to Murder' in Literature Sent Through Mails

BY LUCIEN AGNIEL

J. B. Stoner last night faced the possibility of a five-year prison sentence and a $5,000 fine—maximum penalty for placing "indecent" material in the mails.

Stoner, self-styled "archleader" of what he calls the Stoner Anti-Jewish Party, lately has been mailing anti-Semitic literature in Chattanooga which calls for extermination of all Jews, and asks donations to the party war chest.

In Knoxville yesterday, Alexander F. Miller of Atlanta, southern director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, laid copies of Stoner's literature on the desk of U. S. Attorney James B. Frazier. Miller then cited the section of the U. S. criminal code which he believes Stoner has violated.

In a telephone call to The Times, Miller said: "I believe we have a case against Stoner. Mr. Frazier is taking the matter under advisement and is forwarding the evidence to Washington for action by the Civil Rights unit. Conviction under this statute carries a maximum punishment of $5,000 fine or five years imprisonment, or both."

Frazier told The Times he would act at once. "I will see that the evidence goes immediately to the Civil Liberties division of the Department of Justice for appropriate action," he said.

J. B. STONER, IN 1940

Section 211 of the U. S. criminal code, pertaining to mailing obscene matter, says:

"Every obscene, lewd or lascivious, and every filthy book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, print or other publication of indecent

In the anti-Jewish mailer which Stoner has been circulating at the rate of several hundred a week, he says: "The Stoner Anti-Jewish party is a political party whose main purpose is to serve Christianity and America by obtaining enactment of proper laws or constitutional amendments making it unlawful and impossible for Jews to live in North America. * * * The Jews are too evil to be allowed to live. * * * The Satanic Jews must be put to death in accordance with irresistible laws that command such.

"* * * The Jew devils must be destroyed. If our great and beloved America is to live, Jewry must die. The Jewish race must cease to exist."

The last paragraph, in small print, advertises "The Gospel of Jesus Christ versus The Jews," a pamphlet which Stoner offers to all who will buy—at $2 the copy.

Former Klan Organizer

Stoner, 23-year-old former Ku-Klux Klan organizer, could not be reached last night for a statement. He can be reached only through a postoffice box number. He refuses to give a telephone number or home address.

This passion for privacy is one of many Stoner phobias. He refuses to be photographed and often fancies he is being followed.

He attended several Chattanooga schools. He was not graduated from high school, mainly because he became preoccupied with Klan activities at an early age.

His chief claims to fame are a few lines in an old Winchell column, a brief mention from Drew Pearson over the air, and a couple of pages in John Roy Carlson's recent book, "The Plotters."

In Chattanooga, his Anti-Jewish Party is so small he won't divulge figures on membership or finances.

WOULD YOU SMILE?

TEST YOURSELF

If you were a Negro—

Would you, like the young man on the cover, have a warm and friendly smile?

Would you hold fast to your pride in being an American in spite of daily handicaps?

Would you be determined to succeed in spite of the obstacles you faced because of color?

Would you work with your fellow Americans, black and white, to build a better world?

COULD YOU SMILE?

If you were a Negro—

The chances are 3 times greater that your mother would have died in giving you life.

The chances are 50 per cent greater that you would have died when less than a year old.

Shocking as it sounds, this is the case even today!

And, if you survived—

(With the inadequate medical care, bad housing, and low-paying jobs to which you would be shunted)—

You could expect to die 10 years before a white American born on the same day.

And you could expect your children to die 10 years before white children the same age.

If you were a Negro—

The chances are 4 in 5 that you would live in the South —and your family income would be less than 1/2 that of your white neighbors.

The chances are you would be a farm tenant or live in a city slum.

If you were a Negro—

Your total education would probably have been less than 6 years of schooling from underpaid teachers in run-down school houses.

And your children would probably go to a Southern Negro school where the expenditure for their education would be less than 1/4 the national average.

If you were a Negro—

You would share with other Americans the desire to vote and take part in government.

But in the South you probably would never have done so—because poll taxes, white primaries, and registration trickery rob 10 million Americans of the ballot.

You would probably know fear as you have never known it.

If you were a Negro—

You would be proud of your fellow Negro Americans, past and present, who have had the opportunity to enrich the welfare and happiness of all Americans.

You would take pride in the work of Negro artists, like Marian Anderson and Paul Robeson; of scientists like Dr. George Washington Carver and Dr. Charles Drew, inventor of the blood bank; of athletes like Joe Louis; of educators and civic leaders like Mary McLeod Bethune and Channing Tobias; of fighting men from Crispus Attucks on the Boston Common to Brigadier General Benjamin O. Davis and the immortal Dorie Miller. You would take pride in these and many, many others.

You would never feel inferior, but you would know that the ranks of these great men and women can be multiplied to the advantage of the whole nation—if only greater opportunities to live, to learn, and to serve are afforded all Negroes.

If you were a Negro—

You would know that there are only 3,500 doctors, 1,500 dentists, and 1,200 lawyers out of more than 13 million Negro Americans.

You would want more chances for Negro boys and girls to become doctors and lawyers and engineers and nurses; to become streetcar motormen and chemists and architects. You would want for them the same opportunities afforded other Americans.

If you were a Negro—

You would be proud of the production record made by 1½ million Negro workers in war industries since Pearl Harbor.

You would strive to prevent a return to the old days of dog-eat-dog when you were the "last hired and first fired." You would oppose those who seek to use you as a source of cheap labor; to exploit your plight, your need for work, as a means of depressing the wages of your fellow white workers.

You would join and support those labor unions which treat Negroes as fellow citizens.

If you were a Negro—

You would know that crime is not racial. You would know that poverty and oppression breed crime.

And you would know that we Americans have far to go before we achieve the democratic aim set forth by the great Thomas Jefferson: "Equal and exact justice to all men of whatever state or persuasion."

If you were a Negro—

You would want to destroy the mutual distrust and misunderstanding which separate you from your fellow Americans.

You would love your God and your country—its beauty and its ideals—its "promise for tomorrow."

You would assume all your obligations as a citizen and you would want all the corresponding rights and privileges of citizenship.

You would work with all your fellowmen to build a better world.

YOU WOULD TRY TO SMILE.

IF YOU ARE A GOOD AMERICAN

You will, in your own way, express the kind of concern reflected in the following letter addressed by the late Franklin D. Roosevelt to the 6th All-Southern Negro Youth Conference:

THE WHITE HOUSE
Washington, D. C.

November 25, 1944

Dear Miss George:

It is good to know that at its meeting in Atlanta this year the All-Southern Negro Youth Conference will have as its theme "Democracy —The Challenge of Victory." It is increasingly apparent that this is the challenge faced by us all.

I know that on the road to victory, hard at first and bloody still, the Negro youth of the South met, with other American young people, this challenge with a courage which has dignified their generation. Hundreds of thousands of young Negroes from the Southern states serve in our armed forces. In the factories, on the farms, and in all fields of war activity, thousands of other Negro young people have given freely of their skill, their strength, their courage and their loyalty.

They have fought not only to defend America but to advance America. They have fought to establish a universal freedom under which a new basis of security and prosperity can be established for all—regardless of station, race or creed.

Their fight has been democracy's fight. And democracy's victory must be their victory—to cherish and extend as the men and women of tomorrow.

I send my best wishes to them and to their cause.

Very sincerely yours,

Franklin D. Roosevelt

IF YOU ARE A GOOD AMERICAN

You know that until all men are free from want and fear, no man can be really free.

You want every American to enjoy the rights outlined in the Constitution of the United States.

You want an end to intolerance and discrimination.

You want every American to have a chance to live, learn, and serve.

You will want to help the Negro youth of the South who, through the Southern Negro Youth Congress, are working to train themselves for good citizenship, to broaden their opportunities, and to stimulate the growth of friendship and cooperation with white young people for the building of a better South.

The SNYC needs your support. Contributions, which are tax deductible, should be made out to the order of: Southern Negro Youth Educational Fund, Inc., and mailed to:

FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION

SERVICES

TO

RURAL FAMILIES

UNITED STATES
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
Farm Security Administration
Washington 25, D. C.

FSA PUB. 128
REV. 11-30-44

FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION

SERVICES

To Rural Families

THE FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION offers the small farmer and his family a start on the road to more adequate income, better living, and a more secure place in agriculture. It combines financial help with individual on-the-farm guidance in sound, efficient farm and home management.

Farm families who lack necessary equipment and operating capital, and cannot get credit elsewhere on reasonable terms and conditions are eligible for Farm Security supervised credit.

Farm Security borrowers attain greater security on the land and achieve a more useful place in agriculture. They are encouraged to build up their land and livestock, and to use both their labor and land resources to better advantage. Through diversification they achieve a balanced farming program with its year-round income and improved living standards.

These families participate in agricultural programs. Many cooperate with the Soil Conservation Service to prevent soil erosion and provide water control on their farms, work with the Forest Service in the care of farm woodlots, and take part in local activities of the Extension Service and AAA.

FSA loans are of two general types:

1—Rural Rehabilitation, or operating loans which are made in all rural counties.

2—Farm Ownership loans, made under the provisions of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act of 1937, in most rural counties.

In the 17 Western States a major activity is the water program which provides water facilities loans for developing water resources on farms and ranches.

A committee of three local farmers works with the Farm Security supervisor in each agricultural county. These committees determine applicants' eligibility for loans, review borrowers' progress, and approve farms to be bought and the prices to be paid.

Operating credit has been furnished to about 870,000[1] families to enable them to obtain the livestock, equipment, or other essentials needed to run their farms efficiently and on a paying basis. These loans are made for periods of from 1 to 5 years, at 5 percent interest.

Supervisors help the families plan their farm and home operations and put these plans into practice. Such plans usually call for the production of two or more farm commodities for market, food and feed needed at home, and cash income for the family's own necessities and the repayment of debts.

Supervised credit is accompanied by other types of aid necessary for improved living and efficient farming. More than 70,000 farm families in 1,012 counties are cooperating with local physicians in group health plans. Most of these plans offer general practitioners' services, either alone or in combination with surgery, hospitalization, prescribed drugs, or dental treatment.

With FSA help, about 85 percent of the tenant farmers on the program have arranged written leases, many of them for 2 or more years. For loan applicants over-burdened with debt, voluntary debt adjustments have been worked out with creditors by FSA supervisors and committeemen. More than 188,000 families have used this service to avoid bankruptcy, and both creditors and debtors have benefited through subsequent payment of the debts.

Farm Security also has provided services to improve rural housing. Through an environmental sanitation program, farm families have screened their houses, obtained sanitary privies and pure water supplies.

FSA borrowers and their neighbors have formed about 17,000 small informal group services. They buy and use together high-grade sires and farm equipment that would not be profitable for each to own and use alone. FSA makes small loans to individual farmers who need financial assistance in order to participate.

Improved Farming—Increased Security.—Families using FSA rehabilitation services were able to make outstanding food production records when wartime demands were greatest. A survey of the production by 311,880 borrowers who operated farms in both 1942 and 1943 showed they made increases in 5 war-essential food and oil crops that ranged from 14 to 65 percent over their 1942 production. They also increased cash marketings of livestock and livestock products. In 1943 they sold 56 percent more hogs than the year before; 43 percent more cattle and calves; 30 percent more sheep; 18 percent more milk; 47 percent more chickens; and 32 percent more eggs.

Also they had learned to raise, conserve, and prepare more and better food for the family table, thus improving their diets and health as well as cutting down cash expenditures. In 1943 the average borrower's farm produced for home use 523 gallons of milk and 484 pounds of meat. Home canning of vegetables and fruit averaged 305 quarts. Earlier studies have shown that the average borrower, before getting the FSA loan, had for home use 288 gallons of milk, 252 pounds of meat, 139 quarts of home-canned vegetables and fruit.

By the end of 1941, the average net worth of rehabilitation borrowers, or the value of what they owned over what they owed, had risen 42.5 percent. Their average net worth was $871 before they got FSA help, compared with $1,242 in 1941. A later survey showed the average family active on the program during 1943 had a net worth of $2,301 at the end of the crop season.

Rural rehabilitation borrowers have repaid 89.2 percent of the principal due on their loans, and about 306,400 [2] have completely retired their loans and are now in a position to get credit from banks and other lending institutions. Altogether, $484,957,193 of the $843,243,890 advanced since the beginning of the program in 1935 has been paid back, and an additional $67,661,935 has been collected in interest.[2]

FARM OWNERSHIP

Under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act of 1937, the FSA has made long-term loans to 36,426 farm tenants, sharecroppers, and farm laborers unable to get credit elsewhere to buy family-type farms of their own. All services available to rural rehabilitation borrowers are also available to farm-ownership borrowers. The loans are made for 40-year periods, at 3 percent.

An important requirement for a loan is that the farm to be purchased will provide a good living for the family, as well as pay for itself over the period of the loan. It must be large enough to earn the necessary income, but not so large that outside help will be needed except at peak periods. Supervisors advise the borrowers, as in the rehabilitation program, relative to plans of operation that will conserve the soil and result in maximum returns.

[2] Not including loans made from corporation trust funds.

Safeguards for Borrower.—The primary aim of the farm-ownership program is to enable tenant farmers and sharecroppers to buy farms and find security on the land. There is no security in the purchase of land at inflated prices which the borrower might not be able to repay out of farm earnings.

Before an applicant will be loaned money to buy a farm, the property undergoes a careful appraisal to determine its earning capacity and the probability of its yielding sufficient income over a period of years to enable the borrower to pay for it. With land values in many areas approaching boom levels, loan applicants are experiencing some difficulty in locating suitable farms that can be bought at fair prices. However, with careful search, they frequently find farms that can be bought at prices in line with their long-range earning capacity, even in areas where land values have generally risen sharply.

Borrowers Make Progress.—The typical family in this program has made great progress in improving land and buildings, adopting soil conservation practices, diversifying enterprises, and in retiring the loan with which the farm was bought.

Under a variable payment plan, borrowers are billed for higher than average amounts in good years, and smaller amounts in poor years. Thus during a period of higher income, they can pay ahead of schedule, providing a margin of security for themselves in case of crop failures or low prices later on.

Although they had 40 years to complete payments, 536 farmers have retired their loans within 7 years or less, some from farm income alone, and some with the help of other income. Another 221 borrowers paid out with money received from the sale of their farms, most of them having turned their land over to the Government for military purposes.

As of December 31, 1943, payments have come due on 30,603 loans. The amount which would have been due from these borrowers paying at a rate required to retire their debts in the allotted 40 years would have been $19,234,611. The amount actually repaid exceeded this sum by $9,210,022. In addition to this substantial payment ahead of schedule, $7,937,749 was paid from the sale of mortgaged property or refunds on unused portions of loans. Fifty-seven percent of the borrowers were ahead of schedule by an average of $736.

Loans for Veterans.—The Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 (GI Bill of Rights) provides that World War II veterans will be eligible for these loans just as though they were farm tenants.

Veterans who can get loans on reasonable terms from other sources will, as in the case of non-veterans, be expected to do so. But if they need and want the kind of supervision furnished by FSA, their application for an FSA loan may be approved, even if they could get a loan elsewhere.

WATER PROGRAMS

Water Facilities.—In the arid and semiarid sections of the 17 Western States, where lack of water is often a greater handicap than lack of good soil, the FSA makes loans to individual farmers and ranchers, and to farmers' groups, to enable them to install or repair such water facilities as ponds, wells, stock water tanks, diversion dams, conduits, windmills, spring developments, water spreaders, farm distribution systems, flood irrigation works, small irrigation facilities, and facilities for supplying farmstead water. Technicians advise the borrowers in planning the changes to be made, and in building or repairing the facilities.

Individual loans have been made to 6,848 families, and more than 4,000 other families have benefited by financial assistance to groups.

These Western families have built or repaired 14,595 separate water services of many different kinds. On range land, stock watering facilities and supplemental irrigation water have been provided; on individual farms and ranches, families have been able to improve and expand their work after getting water for work stock and farmstead use nearer to their buildings. Underground water supplies have been developed in some areas previously dry-farmed, with the result that food production per acre has risen greatly.

The borrowers have repaid 109.5 percent of the principal due on their loans. A total of $4,166,237 has been advanced. Principal due as of June 30, 1944, was $1,198,047, and payments totaled $1,311,520 plus an additional $148,948 in interest.

Water Conservation and Utilization.—The FSA cooperates with the Bureau of Reclamation (Department of the Interior) in the Federal program for water conservation and utilization (also called the Wheeler-Case program) in the 17 Western States. Farm Security is responsible for land acquisition, land development and settlement on selected irrigation projects.

ASSISTING RETURNING VETERANS

More than 35,000 veterans of the first World War have used the supervised credit services of Farm Security, and before the end of 1944 nearly 6,000 veterans of World War II had come to FSA for help in getting reestablished as farmers.

Credit has been made available to more than 1,400 of these War II veterans to enable them to purchase feed, seed, livestock, equipment, and other operating items necessary to resume farming. Sixteen hundred other returning servicemen have applied for farm-ownership loans. About 50 already have been financed in the purchase of farms. Many more who are eligible have so far been unable to locate farms they can buy at prices in line with their long-time earning capacity.

Applications from World War II veterans will increase as discharges from the armed forces progress, since many inquiries have already been received from veteran organizations and men still in uniform seeking information about the services of FSA.

FLOOD RESTORATION PROGRAM

During 1943–44, the FSA was in charge of the flood loan program set up with a special appropriation to assist farmers in counties damaged by the 1943 floods. Of the $1,918,711 loaned, $66,292 in principal and $1,132 in interest was repaid during the year. In 1944–45, the FSA is in charge of a similar program in designated counties damaged by flood or windstorm.

LIQUIDATION OF RESETTLEMENT PROJECTS

The rural resettlement projects under FSA management are being liquidated as expeditiously as possible through sales of the land to private owners. In many cases, the farm units are being made available to low-income farm families already living on them, under the same terms as provided by the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act. Private owners had received quitclaim deeds to 3,500 of the 9,045 units in the 152 farm projects by June 30, 1944, purchase commitments were outstanding for another 2,708 units, and 305 units had been transferred to other Government agencies or sold for cash. There were 2,532 units not yet sold.

Birth of SCLC

On January 10, 1957, more than 100 Southern leaders gathered in Atlanta, Georgia, to share and discuss their mutual problems of the Southern struggle. By unanimous agreement, the body voted to form a permanent organization that would serve as a coordinating agency for local protest centers that were utilizing the technique and philosophy of nonviolence in creative protest. Two months later, close on the heels of the successful Montgomery, Alabama bus boycott, SCLC came into being, in New Orleans, Louisiana. Martin Luther King, Jr., was elected president.

Structure of SCLC

Affiliate organizations all across the South make up the body of the Conference. The making and execution of basic policy is the responsibility of the Executive Board, geographically representative of the entire South. Of the thirty-three board members, twenty-four are elected by the Conference and nine by the Board. Every affiliate may have from one to five voting delegates at any deliberative session of the Conference, depending upon the type of financial affiliation. The annual meeting of the Conference is held in the early fall and the Executive Board meets in the Spring. Policy decisions are handled by an Administrative Committee between meetings of the Conference and the Board. SCLC maintains a modest but versatile staff at its home office in Atlanta, Georgia.

Membership in SCLC

SCLC is not a membership organization per se. As indicated, affiliate groups and organizations constitute the actual membership. In turn, individuals belong to the affiliates (churches, civic organizations, fraternal groups, etc.). The minimum affiliate fee is $25.00 per annum entitling the group represented to one voting delegate in all deliberative sessions. An affiliate may have as many as five (5) voting delegates ($125.00), but regardless of amount given, this is maximum number of delegates allowed. Affiliation requires an application in writing to national office that indicates general structure and purposes of group seeking affiliation. All affiliates are confirmed by the Executive Board or Administrative Committee. Upon confirmation, affiliate certificates and suitable credentials are forwarded to member organization indicating SCLC's services are immediately available. The SCLC Newsletter and other printed material relevant to the social struggle are forwarded to the membership of the affiliate group periodically.

SCLC—A Nonsectarian Agency

From its inception, SCLC has been nonsectarian in character. Conference supporters are people of all faiths, religions and creeds. The word 'Christian' in SCLC's name is natural and unique to the social structure of the Negro community in the South. The Negro church is his only forum, owned, operated and controlled by him; it affords the broadest opportunity for social intercourse; it is generally the headquarters of the Negro's struggle for full citizenship; the pastor has been the community leader and champion of the Negro's civil liberties. Most of the protest centers in the South are clergy-led, thus accounting for the high incidence of ministers who make up the leadership of the Conference. Laymen too, play a significant role, several serving on the Board and holding top offices. SCLC welcomes the good wishes and support of any person or group of persons who have as their ultimate goal actualizing democracy in America through peaceful and nonviolent means.

Aims and Purposes of SCLC

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference has the basic aim of achieving full citizenship rights, equality, and the integration of the Negro in all aspects of American life. SCLC is a service agency to facilitate coordinated action of local community groups within the frame of their indigenous organizations and natural leadership. SCLC activity revolves around two main focal points: the use of nonviolent philosophy as a means of creative protest; and securing the right of the ballot for every citizen.

Philosophy of SCLC

The basic tenents of Hebraic-Christian tradition coupled with the Ghandian concept of satyagraha — truth force — is at the heart of SCLC's philosophy. Christian nonviolence actively resists evil in any form. It never seeks to humiliate the opponent, only to win him. Suffering is accepted without retaliation. Internal violence of the spirit is as much to be rejected as external physical violence. At the center of nonviolence is redemptive love. Creatively used, the philosophy of nonviolence can restore the broken community in America. SCLC is convinced that nonviolence is the most potent force available to an oppressed people in their struggle for freedom and dignity.

SCLC and Nonviolent Mass Direct Action

SCLC believes that the American dilemma in race relations can best and most quickly be resolved through the action of thousands of people, committed to the philosophy of nonviolence, who will physically identify themselves in a just and moral struggle. It is not enough to be intellectually dissatisfied with an evil system. The true nonviolent resister presents his physical body as an instrument to defeat the system. Through nonviolent mass direct action, the evil system is creatively dramatized in order that the conscience of the community may grapple with the rightness or wrongness of the issue at hand.

SCLC and Leadership Training

In its bold new program, SCLC has undertaken one of the difficult tasks so vital to the present-day struggle in the South. The Leadership Training Program is directed at the organization of communities at the 'grass-roots' level. It is believed that the great success of the Negro community's struggle for full citizenship will be determined by the training of this second-line leadership. Leadership Training embraces the work of the Citizenship Schools and the Correspondence Institute. Both include in their course of studies such subjects as: Registration and Voting; Social Protest; Understanding Politics; Use of the Boycott; How to Picket; The Nature of Prejudice, etc.

SCLC's Citizenship Schools

The Citizenship School is the direct result of one phase of the Leadership Training Program. Interested persons, who have a general knowledge of reading and writing, are trained intensively in the skills of adult education using subject matter relevant to the social struggle. They return to their individual communities as instructors and set up a Citizenship School that the 'grass-roots' people may be trained for full participation in civic life. Periodically, the instructors return to the training center for refresher courses to keep them abreast of significant changes and to further develop their skills.

SCLC and Voter-Registration

The right of the ballot is basic to the exercise of full citizenship rights. All across the South, subtle and flagrant obstacles confront the Negro when he seeks to register and vote. Poll taxes, long form questionnaires, harassment, economic reprisal, and sometimes death, meet those who dare to seek this exercise of the ballot. In areas where there is little or no attempt to block the voting attempts of the Negro, apathy generally is deeply etched upon the habits of the community. SCLC with its specialized staff works on both fronts: aiding local communities through every means available to secure the right to vote (e.g. filing complaints with the Civil Rights Commission) and arousing interest through voter-registration workshops to point up the importance of the ballot. Periodically, SCLC, upon invitation conducts a voter-registration drive to enhance a community's opportunity to free itself from economic and political servitude. SCLC believes that the most important step the Negro can take is that short walk to the voting booth.

SCLC and Civil Disobedience

SCLC sees civil disobedience as a natural consequence of nonviolence when the resister is confronted by unjust and immoral laws. This does not imply that SCLC advocates either anarchy or lawlessness. The Conference firmly believes that all people have a moral responsibility to obey laws that are just. It recognizes, however, that there also are unjust laws. From a purely moral point of view, an unjust law is one that is out of harmony with the moral law of the universe, or, as the religionist would say, out of harmony with the Law of God. More concretely, an unjust law is one in which the minority is compelled to observe a code which is not binding on the majority. An unjust law is one in which people are required to obey a code that they had no part in making because they were denied the right to vote. In the face of such obvious inequality, where difference is made legal, the nonviolent resister has no alternative but to disobey the unjust law. In disobeying such a law, he does so peacefully, openly and nonviolently. Most important, he willingly accepts the penalty for breaking the law. This distinguishes SCLC's position on civil disobedience from the 'uncivil disobedience' of the racist opposition in the South. In the face of laws they consider unjust, they seek to defy, evade, and circumvent the law, BUT they are unwilling to accept the penalty for breaking the law. The end result of their defiance is anarchy and disrespect for the law. SCLC, on the other hand, believes that civil disobedience involves the highest respect for the law. He who openly disobeys a law that conscience tells him is unjust and willingly accepts the penalty is giving evidence that he so respects the law that he belongs in jail until it is changed.

Source of SCLC's Funds

SCLC's budget is supported by mass rallies, individual and organizational pledges, direct mailing fund appeals, and affiliate fees. Some portion of the budget is realized through the personal appearances of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and other members of the Conference. Under its bold new program, SCLC launches in 1961 its 'Dollars For Freedom' campaign which is again directed at the 'grass roots' population of America. More recently, special fund-raising projects in the form of benefits featuring outstanding artists of show business, have added to the financial support needed to carry on the work throughout the South.

SCLC and the Sit-ins

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference views the Sit-In Movement of southern college students as the most important development in the southern struggle. The Conference's record evidences that at every opportunity, it has done everything within its power and resources to aid and abet the students in developing their skills in nonviolent protest. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), the coordinating organization of the student movement, was born as a result of a conference called by SCLC at Raleigh, North Carolina, in the spring of 1960 at the height of the Sit-Ins. It continues to serve in an advisory capacity through its professional staff and its president, Martin Luther King, Jr., symbol of the students' nonviolent mass attack on segregation. Some of the most significant victories in the Sit-In Movement of southern college students have come as a result of the leadership and guidance of SCLC affiliates, e.g., Nashville Christian Leadership Council, Nashville, Tenn., Petersburg Improvement Association, Petersburg, Va., etc.

SCLC and Segregation

SCLC is firmly opposed to segregation in any form that it takes and pledges itself to work unrelentingly to rid every vestige of its scars from our nation through nonviolent means. Segregation is an evil and its presence in our nation has blighted our larger destiny as a leader in world affairs. Segregation does as much harm to the segregator as it does to the segregated. The segregated develops a false sense of inferiority and the segregator develops a false sense of superiority, both contrary to the American ideal of democracy. America must rid herself of segregation not alone because it is politically expedient, but because it is morally right!

SCLC and Constructive Program

SCLC's basic program fosters nonviolent resistance to all forms of racial injustice, including state and local laws and practices, even when this means going to jail; and imaginative, bold constructive action to end the demoralization caused by the legacy of slavery and segregation—inferior schools, slums, and second-class citizenship. Thus, the Conference works on two fronts. On the one hand, it resists continuously the system of segregation which is the basic cause of lagging standards; on the other hand, it works constructively to improve the standards themselves. There MUST be a balance between attacking the causes and healing the effects of segregation.

SCLC and the Beloved Community

The ultimate aim of SCLC is to foster and create the 'beloved community' in America where brotherhood is a reality. It rejects any doctrine of black supremacy for this merely substitutes one kind of tyranny for another. The Conference does not foster moving the Negro from a position of disadvantage to one of advantage for this would thereby subvert justice. SCLC works for integration. Our ultimate goal is genuine intergroup and interpersonal living — integration. Only through nonviolence can reconciliation and the creation of the beloved community be effected. The international focus on America and her internal problems against the dread prospect of a hot war, demand our seeking this end.

I'M NOT PREJUDICED, BUT...

For Human Beings

FOR SENIORS ONLY # 9

By Alice Beaton

● Remember back in grade school when one of the favorite pastimes on the playground was for your "crowd" to get together, arm-in-arm, and toss your heads at the girls you had excluded from your little group? Or back a few years further, when you and another playmate would refuse to let the third child into your special game—though your particular twosome might change from day to day. Or the time your good friend gave a party and didn't invite you? Or the secret club that included the whole block except one sad little left-out? Nasty trick kids have, isn't it? They seem to like to pick and choose so that a few are on the outside—hurt, lonely, wondering. They like to be on the inside, enjoying that wonderful superiority of belonging—only it's no fun at all unless someone is left out.

Of course, it's childish stuff . . . something we outgrow and forget, along with other baby habits. At least, we no longer do it with quite the same aimless spite. We substitute "reasons" and name-calling to dress up our elementary school habits. We decide we're better because we live in a particular neighborhood, or because our fathers earn money in certain ways, or because our Church is what it is, or our ancestors landed here a little sooner. For a wide variety of "reasons," not one of which we are responsible for, we like to feel we have the privilege of shutting out other people.

And all of us seem to forget that this door-slamming may pinch our fingers; that when doors begin to bang shut we're just as apt to be on the wrong side. There is always something about each one of us that can mark us as in the minority, in the group to be shut out. Once the habit of selecting people for jobs or club-members or friends is on any basis except what the individual is like—who can tell what standards may be applied?

Hitler went to work with an old prejudice in Germany—against Jews. There were some people who didn't like Jews, others who had heard Jews described as pretty bad hombres, responsible for more things than any small minority could have done in many lifetimes, and still others who, after all, weren't Jews and why get upset? But Jews were just a beginning. Next came members of trade unions, then Catholics, then all foreigners. And finally the persecution and destruction of any human being who didn't agree with Hitler one hundred per cent. It used to be corny humor about not liking someone because of the color of his hair . . . but Hitler took the joke seriously and murdered millions to glorify the blonde German.

"Oh, that's all over," you say. "Hitler is through and we know how awful he is!" It isn't over. It will never be over as long as people think they should have power over other people merely because they were born to certain kinds of parents. You'll find it hits you in school, business or social life—even if you think now that you belong to a safe majority. Somewhere along the line, you're a member of a minority.

As a perfectly simple example, when you begin to earn your living, prejudice will hit your pay envelope. By an accident of being born a girl child, you're going to discover that you:

get less pay for doing the same work a man does get fewer opportunities to advance in your job are discussed and evaluated as an unpredictable problem are excluded from any policy-making decisions get fewer raises and smaller ones than a man can be a male executive's "right hand" but seldom an executive are viewed as a necessary evil to do the drudgery men don't like to do

Sounds grim? It is grim. A few women overcome all of those things. They're different (where have we heard that word before?). But most of us in business succumb to the label. We're "women" the "underfolk" that Adolf publicized so thoroughly in Greece, Norway, Poland and France. You don't like it? It's unfair? It's prejudice. The only way to fight this prejudice is to fight prejudice itself.

There—the word is out. What does it mean? It's a "judgment or an opinion formed without due examination . . . a hasty, unfair judgment . . . grounded in feeling, fancy or associations." That's what the dictionary says and that's how it works out. We all have prejudices. They're close cousins to superstitions—you know, you aren't superstitious but you still throw spilled salt over your left shoulder. It's silly, but it goes on from one generation to the next. So do prejudices. We're brought up to dislike "wops," or "kikes," or "micks," or "niggers," or "bohunks," or "Mexes." Every part of the country has its own set of pet prejudices. Each of us acquires them and they grow stronger as we grow older because it makes you feel good to be better than someone else.

What we forget is that there's another someone else who is feeling good at our expense. The darned thing is like the standing dominos—push one, it pushes the next, and so on until the whole row is flat on its face.

The whole world was not too far from being flat on its face. We missed it by a mere margin. We've paid in blood and the other two famous ingredients because a few unscrupulous men used our prejudices to blind us to their real purpose. They used our stupidest feelings to tie up our brains. And it will happen over again — and again — unless we make our heads work.

It is downright hard to use your brains to make decisions, choose jobs, friends, an environment. But you can start with a simple statement—and begin to clean out the murk of prejudice. Every human being must be considered separately. No race or religion or nation has a corner on the vices or the virtues—no, not even a tendency in that direction. Races are like families in one way—delve deep enough and you find a wide selection of heroes and heels, geniuses and dopes, with plenty of half-way-betweens.

If prejudice were an honest thing, it might say, "I find that people with different colored skins or different types of features or different ways of worship are strange and unfamiliar to me." Then intelligence could speak up and say, "How about a little healthy curiosity . . . a wider view? How about learning more about other kinds of people?"

But prejudice isn't honest. It turns on people who are no different from you, except for a label. It selects people who are as familiar to you as the girl next door. It tags whole groups of people, not as strange or different, but as vicious, dangerous, dirty, cowardly, smelly, greedy, sly, stupid. Prejudice is a division of heavy tanks running downhill without brakes. It is fear and ignorance harnessed to make hatred. And no one can tell who or what group will next feel its evil pressure.

Prejudice is hard to talk about, write about. We know it's a horrible word. We've learned how to avoid using the word while doing the deed. One of our country's biggest jobs is to root it out, air it, and let intelligence destroy it. The task begins with individuals. If you want to do your part, try this questionnaire:

1. What "group" do I label and make cracks about?
2. When did I start feeling this way?
3. Where do I get the ammunition that feeds this feeling?
   a. adjectives in books?
   b. the accepted view of my friends?
   c. stories that are told me?
   d. frequent personal experience?
4. Do I know more than ten people who belong to the "group" I dislike? (The word "know" means more than casual meeting.)
5. Are those I do know all of the things I've said?
6. Have any of my own "group" some or all of the qualities that I blame on the "group" I don't like?
7. Do I make nasty remarks, avoid all members of my own "group" when I discover one or two are less than perfect?
8. What minority do I belong to? (Think)
9. What would I do if I had to stand and watch the real persecution of the "group" I think I don't like—old people beaten in streets, little children starved, men and women kidnapped from their homes? Could I walk by and pretend not to see? Could I?

That last question is the sticker. Of course you couldn't. But that last question is the one you must face. It's no longer a horrid theory. The history we're living shows us that that is the end-of-the-road, the true destination of prejudices. Get it really rolling and there is no way to put on the brakes.

Getting rid of your own prejudices is a personal and often lonely job. Most of yours are reflections of your community's attitudes, the expressed views and "beliefs" of some of the people you love and respect very much. You'll frequently feel as though you were setting yourself up against the wisdom of the ages—which is not the case, but it doesn't change your queasy feelings.

But if you want to go ahead, remember that the best weapon against prejudice is knowledge. If Catholics are your "undesirables," get to know as many of them as possible. Go to see how they worship. Ask questions. You don't need to worship their way to be tolerant of their way. If Jews are your phobia, get acquainted with them. You probably already know plenty of any "group" you think you dislike—but when you discover you like a few of them or some of them, don't decide they're "different." Everybody is.

You won't like all the people in any one group. Goodness, why should you? It's hard enough even to like all of our own relatives. People are not "species," they're individuals. But you'll learn that half the time you can't tell who is what . . . and you'll care less. You'll begin to get rid of that evil thing that lives in all of us—the need of feeling superior . . . the dangerous idea that one group is entitled to rule the destiny of another.

"You can be better than you are"—but it never comes by hating or looking down on others. If we don't stop ourselves, if we can't beat this ugly thing called prejudice, it will catch us all—and that does mean you.

Welfare

SOCIAL AGENCY OF NEW ORLEANS ENTRANCE

The problem is real, big, vital, significant... and its challenge is urgent!

Only intelligent leadership... acting now... can prevent this problem of today from becoming tomorrow's crisis!

Simply and directly the problem comes down to the question -

"Is your agency door open to all the people without regard to race

... for client services?

... for social work jobs?

... for board membership?"

The kind of answers that your agency can make has community importance in the light of the facts and figures brought out by a city wide investigation of the status of Negroes as clients, staff members, and board members of social agencies.

This study covered all but a few of the member agencies of the Council of Agencies

It was conducted during 1949 and 1950 for the New Orleans Chapter of the American Association of Social Workers by a group of students of the Tulane University School of Social Work

It SHOWED that .....

The doors of many social agencies in New Orleans . . .

...Shut out...

...or...

Separate

NEGROES —

... Negroes as Clients ...

Of the 81 agencies covered by the study

33 do not admit any Negroes as clients

10 are restricted to the use of Negroes

38 serve both Negroes and whites but often through separate units or separate staffs

RESULTS . . .

...Negro clients do not have equal access to all the types of services that are available in the community

...Negro clients receive a considerably smaller proportion of the volume of services rendered than might be expected from their numbers in the population and their obviously great needs

...This disproportion holds for all but the large public welfare and health programs and several smaller programs

...Agencies restricted to the use of Negro clients generally are less adequately housed, equipped, financed, and staffed than the gencies restricted to white clients only

... Negroes as Social workers.

Of the 38 agencies serving both Negro and white persons

14 employ Negroes in social work positions
3 employ Negro social workers in supervisory positions
1 employs Negro social workers in executive positions
0 employ Negro social workers in consultant positions

In general, Negro social workers are at many disadvantages compared with their white colleagues

...They have less chance of employment if young or elderly
...They have less tenure on the job
...They have less training and less chance to receive educational leave with stipend although proportionately more Negro than white worker have the prerequisite of a college degree
...They often get less pay for the same work salaries in restricted Negro agencies are lower than in restricted white agencies in practically every job classification
...They are confined to working with Negro clients and to using Negro clerical help
...They are often required to use separate drinking fountains, rest rooms, and lunchrooms

... Negroes as Board Members

Of the 38 agencies serving both Negro and white persons

8 have Negroes on the board of directors

1 has Negroes as officers of the board

The Negro board members of these agencies

...constitute 19 percent of the total board membership

...comprise excessive proportions of the Negro male, middle-aged, and professional populations

...serve shorter terms

All these facts and figures add up to the conclusion that -

Segregation and discrimination are commonly practiced in the New Orleans Social work community against Negroes as clients ....

as Social workers ....

and as board members....

These practices are NOT required by law:

"Segregation is not a legal word but to most people in the South it spells law. What many of them, including some lawyers, do not know is that segregation is supported more by local custom than by penal or restrictive legislation. The taboos are bigger in the popular mind than they are in the statutes or the case law, Nevertheless there are segregation laws in all of the Southern states and some of the laws are respectable, at least according to the Federal Constitution."
(Vernon X Miller, Dean, Loyola Law School, in Notre Damean, March 1949)
Dean Miller has digested Louisiana laws pertaining to segregation as follows:

" I. Proprietors of theaters, restaurants or places of amusement MAY or MAY NOT segregate.
II. Hotels must observe the 'separate dwelling law'.
III. Circuses and tent-shows must maintain separate entrances and ticket-boxes.
IV. The use of public buildings is controlled by LOCAL licensing practices.
V. LOCAL ordinances fixing segregated neighborhoods cannot be enforced.
VI. Miscegenation forbidden with sanctions.
VII. Common carriers must provide equal facilities both for local and interstate travel.
Vlll. Interracial meetings, athletic contests, private schools fall under no STATE sanctions.
IX. Local laws on separate public schools supported by Federal courts in the sense that equal facilities must be supplied."

These practices are NOT sanctioned by the profession!

As a profession, social work is concerned with the welfare and happiness of all people. By the very nature of its proffessional task, its first obligation is to accord each individual full and equal respect and consideration.

Positive statements of policies of nondiscrimination have been adopted by the profession...

The AASW statement on civil rights in social work says:

"...He(the social worker) has a responsibility to work toward the abridgment of discriminatory practices within agencies, public and voluntary, since the best service to people is possible only when there is no abridgment of rights."

The AASW statement of standards of employment and personnel practices says:

"The person best qualified to do the job should be selected without regard to race...except as the auspices of the agency limit the personnel who might be used effectively."

The AASW code of ethics makes this statement in regard to conduct in relation to clients:

"Conduct all relations with and concerning the persons served with frankness and honesty, with respect for individual differences, and without discrimination..."

The same statement says this in regard to conduct in relation to colleagues:

"Treat all colleagues without discrimination... and with understanding and acceptance of individual differences."

SO. . . action rests with you!

THIS is what you can do...to make your agency door truly a doorway to community social service...

1. Acquaint everyone in your agency...board and staff... with the information of this report.

2. Appoint a joint board staff committee to look into the situation in your own agency and to report and recommend practical measures that may be taken to improve matters.

3. Examine the legal basis of your agency and see whether any changes need be made to permit an extension of agency services to Negroes.

4. Examine your agency intake policies to see whether any changes need be made to assure Negroes equal access to the services of your agency.

5. Examine your agency personnel standards and practices to see whether any changes need be made to give Negroes equal opportunity for employment, advancement and compensation on the principle of merit.

6. Examine your agency policies in regard to the selection of board members to see whether any changes need be made to give Negroes equal opportunity for board service on the principle of democratic community participation.

7. Inquire into the ways and means that your agency may link up with other local, state, and national agencies in working for a general abandonment of discriminatory practices against Negroes.

(Highlights from SRC's man-in-the-street poll of opinions on race relations.)

A sample-type street poll of 400 colored and 395 white citizens of Atlanta to determine average opinion on the condition of race relations since the war, causes of trouble and ideas for creating better relations. Poll conducted in late 1946, early 1947.

75 percent of Negroes polled thought race relations in Atlanta were "worse" since the war.

53 percent of whites thought relations "worse."

Replies as to the causes of trouble between the races were pretty divergent for both colored and white:

About 32 percent of colored informants gave replies that can be roughly grouped under such things as 'whites' fear and dislike of Negro progress, the white supremacy idea and race prejudice.'

Some 32 percent of whites thought race trouble is caused by 'agitation' -- by both liberals and reactionaries; tension resulting from the war, increased aggressiveness of Negroes or increasing independence of Negroes.

Answers on what is needed to create better understanding and harmony between races were pretty widely scattered, too.

Among Negro informants, about 17 percent said 'equal rights and equal justice' was needed; another 17 percent said interracial meetings and opportunities for association; some 14 percent said education (both formal and interracial).

It is interesting to note that almost 30 percent of white informants said better education and economic opportunities for Negroes, also better education for whites, was needed.

Some 21 percent of whites revealed a lack on interest in the problem by replying 'I don't know' or giving no reply to the question on what can be done.

Only a very small group -- 1.5 percent for each race -- offered violence as a solution -- 'Get rid of the whites'; 'Deal harshly with Negroes.'

REPORT OF THE NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMISSION ON CIVIL DISORDERS

Summary of Report

INTRODUCTION

The summer of 1967 again brought racial disorders to American cities, and with them shock, fear and bewilderment to the nation.

The worst came during a two-week period in July, first in Newark and then in Detroit. Each set off a chain reaction in neighboring communities.

On July 28, 1967, the President of the United States established this Commission and directed us to answer three basic questions:

What happened?

Why did it happen?

What can be done to prevent it from happening again?

To respond to these questions, we have undertaken a broad range of studies and investigations. We have visited the riot cities; we have heard many witnesses; we have sought the counsel of experts across the country.

This is our basic conclusion: Our nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white—separate and unequal.

Reaction to last summer's disorders has quickened the movement and deepened the division. Discrimination and segregation have long permeated much of American life; they now threaten the future of every American.

This deepening racial division is not inevitable. The movement apart can be reversed. Choice is still possible. Our principal task is to define that choice and to press for a national resolution.

To pursue our present course will involve the continuing polarization of the American community and, ultimately, the destruction of basic democratic values.

The alternative is not blind repression or capitulation to lawlessness. It is the realization of common opportunities for all within a single society.

This alternative will require a commitment to national action—compassionate, massive and sustained, backed by the resources of the most powerful and the richest nation on this earth. From every American it will require new attitudes, new understanding, and, above all, new will.

The vital needs of the nation must be met; hard choices must be made, and, if necessary, new taxes enacted.

Violence cannot build a better society. Disruption and disorder nourish repression, not justice. They strike at the freedom of every citizen. The community cannot—it will not—tolerate coercion and mob rule.

Violence and destruction must be ended—in the streets of the ghetto and in the lives of people.

Segregation and poverty have created in the racial ghetto a destructive environment totally unknown to most white Americans.

What white Americans have never fully understood—but what the Negro can never forget—is that white society is deeply implicated in the ghetto. White institutions created it, white institutions maintain it, and white society condones it.

It is time now to turn with all the purpose at our command to the major unfinished business of this nation. It is time to adopt strategies for action that will produce quick and visible progress. It is time to make good the promises of American democracy to all citizens—urban and rural, white and black, Spanish-surname, American Indian, and every minority group.

Our recommendations embrace three basic principles:

- To mount programs on a scale equal to the dimension of the problems:
- To aim these programs for high impact in the immediate future in order to close the gap between promise and performance;
- To undertake new initiatives and experiments that can change the system of failure and frustration that now dominates the ghetto and weakens our society.

These programs will require unprecedented levels of funding and performance, but they neither probe deeper nor demand more than the problems which called them forth. There can be no higher priority for national action and no higher claim on the nation's conscience.

We issue this Report now, four months before the date called for by the President. Much remains that can be learned. Continued study is essential.

As Commissioners we have worked together with a sense of the greatest urgency and have sought to compose whatever differences exist among us. Some differences remain. But the gravity of the problem and the pressing need for action are too clear to allow further delay in the issuance of this Report.

PART I—WHAT HAPPENED?

Chapter 1—Profiles of Disorder

The report contains profiles of a selection of the disorders that took place during the summer of 1967. These profiles are designed to indicate how the disorders happened, who participated in them, and how local officials, police forces, and the National Guard responded. Illustrative excerpts follow:

NEWARK

. . . It was decided to attempt to channel the energies of the people into a nonviolent protest. While Lofton promised the crowd that a full investigation would be made of the Smith incident, the other Negro leaders began urging those on the scene to form a line of march toward the city hall.

Some persons joined the line of march. Others milled about in the narrow street. From the dark grounds of the housing project came a barrage of rocks. Some of them fell among the crowd. Others hit persons in the line of march. Many smashed the windows of the police station. The rock throwing, it was believed, was the work of youngsters; approximately 2,500 children lived in the housing project.

Almost at the same time, an old car was set afire in a parking lot. The line of march began to disintegrate. The police, their heads protected by World War I-type helmets, sallied forth to disperse the crowd. A fire engine, arriving on the scene, was pelted with rocks. As police drove people away from the station, they scattered in all directions.

A few minutes later a nearby liquor store was broken into. Some persons, seeing a caravan of cabs appear at city hall to protest Smith's arrest, interpreted this as evidence that the disturbance had been organized, and generated rumors to that effect.

However, only a few stores were looted. Within a short period of time, the disorder appeared to have run its course.

. . . On Saturday, July 15, [Director of Police Dominick] Spina received a report of snipers in a housing project. When he arrived he saw approximately 100 National Guardsmen and police officers crouching behind vehicles, hiding in corners and lying on the ground around the edge of the courtyard.

Since everything appeared quiet and it was broad daylight, Spina walked directly down the middle of the street. Nothing happened. As he came to the last building of the complex, he heard a shot. All around him the troopers jumped, believing themselves to be under sniper fire. A moment later a young Guardsman ran from behind a building.

The Director of Police went over and asked him if he had fired the shot. The soldier said yes, he had fired to scare a man away from a window; that his orders were to keep everyone away from windows.

Spina said he told the soldier: "Do you know what you just did? You have now created a state of hysteria. Every Guardsman up and down this street and every state policeman and every city policeman that is present thinks that somebody just fired a shot and that it is probably a sniper."

A short time later more "gunshots" were heard. Investigating, Spina came upon a Puerto Rican sitting on a wall. In reply to a question as to whether he knew "where the firing is coming from?" the man said:

"That's no firing. That's fireworks. If you look up to the fourth floor, you will see the people who are throwing down these cherry bombs."

By this time four truckloads of National Guardsmen had arrived and troopers and policemen were again crouched everywhere looking for a sniper. The Director of Police remained at the scene for three hours, and the only shot fired was the one by the Guardsman.

Nevertheless, at six o'clock that evening two columns of National Guardsmen and state troopers were directing mass fire at the Hayes Housing Project in response to what they believed were snipers. . . .

DETROIT

. . . A spirit of carefree nihilism was taking hold. To riot and destroy appeared more and more to become ends in themselves. Late Sunday afternoon it appeared to one observer that the young people were "dancing amidst the flames."

A Negro plainclothes officer was standing at an intersection when a man threw a Molotov cocktail into a business establishment at the corner. In the heat of the afternoon, fanned by the 20 to 25 m.p.h. winds of both Sunday and Monday, the fire reached the home next door within minutes. As residents uselessly sprayed the flames with garden hoses, the fire jumped from roof to roof of adjacent two- and three-story buildings. Within the hour the entire block was in flames. The ninth house in the burning row belonged to the arsonist who had thrown the Molotov cocktail. . . .

. . . Employed as a private guard, 55-year-old Julius L. Dorsey, a Negro, was standing in front of a market when accosted by two Negro men and a woman. They demanded he permit them to loot the market. He ignored their demands. They began to berate him. He asked a neighbor to call the police. As the argument grew more heated, Dorsey fired three shots from his pistol into the air.

The police radio reported: "Looters, they have rifles." A patrol car driven by a police officer and carrying three National Guardsmen arrived. As the looters fled, the law enforcement personnel opened fire. When the firing ceased, one person lay dead.

He was Julius L. Dorsey . . .

. . . As the riot alternately waxed and waned, one area of the ghetto remained insulated. On the northeast side the residents of some 150 square blocks inhabited by 21,000 persons had, in 1966, banded together in the Positive Neighborhood Action Committee (PNAC). With professional help from the Institute of Urban Dynamics, they had organized block clubs and made plans for the improvement of the neighborhood. . . .

When the riot broke out, the residents, through the block clubs, were able to organize quickly. Youngsters, agreeing to stay in the neighborhood, participated in detouring traffic. While many persons reportedly sympathized with the idea of a rebellion against the "system," only two small fires were set—one in an empty building.

. . . According to Lt. Gen. Throckmorton and Col. Bolling, the city, at this time, was saturated with fear. The National Guardsmen were afraid, the residents were afraid, and the police were afraid. Numerous persons, the majority of them Negroes, were being injured by gunshots of undetermined origin. The general and his staff felt that the major task of the troops was to reduce the fear and restore an air of normalcy.

In order to accomplish this, every effort was made to establish contact and rapport between the troops and the residents. The soldiers—20 percent of whom were Negro—began helping to clean up the streets, collect garbage, and trace persons who had disappeared in the confusion. Residents in the neighborhoods responded with soup and sandwiches for the troops. In areas where the National Guard tried to establish rapport with the citizens, there was a smaller response.

NEW BRUNSWICK

. . . A short time later, elements of the crowd—an older and rougher one than the night before—appeared in front of the police station. The participants wanted to see the mayor.

Mayor [Patricia] Sheehan went out onto the steps of the station. Using a bullhorn, she talked to the people and asked that she be given an opportunity to correct conditions. The crowd was boisterous. Some persons challenged the mayor. But, finally, the opinion, "She's new! Give her a chance!" prevailed.

A demand was issued by people in the crowd that all persons arrested the previous night be released. Told that this already had been done, the people were suspicious. They asked to be allowed to inspect the jail cells.

It was agreed to permit representatives of the people to look in the cells to satisfy themselves that everyone had been released.

The crowd dispersed. The New Brunswick riot had failed to materialize.

Chapter 2—Patterns of Disorder

The "typical" riot did not take place. The disorders of 1967 were unusual, irregular, complex and unpredictable social processes. Like most human events, they did not unfold in an orderly sequence. However, an analysis of our survey information leads to some conclusions about the riot process.

In general:

- The civil disorders of 1967 involved Negroes acting against local symbols of white American society, authority and property in Negro neighborhoods—rather than against white persons.
- Of 164 disorders reported during the first nine months of 1967, eight (5 percent) were major in terms of violence and damage; 33 (20 percent) were serious but not major; 123 (75 percent) were minor and undoubtedly would not have received national attention as "riots" had the nation not been sensitized by the more serious outbreaks.
- In the 75 disorders studied by a Senate subcommittee, 83 deaths were reported. Eighty-two percent of the deaths and more than half the injuries occurred in Newark and Detroit. About 10 percent of the dead and 38 percent of the injured were public employees, primarily law officers and firemen. The overwhelming majority of the persons killed or injured in all the disorders were Negro civilians.
- Initial damage estimates were greatly exaggerated. In Detroit, newspaper damage estimates at first ranged from $200 million to $500 million; the highest recent estimate is $45 million. In Newark, early estimates ranged from $15 to $25 million. A month later damage was estimated at $10.2 million, over 80 percent in inventory losses.

In the 24 disorders in 23 cities which we surveyed:

- The final incident before the outbreak of disorder, and the initial violence itself, generally took place in the evening or at night at a place in which it was normal for many people to be on the streets.
- Violence usually occurred almost immediately following the occurrence of the final precipitating incident, and then escalated rapidly. With but few exceptions, violence subsided during the day, and flared rapidly again at night. The night-day cycles continued through the early period of the major disorders.
- Disorder generally began with rock and bottle throwing and window breaking. Once store windows were broken, looting usually followed.
- Disorder did not erupt as a result of a single "triggering" or "precipitating" incident. Instead, it was generated out of an increasingly disturbed social atmosphere, in which typically a series of tension-heightening incidents over a period of weeks or months became linked in the minds of many in the Negro community with a reservoir of underlying grievances. At some point in the mounting tension, a further incident—in itself often routine or trivial—became the breaking point and the tension spilled over into violence.
- "Prior" incidents, which increased tensions and ultimately led to violence, were police actions in almost half the cases; police actions were "final" incidents before the outbreak of violence in 12 of the 24 surveyed disorders.
- No particular control tactic was successful in every situation. The varied effectiveness of control techniques emphasizes the need for advance training, planning, adequate intelligence systems, and knowledge of the ghetto community.

- Negotiations between Negroes—including your militants as well as older Negro leaders—and white officials concerning "terms of peace" occurred during virtually all the disorders surveyed. In many cases, these negotiations involved discussion of underlying grievances as well as the handling of the disorder by control authorities.
- The typical rioter was a teenager or young adult, a lifelong resident of the city in which he rioted, a high school dropout; he was, nevertheless, somewhat better educated than his nonrioting Negro neighbor, and was usually underemployed or employed in a menial job. He was proud of his race, extremely hostile to both whites and middle-class Negroes and, although informed about politics, highly distrustful of the political system.
- A Detroit survey revealed that approximately 11 percent of the total residents of two riot areas admitted participation in the rioting, 20 to 25 percent identified themselves as "bystanders," over 16 percent identified themselves as "counter-rioters" who urged rioters to "cool it," and the remaining 48 to 53 percent said they were at home or elsewhere and did not participate. In a survey of Negro males between the ages of 15 and 35 residing in the disturbance area in Newark, about 45 percent identified themselves as rioters, and about 55 percent as "noninvolved."
- Most rioters were young Negro males. Nearly 53 percent of arrestees were between 15 and 24 years of age; nearly 81 percent between 15 and 35.
- In Detroit and Newark about 74 percent of the rioters were brought up in the North. In contrast, of the noninvolved, 36 percent in Detroit and 52 percent in Newark were brought up in the North.
- What the rioters appeared to be seeking was fuller participation in the social order and the material benefits enjoyed by the majority of American citizens. Rather than rejecting the American system, they were anxious to obtain a place for themselves in it.
- Numerous Negro counter-rioters walked the streets urging rioters to "cool it." The typical counter-rioter was better educated and had higher income than either the rioter or the noninvolved.
- The proportion of Negroes in local government was substantially smaller than the Negro proportion of population. Only three of the 20 cities studied had more than one Negro legislator; none had ever had a Negro mayor or city manager. In only four cities did Negroes hold other important policy-making positions or serve as heads of municipal departments.
- Although almost all cities had some sort of formal grievance mechanism for handling citizen complaints, this typically was regarded by Negroes as ineffective and was generally ignored.
- Although specific grievances varied from city to city, at least 12 deeply held grievances can be identified and ranked into three levels of relative intensity:

First Level of Intensity

1. Police practices
2. Unemployment and underemployment
3. Inadequate housing

Second Level of Intensity

4. Inadequate education
5. Poor recreation facilities and programs
6. Ineffectiveness of the political structure and grievance mechanisms

Third Level of Intensity

7. Disrespectful white attitudes
8. Discriminatory administration of justice
9. Inadequacy of federal programs
10. Inadequacy of municipal services
11. Discriminatory consumer and credit practices
12. Inadequate welfare programs

- The results of a three-city survey of various federal programs—manpower, education, housing, welfare and community action—indicate that, despite substantial expenditures, the number of persons assisted constituted only a fraction of those in need.

The background of disorder is often as complex and difficult to analyze as the disorder itself. But we find that certain general conclusions can be drawn:

- Social and economic conditions in the riot cities constituted a clear pattern of severe disadvantage for Negroes compared with whites, whether the Negroes lived in the area where the riot took place or outside it. Negroes had completed fewer years of education and fewer had attended high school. Negroes were twice as likely to be unemployed and three times as likely to be in unskilled and service jobs. Negroes averaged 70 percent of the income earned by whites and were more than twice as likely to be living in poverty. Although housing cost Negroes relatively more, they had worse housing—three times as likely to be overcrowded and substandard. When compared to white suburbs, the relative disadvantage is even more pronounced.

A study of the aftermath of disorder leads to disturbing conclusions. We find that, despite the institution of some post-riot programs:

- Little basic change in the conditions underlying the outbreak of disorder has taken place. Actions to ameliorate Negro grievances have been limited and sporadic; with but few exceptions, they have not significantly reduced tensions.
- In several cities, the principal official response has been to train and equip the police with more sophisticated weapons.
- In several cities, increasing polarization is evident, with continuing breakdown of inter-racial communication, and growth of white segregationist or black separatist groups.

Chapter 3—Organized Activity

The President directed the Commission to investigate "to what extent, if any, there has been planning or organization in any of the riots."

To carry out this part of the President's charge, the Commission established a special investigative staff supplementing the field teams that made the general examination of the riots in 23 cities. The unit examined data collected by federal agencies and congressional committees, including thousands of documents supplied by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, gathered and evaluated information from local and state law enforcement agencies and officials, and conducted its own field investigation in selected cities.

On the basis of all the information collected, the Commission concludes that:

> The urban disorders of the summer of 1967 were not caused by, nor were they the consequence of, any organized plan or "conspiracy."

Specifically, the Commission has found no evidence that all or any of the disorders or the incidents that led to them were planned or directed by any organization or group, international, national or local.

Militant organizations, local and national, and individual agitators, who repeatedly forecast and called for violence, were active in the spring and summer of 1967. We believe that they sought to encourage violence, and that they helped to create an atmosphere that contributed to the outbreak of disorder.

We recognize that the continuation of disorders and the polarization of the races would provide fertile ground for organized exploitation in the future.

Investigations of organized activity are continuing at all levels of government, including committees of Congress. These investigations relate not only to the disorders of 1967 but also to the actions of groups and individuals, particularly in schools and colleges, during this last fall and winter. The Commission has cooperated in these investigations. They should continue.

Part II—Why Did It Happen?

Chapter 4—The Basic Causes

In addressing the question "Why did it happen?" we shift our focus from the local to the national scene, from the particular events of the summer of 1967 to the factors within the society at large that created a mood of violence among many urban Negroes.

These factors are complex and interacting; they vary significantly in their effect from city to city and from year to year; and the consequences of one disorder, generating new grievances and new demands, become the causes of the next. Thus was created the "thicket of tension, conflicting evidence and extreme opinions" cited by the President.

Despite these complexities, certain fundamental matters are clear. Of these, the most fundamental is the racial attitude and behavior of white Americans toward black Americans.

Race prejudice has shaped our history decisively; it now threatens to affect our future.

White racism is essentially responsible for the explosive mixture which has been accumulating in our cities since the end of World War II. Among the ingredients of this mixture are:

- Pervasive discrimination and segregation in employment, education and housing, which have resulted in the continuing exclusion of great numbers of Negroes from the benefits of economic progress.
- Black in-migration and white exodus, which have produced the massive and growing concentrations of impoverished Negroes in our major cities, creating a growing crisis of deteriorating facilities and services and unmet human needs.
- The black ghettos where segregation and poverty converge on the young to destroy opportunity and enforce failure. Crime, drug addiction, dependency on welfare, and bitterness and resentment against society in general and white society in particular are the result.

At the same time, most whites and some Negroes outside the ghetto have prospered to a degree unparalleled in the history of civilization. Through television and other media, this affluence has been flaunted before the eyes of the Negro poor and the jobless ghetto youth.

Yet these facts alone cannot be said to have caused the disorders. Recently, other powerful ingredients have begun to catalyze the mixture:

- Frustrated hopes are the residue of the unfulfilled expectations aroused by the great judicial and legislative victories of the Civil Rights Movement and the dramatic struggle for equal rights in the South.
- A climate that tends toward approval and encouragement of violence as a form of protest has been created by white terrorism directed against nonviolent protest; by the open defiance of law and federal authority by state and local officials resisting desegregation; and by some protest groups engaging in civil disobedience who turn their backs on nonviolence, go beyond the constitutionally protected rights of petition and free assembly, and resort to violence to attempt to compel alteration of laws and policies with which they disagree.

- The frustrations of powerlessness have led some Negroes to the conviction that there is no effective alternative to violence as a means of achieving redress of grievances, and of "moving the system." These frustrations are reflected in alienation and hostility toward the institutions of law and government and the white society which controls them, and in the reach toward racial consciousness and solidarity reflected in the slogan "Black Power."
- A new mood has sprung up among Negroes, particularly among the young, in which self-esteem and enhanced racial pride are replacing apathy and submission to "the system."
- The police are not merely a "spark" factor. To some Negroes police have come to symbolize white power, white racism and white repression. And the fact is that many police do reflect and express these white attitudes. The atmosphere of hostility and cynicism is reinforced by a widespread belief among Negroes in the existence of police brutality and in a "double standard" of justice and protection—one for Negroes and one for whites.

To this point, we have attempted to identify the prime components of the "explosive mixture." In the chapters that follow we seek to analyze them in the perspective of history. Their meaning, however, is clear:

In the summer of 1967, we have seen in our cities a chain reaction of racial violence. If we are heedless, none of us shall escape the consequences.

Chapter 5—Rejection and Protest: An Historical Sketch

The causes of recent racial disorders are embedded in a tangle of issues and circumstances—social, economic, political and psychological—which arise out of the historic pattern of Negro-white relations in America.

In this chapter we trace the pattern, identify the recurrent themes of Negro protest and, most importantly, provide a perspective on the protest activities of the present era.

We describe the Negro's experience in America and the development of slavery as an institution. We show his persistent striving for equality in the face of rigidly maintained social, economic and educational barriers, and repeated mob violence. We portray the ebb and flow of the doctrinal tides—accommodation, separatism, and self-help—and their relationship to the current theme of Black Power. We conclude:

The Black Power advocates of today consciously feel that they are the most militant group in the Negro protest movement. Yet they have retreated from a direct confrontation with American society on the issue of integration and, by preaching separatism, unconsciously function as an accommodation to white racism. Much of their economic program, as well as their interest in Negro history, self-help, racial solidarity and separation, is reminiscent of Booker T. Washington. The rhetoric is different, but the ideas are remarkably similar.

Chapter 6—The Formation Of the Racial Ghettos[1]

Throughout the 20th century the Negro population of the United States has been moving steadily from rural areas to urban and from South to North and West. In 1910, 91 percent of the nation's 9.8 million Negroes lived in the South and only 27 percent of American Negroes lived in cities of 2,500 persons or more. Between 1910 and 1966 the total Negro population more than doubled, reaching 21.5 million, and the number living in metropolitan areas rose more than five-fold (from 2.6 million to 14.8 million). The number outside the South rose eleven-fold (from 880,000 to 9.7 million).

Negro migration from the South has resulted from the expectation of thousands of new and highly paid jobs for unskilled workers in the North and the shift to mechanized farming in the South. However, the Negro migration is small when compared to earlier waves of European immigrants. Even between 1960 and 1966, there were 1.8 million immigrants from abroad compared to the 613,000 Negroes who arrived in the North and West from the South.

As a result of the growing number of Negroes in urban areas, natural increase has replaced migration as the primary source of Negro population increase in the cities. Nevertheless, Negro migration from the South will continue unless economic conditions there change dramatically.

Basic data concerning Negro urbanization trends indicate that:

- Almost all Negro population growth (98 percent from 1950 to 1966) is occurring within metropolitan areas, primarily within central cities.[2]
- The vast majority of white population growth (78 percent from 1960 to 1966) is occurring in suburban portions of metropolitan areas. Since 1960, white central-city population has declined by 1.3 million.

[1] The term "ghetto" as used in this report refers to an area within a city characterized by poverty and acute social disorganization, and inhabited by members of a racial or ethnic group under conditions of involuntary segregation.

[2] A "central city" is the largest city of a standard metropolitan statistical area, that is, a metropolitan area containing at least one city of 50,000 or more inhabitants.

- As a result, central cities are becoming more heavily Negro while the suburban fringes around them remain almost entirely white.
- The twelve largest central cities now contain over two-thirds of the Negro population outside the South, and one-third of the Negro total in the United States.

Within the cities, Negroes have been excluded from white residential areas through discriminatory practices. Just as significant is the withdrawal of white families from, or their refusal to enter, neighborhoods where Negroes are moving or already residing. About 20 percent of the urban population of the United States changes residence every year. The refusal of whites to move into "changing" areas when vacancies occur means that most vacancies eventually are occupied by Negroes.

The result, according to a recent study, is that in 1960 the average segregation index for 207 of the largest United States cities was 86.2. In other words, to create an unsegregated population distribution, an average of over 86 percent of all Negroes would have to change their place of residence within the city.

Chapter 7—Unemployment, Family Structure, and Social Disorganization

Although there have been gains in Negro income nationally, and a decline in the number of Negroes below the "poverty level," the condition of Negroes in the central city remains in a state of crisis. Between 2 and 2.5 million Negroes—16 to 20 percent of the total Negro population of all central cities—live in squalor and deprivation in ghetto neighborhoods.

Employment is a key problem. It not only controls the present for the Negro American but, in a most profound way, it is creating the future as well. Yet, despite continuing economic growth and declining national unemployment rates, the unemployment rate for Negroes in 1967 was more than double that for whites.

Equally important is the undesirable nature of many jobs open to Negroes and other minorities. Negro men are more than three times as likely as white men to be in low-paying, unskilled or service jobs. This concentration of male Negro employment at the lowest end of the occupational scale is the single most important cause of poverty among Negroes.

In one study of low-income neighborhoods, the "subemployment rate," including both unemployment and underemployment, was about 33 percent, or 8.8 times greater than the overall unemployment rate for all United States workers.

Employment problems, aggravated by the constant arrival of new unemployed migrants, many of them from depressed rural areas, create persistent poverty in the ghetto. In 1966, about 11.9 percent of the nation's whites and 40.6 percent of its nonwhites were below the "poverty level" defined by the Social Security Administration (currently $3,335 per year for an urban family of four). Over 40 percent of the nonwhites below the poverty level live in the central cities.

Employment problems have drastic social impact in the ghetto. Men who are chronically unemployed or employed in the lowest status jobs are often unable or unwilling to remain with their families. The handicap imposed on children growing up without fathers in an atmosphere of poverty and deprivation is increased as mothers are forced to work to provide support.

The culture of poverty that results from unemployment and family breakup generates a system of ruthless, exploitative relationships within the ghetto. Prostitution, dope addiction, and crime create an environmental "jungle" characterized by personal insecurity and tension. Children growing up under such conditions are likely participants in civil disorder.

Chapter 8—Conditions of Life In the Racial Ghetto

A striking difference in environment from that of white, middle-class Americans profoundly influences the lives of residents of the ghetto.

Crime rates, consistently higher than in other areas, create a pronounced sense of insecurity. For example, in one city one low-income Negro district had 35 times as many serious crimes against persons as a high-income white district. Unless drastic steps are taken, the crime problems in poverty areas are likely to continue to multiply as the growing youth and rapid urbanization of the population outstrip police resources.

Poor health and sanitation conditions in the ghetto result in higher mortality rates, a higher incidence of major diseases, and lower availability and utilization of medical services. The infant mortality rate for nonwhite babies under the age of one month is 58 percent higher than for whites; for one to 12 months it is almost three times as high. The level of sanitation in the ghetto is far below that in high income areas. Garbage collection is often inadequate. Of an estimated 14,000 cases of rat bite in the United States in 1965, most were in ghetto neighborhoods.

Ghetto residents believe they are "exploited" by local merchants; and evidence substantiates some of these beliefs. A study conducted in one city by the Federal Trade Commission showed that distinctly higher prices were charged for goods sold in ghetto stores than in other areas.

Lack of knowledge regarding credit purchasing creates special pitfalls for the disadvantaged. In many states garnishment practices compound these difficulties by allowing creditors to deprive individuals of their wages without hearing or trial.

Chapter 9—Comparing the Immigrant and Negro Experience

In this chapter, we address ourselves to a fundamental question that many white Americans are asking: why have so many Negroes, unlike the European immigrants, been unable to escape from the ghetto and from poverty. We believe the following factors play a part:

- The Maturing Economy: When the European immigrants arrived, they gained an economic foothold by providing the unskilled labor needed by industry. Unlike the immigrant, the Negro migrant found little opportunity in the city. The economy, by then matured, had little use for the unskilled labor he had to offer.
- The Disability of Race: The structure of discrimination has stringently narrowed opportunities for the Negro and restricted his prospects. European immigrants suffered from discrimination, but never so pervasively.
- Entry into the Political System: The immigrants usually settled in rapidly growing cities with powerful and expanding political machines, which traded economic advantages for political support. Ward-level grievance machinery, as well as personal representation, enabled the immigrant to make his voice heard and his power felt.

  By the time the Negro arrived, these political machines were no longer so powerful or so well equipped to provide jobs or other favors, and in many cases were unwilling to share their influence with Negroes.
- Cultural Factors: Coming from societies with a low standard of living and at a time when job aspirations were low, the immigrants sensed little deprivation in being forced to take the less desirable and poorer-paying jobs. Their large and cohesive families contributed to total income. Their vision of the future—one that led to a life outside of the ghetto—provided the incentive necessary to endure the present.

  Although Negro men worked as hard as the immigrants, they were unable to support their families. The entrepreneurial opportunities had vanished. As a result of slavery and long periods of unemployment, the Negro family structure had become matriarchal; the males played a secondary and marginal family role —one which offered little compensation for their hard and unrewarding labor. Above all, segregation denied Negroes access to good jobs and the opportunity to leave the ghetto. For them, the future seemed to lead only to a dead end.

Today, whites tend to exaggerate how well and quickly they escaped from poverty. The fact is that immigrants who came from rural backgrounds, as many Negroes do, are only now, after three generations, finally beginning to move into the middle class.

By contrast, Negroes began concentrating in the city less than two generations ago, and under much less favorable conditions. Although some Negroes have escaped poverty, few have been able to escape the urban ghetto.

PART III—WHAT CAN BE DONE?

Chapter 10—The Community Response

Our investigation of the 1967 riot cities establishes that virtually every major episode of violence was foreshadowed by an accumulation of unresolved grievances and by widespread dissatisfaction among Negroes with the unwillingness or inability of local government to respond.

Overcoming these conditions is essential for community support of law enforcement and civil order. City governments need new and more vital channels of communication to the residents of the ghetto; they need to improve their capacity to respond effectively to community needs before they become community grievances; and they need to provide opportunity for meaningful involvement of ghetto residents in shaping policies and programs which affect the community.

The Commission recommends that local governments:

- Develop Neighborhood Action Task Forces as joint community-government efforts through which more effective communication can be achieved, and the delivery of city services to ghetto residents improved.
- Establish comprehensive grievance-response mechanisms in order to bring all public agencies under public scrutiny.
- Bring the institutions of local government closer to the people they serve by establishing neighborhood outlets for local, state and federal administrative and public service agencies.
- Expand opportunities for ghetto residents to participate in the formulation of public policy and the implementation of programs affecting them through improved political representation, creation of institutional channels for community action, expansion of legal services, and legislative hearings on ghetto problems.

In this effort, city governments will require state and federal support.

The Commission recommends:

- State and federal financial assistance for mayors and city councils to support the research, consultants, staff and other resources needed to respond effectively to federal program initiatives.

- State cooperation in providing municipalities with the jurisdictional tools needed to deal with their problems; a fuller measure of financial aid to urban areas; and the focusing of the interests of suburban communities on the physical, social and cultural environment of the central city.

Chapter 11—Police and the Community

The abrasive relationship between the police and the minority communities has been a major—and explosive—source of grievance, tension and disorder. The blame must be shared by the total society.

The police are faced with demands for increased protection and service in the ghetto. Yet the aggressive patrol practices thought necessary to meet these demands themselves create tension and hostility. The resulting grievances have been further aggravated by the lack of effective mechanisms for handling complaints against the police. Special programs for bettering police-community relations have been instituted, but these alone are not enough. Police administrators, with the guidance of public officials, and the support of the entire community, must take vigorous action to improve law enforcement and to decrease the potential for disorder.

The Commission recommends that city government and police authorities:

- Review police operations in the ghetto to ensure proper conduct by police officers, and eliminate abrasive practices.
- Provide more adequate police protection to ghetto residents to eliminate their high sense of insecurity, and the belief of many Negro citizens in the existence of a dual standard of law enforcement.
- Establish fair and effective mechanisms for the redress of grievances against the police, and other municipal employees.
- Develop and adopt policy guidelines to assist officers in making critical decisions in areas where police conduct can create tension.
- Develop and use innovative programs to ensure widespread community support for law enforcement.
- Recruit more Negroes into the regular police force, and review promotion policies to ensure fair promotion for Negro officers.
- Establish a "Community Service Officer" program to attract ghetto youths between the ages of 17 and 21 to police work. These junior officers would perform duties in ghetto neighborhoods, but would not have full police authority. The federal government should provide support equal to 90 percent of the costs of employing CSOs on the basis of one for every ten regular officers.

Chapter 12—Control of Disorder

Preserving civil peace is the first responsibility of government. Unless the rule of law prevails, our society will lack not only order but also the environment essential to social and economic progress.

The maintenance of civil order cannot be left to the police alone. The police need guidance, as well as support, from mayors and other public officials. It is the responsibility of public officials to determine proper police policies, support adequate police standards for personnel and performance, and participate in planning for the control of disorders.

To maintain control of incidents which could lead to disorders, the Commission recommends that local officials:

- Assign seasoned, well-trained policemen and supervisory officers to patrol ghetto areas, and to respond to disturbances.
- Develop plans which will quickly muster maximum police manpower and highly qualified senior commanders at the outbreak of disorders.
- Provide special training in the prevention of disorders, and prepare police for riot control and for operation in units, with adequate command and control and field communication for proper discipline and effectiveness.
- Develop guidelines governing the use of control equipment and provide alternatives to the use of lethal weapons. Federal support for research in this area is needed.
- Establish an intelligence system to provide police and other public officials with reliable information that may help to prevent the outbreak of a disorder and to institute effective control measures in the event a riot erupts.
- Develop continuing contacts with ghetto residents to make use of the forces for order which exist within the community.
- Establish machinery for neutralizing rumors, and enabling Negro leaders and residents to obtain the facts. Create special rumor details to collect, evaluate, and dispel rumors that may lead to a civil disorder.

The Commission believes there is a grave danger that some communities may resort to the indiscriminate and excessive use of force. The harmful effects of overreaction are incalculable. The Commission condemns moves to equip police departments with mass destruction weapons, such as automatic rifles, machine guns and tanks. Weapons which are designed to destroy, not to control, have no place in densely populated urban communities.

The Commission recognizes the sound principle of local authority and responsibility in law enforcement, but recommends that the federal government share in the financing of programs for improvement of police forces, both in their normal law enforcement activities as well as in their response to civil disorders.

To assist government authorities in planning their response to civil disorder, this report contains a Supplement on Control of Disorder. It deals with specific problems encountered during riot-control operations, and includes:

- Assessment of the present capabilities of police, National Guard and Army forces to control major riots, and recommendations for improvement;
- Recommended means by which the control operations of those forces may be coordinated with the response of other agencies, such as fire departments, and with the community at large;
- Recommendations for review and revision of federal, state and local laws needed to provide the framework for control efforts and for the call-up and interrelated action of public safety forces.

Chapter 13—The Administration of Justice Under Emergency Conditions

In many of the cities which experienced disorders last summer, there were recurring breakdowns in the mechanisms for processing, prosecuting and protecting arrested persons. These resulted mainly from long-standing structural deficiencies in criminal court systems, and from the failure of communities to anticipate and plan for the emergency demands of civil disorders.

In part, because of this, there were few successful prosecutions for serious crimes committed during the riots. In those cities where mass arrests occurred many arrestees were deprived of basic legal rights.

The Commission recommends that the cities and states:

- Undertake reform of the lower courts so as to improve the quality of justice rendered under normal conditions.
- Plan comprehensive measures by which the criminal justice system may be supplemented during civil disorders so that its deliberative functions are protected, and the quality of justice is maintained.

Such emergency plans require broad community participation and dedicated leadership by the bench and bar. They should include:

- Laws sufficient to deter and punish riot conduct.
- Additional judges, bail and probation officers, and clerical staff.
- Arrangements for volunteer lawyers to help prosecutors and to represent riot defendants at every stage of proceedings.
- Policies to ensure proper and individual bail, arraignment, pretrial, trial and sentencing proceedings.
- Procedures for processing arrested persons, such as summons and release, and release on personal recognizance, which permit separation of minor offenders from those dangerous to the community, in order that serious offenders may be detained and prosecuted effectively.
- Adequate emergency processing and detention facilities.

Chapter 14—Damages: Repair and Compensation

The Commission recommends that the federal government:

- Amend the Federal Disaster Act—which now applies only to natural disasters—to permit federal emergency food and medical assistance to cities during major civil disorders, and provide long-term economic assistance afterwards.
- With the cooperation of the states, create incentives for the private insurance industry to provide more adequate property-insurance coverage in inner-city areas.

The Commission endorses the report of the National Advisory Panel on Insurance in Riot-Affected Areas: "Meeting the Insurance Crisis of our Cities."

Chapter 15—The News Media and the Riots

In his charge to the Commission, the President asked: "What effect do the mass media have on the riots?"

The Commission determined that the answer to the President's question did not lie solely in the performance of the press and broadcasters in reporting the riots. Our analysis had to consider also the overall treatment by the media of the Negro ghettos, community relations, racial attitudes, and poverty—day by day and month by month, year in and year out.

A wide range of interviews with government officials, law enforcement authorities, media personnel and other citizens, including ghetto residents, as well as a quantitative analysis of riot coverage and a special conference with industry representatives, leads us to conclude that:

- Despite instances of sensationalism, inaccuracy and distortion, newspapers, radio and television tried on the whole to give a balanced, factual account of the 1967 disorders.
- Elements of the news media failed to portray accurately the scale and character of the violence that occurred last summer. The overall effect was, we believe, an exaggeration of both mood and event.
- Important segments of the media failed to report adequately on the causes and consequences of civil disorders and on the underlying problems of race relations. They have not communicated to the majority of their audience—which is white—a sense of the degradation, misery and hopelessness of life in the ghetto.

These failings must be corrected, and the improvement must come from within the industry. Freedom of the press is not the issue. Any effort to impose governmental restrictions would be inconsistent with fundamental constitutional precepts.

We have seen evidence that the news media are becoming aware of and concerned about their performance in this field. As that concern grows, coverage will improve. But much more must be done, and it must be done soon.

The Commission recommends that the media:

- Expand coverage of the Negro community and of race problems through permanent assignment of reporters familiar with urban and racial affairs, and through establishment of more and better links with the Negro community.
- Integrate Negroes and Negro activities into all aspects of coverage and content, including newspaper articles and television programming. The news media must publish newspapers and produce programs that recognize the existence and activities of Negroes as a group within the community and as a part of the larger community.
- Recruit more Negroes into journalism and broadcasting and promote those who are qualified to positions of significant responsibility. Recruitment should begin in high schools and continue through college; where necessary, aid for training should be provided.
- Improve coordination with police in reporting riot news through advance planning, and cooperate with the police in the designation of police information officers, establishment of information centers, and development of mutually acceptable guidelines for riot reporting and the conduct of media personnel.
- Accelerate efforts to ensure accurate and responsible reporting of riot and racial news, through adoption by all news gathering organizations of stringent internal staff guidelines.
- Cooperate in the establishment of a privately organized and funded Institute of Urban Communications to train and educate journalists in urban affairs, recruit and train more Negro journalists, develop methods for improving police-press relations, review coverage of riots and racial issues, and support continuing research in the urban field.

Chapter 16—The Future of the Cities

By 1985, the Negro population in central cities is expected to increase by 72 percent to approximately 20.8 million. Coupled with the continued exodus of white families to the suburbs, this growth will produce majority Negro populations in many of the nation's largest cities.

The future of these cities, and of their burgeoning Negro populations, is grim. Most new employment opportunities are being created in suburbs and outlying areas. This trend will continue unless important changes in public policy are made.

In prospect, therefore, is further deterioration of already inadequate municipal tax bases in the face of increasing demands for public services, and continuing unemployment and poverty among the urban Negro population:

Three choices are open to the nation:

- We can maintain present policies, continuing both the proportion of the nation's resources now allocated to programs for the unemployed and the disadvantaged, and the inadequate and failing effort to achieve an integrated society.
- We can adopt a policy of "enrichment" aimed at improving dramatically the quality of ghetto life while abandoning integration as a goal.
- We can pursue integration by combining ghetto "enrichment" with policies which will encourage Negro movement out of central city areas.

The first choice, continuance of present policies, has ominous consequences for our society. The share of the nation's resources now allocated to programs for the disadvantaged is insufficient to arrest the deterioration of life in central city ghettos. Under such conditions, a rising proportion of Negroes may come to see in the deprivation and segregation they experience, a justification for violent protest, or for extending support to now isolated extremists who advocate civil disruption. Large-scale and continuing violence could result, followed by white retaliation, and, ultimately, the separation of the two communities in a garrison state.

Even if violence does not occur, the consequences are unacceptable. Development of a racially integrated society, extraordinarily difficult today, will be virtually impossible when the present black ghetto population of 12.5 million has grown to almost 21 million.

To continue present policies is to make permanent the division of our country into two societies; one, largely Negro and poor, located in the central cities; the other, predominantly white and affluent, located in the suburbs and in outlying areas.

The second choice, ghetto enrichment coupled with abandonment of integration, is also unacceptable. It is another way of choosing a permanently divided country. Moreover, equality cannot be achieved under conditions of nearly complete separation. In a country where the economy, and particularly the resources of employment, are predominantly white, a policy of separation can only relegate Negroes to a permanently inferior economic status.

We believe that the only possible choice for America is the third—a policy which combines ghetto enrichment with programs designed to encourage integration of substantial numbers of Negroes into the society outside the ghetto.

Enrichment must be an important adjunct to integration, for no matter how ambitious or energetic the program, few Negroes now living in central cities can be quickly integrated.

In the meantime, large-scale improvement in the quality of ghetto life is essential.

But this can be no more than an interim strategy. Programs must be developed which will permit substantial Negro movement out of the ghettos. The primary goal must be a single society, in which every citizen will be free to live and work according to his capabilities and desires, not his color.

Chapter 17—Recommendations For National Action

INTRODUCTION

No American—white or black—can escape the consequences of the continuing social and economic decay of our major cities.

Only a commitment to national action on an unprecedented scale can shape a future compatible with the historic ideals of American society.

The great productivity of our economy, and a federal revenue system which is highly responsive to economic growth, can provide the resources.

The major need is to generate new will—the will to tax ourselves to the extent necessary to meet the vital needs of the nation.

We have set forth goals and proposed strategies to reach those goals. We discuss and recommend programs not to commit each of us to specific parts of such programs but to illustrate the type and dimension of action needed.

The major goal is the creation of a true union—a single society and a single American identity. Toward that goal, we propose the following objectives for national action:

- Opening up opportunities to those who are restricted by racial segregation and discrimination, and eliminating all barriers to their choice of jobs, education and housing.
- Removing the frustration of powerlessness among the disadvantaged by providing the means for them to deal with the problems that affect their own lives and by increasing the capacity of our public and private institutions to respond to these problems.
- Increasing communication across racial lines to destroy stereotypes, to halt polarization, end distrust and hostility, and create common ground for efforts toward public order and social justice.

We propose these aims to fulfill our pledge of equality and to meet the fundamental needs of a democratic and civilized society—domestic peace and social justice.

EMPLOYMENT

Pervasive unemployment and underemployment are the most persistent and serious grievances in minority areas. They are inextricably linked to the problem of civil disorder.

Despite growing federal expenditures for manpower development and training programs, and sustained general economic prosperity and increasing demands for skilled workers, about two million—white and nonwhite—are permanently unemployed. About ten million are underemployed, of whom 6.5 million work full time for wages below the poverty line.

The 500,000 "hard-core" unemployed in the central cities who lack a basic education and are unable to hold a steady job are made up in large part of Negro males between the ages of 18 and 25. In the riot cities which we surveyed, Negroes were three times as likely as whites to hold unskilled jobs, which are often part time, seasonal, low-paying and "dead end."

Negro males between the ages of 15 and 25 predominated among the rioters. More than 20 percent of the rioters were unemployed, and many who were employed held intermittent, low status, unskilled jobs which they regarded as below their education and ability.

The Commission recommends that the federal government:

- Undertake joint efforts with cities and states to consolidate existing manpower programs to avoid fragmentation and duplication.
- Take immediate action to create 2,000,000 new jobs over the next three years—one million in the public sector and one million in the private sector—to absorb the hard-core unemployed and materially reduce the level of underemployment for all workers, black and white. We propose 250,000 public sector and 300,000 private sector jobs in the first year.
- Provide on-the-job training by both public and private employers with reimbursement to private employers for the extra costs of training the hard-core unemployed, by contract or by tax credits.
- Provide tax and other incentives to investment in rural as well as urban poverty areas in order to offer to the rural poor an alternative to migration to urban centers.
- Take new and vigorous action to remove artificial barriers to employment and promotion, including not only racial discrimination but, in certain cases, arrest records or lack of a high school diploma. Strengthen those agencies such as the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, charged with eliminating discriminatory practices, and provide full support for Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act allowing federal grant-in-aid funds to be withheld from activities which discriminate on grounds of color or race.

The Commission commends the recent public commitment of the National Council of the Building and Construction Trades Unions, AFL-CIO, to encourage and recruit Negro membership in apprenticeship programs. This commitment should be intensified and implemented.

EDUCATION

Education in a democratic society must equip children to develop their potential and to participate fully in American life. For the community at large, the schools have discharged this responsibility well. But for many minorities, and particularly for the children of the ghetto, the schools have failed to provide the educational experience which could overcome the effects of discrimination and deprivation.

This failure is one of the persistent sources of grievance and resentment within the Negro community. The hostility of Negro parents and students toward the school system is generating increasing conflict and causing disruption within many city school districts. But the most dramatic evidence of the relationship between educational practices and civil disorders lies in the high incidence of riot participation by ghetto youth who have not completed high school.

The bleak record of public education for ghetto children is growing worse. In the critical skills—verbal and reading ability—Negro students are falling further behind whites with each year of school completed. The high unemployment and underemployment rate for Negro youth is evidence, in part, of the growing educational crisis.

We support integration as the priority education strategy; it is essential to the future of American society. In this last summer's disorders we have seen the consequences of racial isolation at all levels, and of attitudes toward race, on both sides, produced by three centuries of myth, ignorance and bias. It is indispensable that opportunities for interaction between the races be expanded.

We recognize that the growing dominance of pupils from disadvantaged minorities in city school populations will not soon be reversed. No matter how great the effort toward desegregation, many children of the ghetto will not, within their school careers, attend integrated schools.

If existing disadvantages are not to be perpetuated, we must drastically improve the quality of ghetto education. Equality of results with all-white schools must be the goal.

To implement these strategies, the Commission recommends:

- Sharply increased efforts to eliminate de facto segregation in our schools through substantial federal aid to school systems seeking to desegregate either within the system or in cooperation with neighboring school systems.

- Elimination of racial discrimination in Northern as well as Southern schools by vigorous application of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.
- Extension of quality early childhood education to every disadvantaged child in the country.
- Efforts to improve dramatically schools serving disadvantaged children through substantial federal funding of year-round compensatory education programs, improved teaching, and expanded experimentation and research.
- Elimination of illiteracy through greater federal support for adult basic education.
- Enlarged opportunities for parent and community participation in the public schools.
- Reoriented vocational education emphasizing work-experience training and the involvement of business and industry.
- Expanded opportunities for higher education through increased federal assistance to disadvantaged students.
- Revision of state aid formulas to assure more per student aid to districts having a high proportion of disadvantaged school-age children.

THE WELFARE SYSTEM

Our present system of public welfare is designed to save money instead of people, and tragically ends up doing neither. This system has two critical deficiencies:

First, it excludes large numbers of persons who are in great need, and who, if provided a decent level of support, might be able to become more productive and self-sufficient. No federal funds are available for millions of men and women who are needy but neither aged, handicapped nor the parents of minor children.

Second, for those included, the system provides assistance well below the minimum necessary for a decent level of existence, and imposes restrictions that encourage continued dependency on welfare and undermine self-respect.

A welter of statutory requirements and administrative practices and regulations operate to remind recipients that they are considered untrustworthy, promiscuous and lazy. Residence requirements prevent assistance to people in need who are newly arrived in the state. Regular searches of recipients' homes violate privacy. Inadequate social services compound the problems.

The Commission recommends that the federal government, acting with state and local governments where necessary, reform the existing welfare system to:

- Establish uniform national standards of assistance at least as high as the annual "poverty level" of income, now set by the Social Security Administration at $3,335 per year for an urban family of four.

- Require that all states receiving federal welfare contributions participate in the Aid to Families with Dependent Children—Unemployed Parents program (AFDC-UP) that permits assistance to families with both father and mother in the home, thus aiding the family while it is still intact.
- Bear a substantially greater portion of all welfare costs—at least 90 percent of total payments.
- Increase incentives for seeking employment and job training, but remove restrictions recently enacted by the Congress that would compel mothers of young children to work.
- Provide more adequate social services through neighborhood centers and family-planning programs.
- Remove the freeze placed by the 1967 welfare amendments on the percentage of children in a state that can be covered by federal assistance.
- Eliminate residence requirements.

As a long-range goal, the Commission recommends that the federal government seek to develop a national system of income supplementation based strictly on need with two broad and basic purposes:

- To provide, for those who can work or who do work, any necessary supplements in such a way as to develop incentives for fuller employment;
- To provide, for those who cannot work and for mothers who decide to remain with their children, a minimum standard of decent living, and to aid in the saving of children from the prison of poverty that has held their parents.

A broad system of supplementation would involve substantially greater federal expenditures than anything now contemplated. The cost will range widely depending on the standard of need accepted as the "basic allowance" to individuals and families, and on the rate at which additional income above this level is taxed. Yet if the deepening cycle of poverty and dependence on welfare can be broken, if the children of the poor can be given the opportunity to scale the wall that now separates them from the rest of society, the return on this investment will be great indeed.

HOUSING

After more than three decades of fragmented and grossly underfunded federal housing programs, nearly six million substandard housing units remain occupied in the United States.

The housing problem is particularly acute in the minority ghettos. Nearly two-thirds of all non-white families living in the central cities today live in neighborhoods marked with substandard housing and general urban blight. Two major factors are responsible.

First: Many ghetto residents simply cannot pay the rent necessary to support decent housing. In Detroit, for example, over 40 percent of the non-white occupied units in 1960 required rent of over 35 percent of the tenants' income.

Second: Discrimination prevents access to many non-slum areas, particularly the suburbs, where good housing exists. In addition, by creating a "back pressure" in the racial ghettos, it makes it possible for landlords to break up apartments for denser occupancy, and keeps prices and rents of deteriorated ghetto housing higher than they would be in a truly free market.

To date, federal programs have been able to do comparatively little to provide housing for the disadvantaged. In the 31-year history of subsidized federal housing, only about 800,000 units have been constructed, with recent production averaging about 50,000 units a year. By comparison, over a period only three years longer, FHA insurance guarantees have made possible the construction of over ten million middle and upper-income units.

Two points are fundamental to the Commission's recommendations:

First: Federal housing programs must be given a new thrust aimed at overcoming the prevailing patterns of racial segregation. If this is not done, those programs will continue to concentrate the most impoverished and dependent segments of the population into the central-city ghettos where there is already a critical gap between the needs of the population and the public resources to deal with them.

Second: The private sector must be brought into the production and financing of low and moderate rental housing to supply the capabilities and capital necessary to meet the housing needs of the nation.

The Commission recommends that the federal government:

- Enact a comprehensive and enforceable federal open housing law to cover the sale or rental of all housing, including single family homes.
- Reorient federal housing programs to place more low and moderate income housing outside of ghetto areas.
- Bring within the reach of low and moderate income families within the next five years six million new and existing units of decent housing, beginning with 600,000 units in the next year.

To reach this goal we recommend:

- Expansion and modification of the rent supplement program to permit use of supplements for existing housing, thus greatly increasing the reach of the program.
- Expansion and modification of the below-market interest rate program to enlarge the interest subsidy to all sponsors and provide interest-free loans to nonprofit sponsors to cover pre-construction costs, and permit sale of projects to nonprofit corporations, cooperatives, or condominiums.
- Creation of an ownership supplement program similar to present rent supplements, to make home ownership possible for low-income families.
- Federal writedown of interest rates on loans to private builders constructing moderate-rent housing.
- Expansion of the public housing program, with emphasis on small units on scattered sites, and leasing and "turnkey" programs.
- Expansion of the Model Cities program.
- Expansion and reorientation of the urban renewal program to give priority to projects directly assisting low-income households to obtain adequate housing.

CONCLUSION

One of the first witnesses to be invited to appear before this Commission was Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, a distinguished and perceptive scholar. Referring to the reports of earlier riot commissions, he said:

> I read that report . . . of the 1919 riot in Chicago, and it is as if I were reading the report of the investigating committee on the Harlem riot of '35, the report of the investigating committee on the Harlem riot of '43, the report of the McCone Commission on the Watts riot.
> I must again in candor say to you members of this Commission —it is a kind of Alice in Wonderland—with the same moving picture re-shown over and over again, the same analysis, the same recommendations, and the same inaction.

These words come to our minds as we conclude this report.

We have provided an honest beginning. We have learned much. But we have uncovered no startling truths, no unique insights, no simple solutions. The destruction and the bitterness of racial disorder, the harsh polemics of black revolt and white repression have been seen and heard before in this country.

It is time now to end the destruction and the violence, not only in the streets of the ghetto but in the lives of people.

Equal employment opportunity is a fact in law. Greater job opportunities have come with the opening of new plants and the expansion of present industries.

Jobs exist.

You have a right to be considered for those jobs without discrimination.

Whether new plants and new rights and expanding economies will mean better jobs and more security for Negroes will depend to a large extent upon whether citizens work to make equal employment a reality in their own community. Opportunities mean just that; that a door is opened.

The workbook has been prepared to help community leaders turn job equality in law into equality in fact. While the ideas are useful regarding equal employment generally, the workbook is specifically geared toward the pulp and paper industry.

We are concerning our efforts in this direction because we feel this industry is a very vital part of the economy in this region and because it is expanding at a very rapid pace. The industry has announced plans for the expenditure of almost 3 billion dollars, 2/3 of which is to be spent in this region.

We can logically assume, therefore, that the industry will be providing expanded job opportunities. Our job is to make certain that these opportunities are extended on a non-discriminatory basis.

We hope that this notebook will provide you with the inspiration for action in making equal employment in the pulp and paper industry a reality.

KNOW YOUR RIGHTS

I. TITLE VII OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

A. Who is covered?

1. employers
2. employment agencies
3. labor unions

   If the employ (or have members amounting to) at least 75 persons and their operations affect interstate commerce. As of July 2, 1967--if at least 50 persons are employed. As of July 2, 1968--if at least 25 persons are employed.

B. Who is not covered?

1. federal, state or local employers or agencies, i.e. federal government agencies
2. bona fide private clubs (other than a labor organization)
3. businesses on or near an Indian reservation (preferential treatment may be given Indians)
4. schools, colleges, or universities owned in whole or substantial part by a particular religion (such institutions may employ persons because of their religion)

C. What does Title VII do?

1. generally Title VII has as its purpose the elimination of race, color, religion, sex or national origin as a factor in employment or membership (union) practices

2. Specifically, Title VII prohibits the following things:

---An employer may not because of a person's race,

a. refuse to hire

b. discharge

c. otherwise discriminate against an individual with respect to compensation, terms, conditions, or priviledges of employment

d. limit, segregate or classify his employees in a discriminatory manner

---An employment agency may not becuase of a person's race, etc.:

a. fail or refuse to refer persons for employment

---A labor union may not because of a person's race, etc.:

a. exclude or expel persons from its membership

b. limit, segregate or classify its membership in a discriminatory manner.

c. cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee.

---Neither employers or unions may operate training or apprenticeship programs which discriminate against a person because of his race, etc.

D. How to file a complaint

1. Sample copies of the proper complaint form may be found in this workbook

2. All complaints should be immediately forwarded to our Memphis office. Address to: Legal Defense Fund

220 South Danny Thomas Blvd., Memphis,Tennessee. We will then file them with the appropriate office. In this way some systematic account can be kept of the total number of complaints filed.

3. The complaints should be notarized.
4. Complaints should be filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission no later than ninety days after the occurrence of the acts complained of; if the acts are continually occurring, indicate that in the complaint. Therefore, have them signed as soon as possible.
5. Individuals (and not committees or groups) should sign the complaint. However, a union may file a complaint on behalf of its members.
6. The complaint should describe and complain of as many discriminatory practices as personally known to the complaining party. Yet the complaint should be as specific as possible.

II. TITLE VI OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

A. What is prohibited by Title VI

----No person because of race, color or national origin may be:

a. excluded from

b. denied the benefits of

c. or be subjected to discrimination under any program receiving federal financial assistance

B. How Title VI operates

1. Each Federal department or agency authorized to dispense federal assistance funds is to draft regulations which must be complied with by those receiving such funds. These regulations should require that recipients not discriminate in a way which is violative of Title VI guarantees.

2. If you believe that a company, receiving federal funds, is not complying with the guarantees of Title VI, a complaint should be made to that federal agency responsible for the funds.

3. The federal agency is empowered to terminate or refuse the grant if the recipient is found to be engaging in discriminatory practices, violative of Title VI.

III. EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 11246

In addition to Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Executive Order No. 11246, signed by President Johnson on September 24, 1965, provides for equal employment opportunity in Federal employment and private companies or plants holding contracts with the Federal government.

Under this order, the Civil Service Commission was required to promulgate rules and regulations specifically designed to implement equal employment in Federal agencies. In addtion, the Office of Federal Contract Compliance was established in the Department of Labor to review employment practices of companies holding Federal Contracts to assure equal employment opportunities for all persons regardless of race, creed, color or sex.

A. Who is Covered By Executive Order No. 11246?

1. Civil Service Employees:

Employees in Federal agencies, such as, United States Employment Service, Veteran's Administration, Post Office, and Military Installation employees.

2. Prime Government Contractors:

Companies which perform any work for the Federal government according to a contract. Usually all of the large companies, such as, United States Steel, International Paper Company, and cigarette manufacturers have contracts with the Federal government. However, a large number of smaller and less well known companies have federal contracts also.

3. Government Sub-Contractors:

Companies which perform work for a company in the furtherance of fulfilling a contract with a prime government contractor.

B. Who May File Complaints Under Executive Order No. 11246:

1. Civil Service Complaints:

a. Federal Civil Service Employees

Any federal civil service employee who believes he has been discriminated against because of race may as an individual file a charge of discrimination with the Equal Employment Officer of the particular Federal agency in which he is employed.

b. Applicants for Civil Service Employment

Persons seeking employment with most Federal agencies may file complaints of employment discrimination with the agencies' Equal Employment Officer of the particular agency at which he is seeking a civil service job.

c. Organizations, With the Consent of the Employee or Applicants for Federal Employment

Under regulations promulgated by the Civil Service Commission, in accordance with Executive Order No. 11246, an organization may file a charge of discrimination with the particular agency at which the employee works or at which the applicant seeks employment, if the organization has the consent of the employee or applicant. This means that civil rights organizations may file charges of discrimination on behalf of persons who believe they have been discriminated against.

2. Employees and Applicants For Employment of Companies Holding Contracts with Federal Agencies:

a. Any employee of any company holding a federal contract or an applicant for employment with such contractor who believes he was denied equal employment or a job because of race, color or sex may file a charge of discrimination with the Office of Federal Contract Compliance.

C. Time For Filing Complaint

1. Complaints filed in accordance with Executive Order No. 11246, either with a Federal Agency or with the Office of Federal Contract Compliance must be filed within ninety (90) days of the alleged discriminatory act. This means that if a person was refused a promotion, a job, a pay raise, etc., the complaint should be filed within ninety (90) days of such refusal.

2. Many discriminatory practices are considered of a "continuing nature" not capable of determination for the ninety (90) day purpose. So, if in doubt, file anyway!

D. Where to File:

1. Civil Service Employees and Applicants:

Complaints of employment discrimination in Federal agencies must be filed with the particular agency involved. According to Civil Service Regulations, each agency should have a specific procedure within the agency to handle complaints of discrimination based on race.

2. Employees and Applicants for Employment of Companies Holding Federal Contracts:

Complaints should be filed with: Office of Federal Contract Compliance, Department of Labor, 1800 "G" Street, Washington, D. C.

Fair Labor Standards Act, As Amended in 1966

The Fair Labor Standards Act, as amended in 1966 went into effect on February 1, 1967. It is of great importance to groups working on fair employment because it deals with minimum wages and overtime pay. Unfortunately not all jobs are covered by this law. Therefore, it is important that local groups find out what jobs are covered and what jobs are not covered. It is the purpose of this section to provide at least part of this information.

Jobs Covered Before February 1, 1967

Certain jobs were covered by the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act before February 1, 1967. Anyone working on one of these jobs had to be paid at least $1.25 per hour. After February 1, 1967 this person must be paid at least $1.40 per hour, and after February 1, 1968 this person must be paid at least $1.60 per hour. As before February 1, 1967, this person still must be paid at least 1½ time his regular rate of pay for hours worked beyond 40 in a workweek.

What jobs are covered by this provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act? These jobs are as follows:

1. Those jobs in manufacturing plants producing goods for interstate commerce. This would include most of the manufacturing plants in Southern Mississippi.

2. Those jobs in companies transporting these goods from state to state. These would include jobs for railroads, trucking firms, shipping companies and airlines.

3. Those jobs in retail and service companies selling at least $1 million worth of goods or service. This company must have at least $250,000 worth of goods or materials coming in from another state. Examples of this type of company would be Sears Roebuck and Company, Woolworth, A. and P., etc.

4. Those jobs in local bus firms doing at least $1 million worth of business in a year.

5. Those jobs in construction companies doing at least $350,000 worth of business in a year.

6. Those jobs in gasoline service stations doing at least $250,000 worth of business in a year.

7. Those jobs in companies not included in the above categories but having employees engaged in interstate commerce and doing at least $1 million worth of business in a year.

Newly Covered Jobs

A large number of jobs have been covered only since February 1, 1967. These companies will have made the following increases in minimum wages over a period of five years:

$1.00 an hour, beginning February 1, 1967
$1.15 an hour beginning February 1, 1968
$1.30 an hour, beginning February 1, 1969
$1.45 an hour, beginning February 1, 1970
$1.60 an hour, beginning February 1, 1971

Exemptions Under Amended Act

Unfortunately not all persons come under the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Workers in private homes are not covered. Farm workers on small farms are not covered. In other words, a minimum wage and overtime pay exemption applies for workers of retail or service establishments not covered by this Act. It also applies to individual establishments in a cover company which do less than $250,000 worth of business in a year. The overtime provisions do not apply to workers of hotels, motels, and restaurants, and for for food service workers of retail or service establishments. Farm workers are not covered by the overtime provisions of the act.

Equal Pay

The equal pay provision prohibits wage discrimination on the basis of sex within an establishment: When subject to the minimum wage, employees of one sex must not be paid wages at rates lower than those paid employees of the sex for equal work on jobs requiring skill, effort, and responsibility which are performed under similar working conditions.

Child Labor

Sixteen years is the minimum age for most employment covered by the Act. This includes employment in agriculture during school

With regard to overtime, these company must pay at least 1½ time the worker's regular rate of pay according to the following time schedule:

After 44 hours in a workweek, beginning February 1, 1967
After 42 hours in a workweek, beginning February 1, 1968
After 40 hours in a workweek, beginning February 1, 1969

What jobs are covered by this provision on the Fair Labor Standards Act? These jobs are as follows:

1. Those jobs in laundry and dry cleaning establishments.
2. Those jobs in construction enterprises.
3. Hospitals, nursing homes, and most schools (both public and private, but excluding Federal Government hospitals).
4. Other companies, if amount of business it does in a year is at least $500,000 ($250,000 after February 1, 1969). Hotel, motel and restaurant enterprises are among the new establishments covered by this provision.

Some farm workers have covered by the minimum wage provisions since February 1, 1967. They are covered if the employer used more than 500 man-hours of farm labor in any calendar quarter of the preceding year. Such workers must be paid a minimum wage of at least $1.00 an hour beginning February 1, 1967, $1.15 an hour beginning February 1, 1968, and $1.30 an hour beginning February 1, 1969. The overtime provisions do not apply to farm workers.

hour or in farm jobs declared hazardous by the Secretary of Labor. Eighteen years is the minimum age for employment in non-agricultural jobs declared hazardous. Fourteen years is the minimum age for employment outside school hours in a variety of non-manufacturing and non-mining occupations for a limited number of hours under specified conditions.

What To Do With A Complaint

The Fair Labor Standards Act is a complicated law. Therefore, this has been only a partial discussion of the law. If you have a question concerning the provisions of this act, or if you have a complaint, contact either the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor or the Legal Defense Fund.

CREATE

COMMITTEE

ACTION ACTION ACTION

CREATE AN ACTION COMMITTEE

Create an action committee for fair employment. This could BE A SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF AN ALREADY EXISTING ORGANIZATION, LIKE THE NAACP or the MFDP. Best results usually come from county-wide committees involving all kinds of people from all kinds of groups concerned about jobs.

Helping people help themselves is the only lasting way to help them. When everyone is working toward a common goal results are more likely to ensue.

Here are some tips which community leaders may find helpful.

1. Show understanding of the problems of the people in the group.

2. Show respect. Be business-like.

3. Don't do things for them--make them do things for themselves.

4. Always point out that they must act to set up their project.

5. Describe steps similiar groups have taken to achieve success.

6. When you speak:
   - (a) Talk in plain language,
   - (b) Use familiar examples
   - (c) Talk about what happens how,
   - (d) Talk about what happens now,
   - (e) Have the people discuss among themselves. In this way you can determine how well you have been understood.

7. Find two or three people in whom you can place your confidence. Make sure that no one person has too much power.

8. Try to see to it that the work is spread out. Keep everybody busy.

9. Keep the committee broadly based. Try to draw participation from all segments of the community.

10. Use imagination in proposing constructive activities for the committee. See step eleven.

The more people involved, the more you can get done. But start with those expressing interest--no matter how few. A few hardworking, dedicated and well disciplined persons can effect a real change. Successes attract others. Draw upon youth, retirees, the unemployed, and others with some time to contribute.

Remember to keep in touch with our office.

Clip newspaper articles, be on the lookout for news about future plans for expansion and new industries.

Order publications about jobs in the pulp and paper industry from fedetal, state and local agencies and from private organizations.

Read pulp and paper publications in the library or subscribe to them.

Before initiating this project we determined the areas in which know expansion was taking place.

In Mobile the paper industry employs almost 10,000 people with the largest plant being International Paper Company, which has just completed a four million dollar expansion program. Other plant located here are the Scott Paper Company, Stone Container Corp., National Gypsum and Rubberoid Inc.

In Brewton, Alabama the Container Corporation of America has a principal plant here and controls about 150,000 acres of land.

The Allied Paper Company has a large plant in Jackson, Alabama.

In Pine Hill, Alabama the McMillan Blodell Company has just completed a 77 million dollar complex which includes a saw mill, paper mill and pulp mill.

In Naheola, Alabama the Marathon Southern Corporation, a division of American Can, has just completed a 15 million dollar expansion program. We already have information that a good deal of discrimination exists.

In Demopolis, Alabama, Gulf State Corp. has a large plant.

The Gulf State Paper Corp. has its largest plant in Tuscaloosa, Alabama.

Hammermill Paper Company has just completed a large plant in Selma, Alabama.

The Union Camp Company has just completed a new plant in Prattville, Alabama.

The Kimberly Clarke Company is in the process of completing a 45 million dollar expansion program in Coosa Pines and already employs over two thousand people.

In Courtland, Alabama U. S. Plywood-Champion Paper has purchased some 2,000 acres, but has not yet commenced to building.

In Camden, Arkansas, the Barrett Division of Allied Chemicals has just been sold to the Jim Walter Corp. of Tampa, Florida and the International Paper Company has just completed a 12 million dollar expansion program.

There are two pulp mills and four paper mills located in Crossett, Arkansas. The Georgia Pacific Company has allocated 75 million dollars for expansion by 1970, 50 million of which is to be completed by the end of this year. I might also point out that, as a matter of history, Crossett as a town was pretty much organized by the Georgia-Pacific company

In Pine Bluff there are two paper mills and three pulp mills. The Dierks Paper Company has a large installation and the International Paper Company has just completed a 19 million dollar expansion.

The International Paper Company has allocated 6 1/2 million dollars for a fiber board plant in Malvern which is to be completed around the middle of this year.

Nekoosa Edwards Paper Company is building a 46 million dollar plant in Ashdown and it should be completed by the middle of the year.

In Warren, Arkansas the Potlatch Forest Inc. has allocated 50 million dollars for a pulp and a paper mill.

In Bastrop, La. the International Paper Company has allocated 40 million dollars for expansion of its mills there.

In Bogalusa, Crown-Zellerbach is the dominant firm and has spent 1.7 million dollars in modernization for the year just ended. It should be pointed out that Crown-Zellerbach is now in court and that we are hesitant to establish a committee in this area pending the settlement of that suit.

In Elizabeth, La., Calcasleu Paper Company has spent almost three quarters of a million dollars on its paper mills. They have one paper mill and one pulp mill.

In Hodge, La. the Continental Can Co. has one pulp mill and one paper mill.

In Lockport, La., the Valentine Paper and Pulp Company has one pulp mill and one paper mill.

In Marrero, La., the Celotex Corp. has one paper mill.

In Port Hudson the Louisiana Forest Products Corp. has entered into a joint venture with Riegel Paper Corp. and Uk's Inveresk Paper Company to build a 40 million dollar pulp mill which should be completed this year.

In St. Francisville there are presently two paper mills and two pulp mills. Crown-Zellerbach spent about thirty million dollars remodeling an existing mill and about 40 million dollars building a new mill.

In Shreveport Bird & Son Inc. have one paper mill and one pulp mill.

In Springhill there are two paper mills and one pulp mill, owned by International Paper and Red River Paper Mill. International spent about 4 million dollaes in expansions last year.

Vacherie has one paper mill owned by the Fiberite Corp.

In West Monroe Olin-Mathieson has one pulp mill and paper mill.

Louisiana Forest Products has a plant in Zachery.

In Deridder the Boise Cascade Corp. has announced plans to spend 10 million dollars to build a new plant there. The Packaging Corp. of America is conducting feasibility studies toward the establishment of a prepared paper mill.

In Alexandria thePineville Craft Corp. built a 50 million dollar craft, pulp and liner board mill at nearby Pineville.

In Greenville, Mississippi, U. S. Gypsum has one pulp mill and one paper mill.

In Laurel the Masonite Corp. has a pulp mill, a paper mill and the largest hardwood flooring plant in the world.

St. Regis Paper Company is building a 110 million dollar complex in Monticello.

In Moss Point the International Paper Company has both a pulp mill and a paper mill.

In Natchez, Mississippi the International Paper Company has announced plans to spend 6 million dollars in expanding its facilities here. In addition, both Diamond National Corp. and the Johns Manville Products Corp. have plants here.

Mississippi Industrial Land and Timber Company has one paper plant and has announced plans for modernization of it's plant in Pickens.

In Vicksburg the International Paper Company has just erected a 61 million dollar pulp-liner board mill.

More specific information can be determined by local committees.

GET THE FACTS. Nothing you will do will be more important then becoming knowledgeable about the true situation existing in a plant which is a target for your project. You should, if at all possible, know where discrimination exists, and what steps should be taken to correct it. Talk to employees, talk to plant officials, talk to local folk. Read the newspaper about expansions.

Find out how many departments there are, which are segregated, which discriminate. Learn as much as possible about the plant and find people within the plant who would be willing to testify as to the truth of your statements.

The Legal Defense Fund will be taking several steps to support this project. One of them is to confront corporate heads of organizations with the facts about discrimination we know of that exists. In order to do this we need the facts.

Another step is to contact the Office of Federal Contract Compliance suggesting changes that office should demand in order to insure equal employment opportunities. Before we can do this we need the facts.

We will at times contact the Equal Opportunity Commission directly requesting a commissioner's charge. Before we can do this we need the facts. We have on at least one occasion communicated with the President of the United States spelling out discrimination we found to exist in a very large company and suggesting ways by which the President can use his good office to see that such discrimination was eliminated. Before doing this we have to have the facts. Your job is to get the facts.

TRAINING

As the industry becomes increasingly automated, the number of unskilled jobs available decreases. Some form of training is therefore becoming more and more important for persons who intend to work in the pulp and paper industry. Such training is available.

This training ranges from courses in area technical schools to courses leading to majors in chemistry, business administration, forestry and pulp and paper manufacturing in universities. It also includes on-the-job training programs, apprenticeship programs and MDTA courses offered through the state employment service.

Committees should determine what courses are available and advise potential employees of them.

The MDTA--OJT. The MDTA on-the-job training programs are operated under contracts between the government and the company offering the training.

To get in such a program, a person must first be an employee of the company running the program. Since the government pays the training costs, these companies can lower their employment qualification requirements, hire more qualified Negroes and train them with government money. The company pays their salaries as employees, but the government pays the cost of training.

SUCCESSFUL PROJECTS SOME COMMUNITIES HAVE SPONSORED

Job-Applicant Workshop

1 The fear of new situations and lack of confidence prevent some Negroes from applying for nontraditional jobs. The strangeness of new jobs creates adjustment problems. So, Negroes leave or are fired before they have really had a chance. Negroes who have only worked on farms or in pri vate homes may find it hard to adjust to a job in an industry. This workshop deals with very practical, down-to-earth questions: How to apply for a job. How to fill out an application. How to prepare for and conduct yourself at a job interview. How to learn to adjust to new jobs. The purpose of the workshop is to build confidence and to develop know-how.

New Careers Clinic

2 Negro schools usually have little information about new careers which have opened up. Many Negro boys and girls are not motivated to stay in school; to get a good basic training; to get vocational information. Programs on new careers and on specific job opportunities can be organized by commuhity leaders. Good persons to have on the program: representatives of local businesses and industries; Negroes who are successful "pioneers" in jobs formerly held only by white persons.

Brush-Up Courses

3 Local groups are usually not able to sponsor full training courses but they can often do a good job with a brush-up course--for example, a course to help applicants prepare for civil service exams or a course to improve typing skills.

Project-"Welcome!"

4 New jobs bring strangers to the community. They have no friends. Some have never lived in towns before. They need help in finding housing, friends, churches, schools. Loneliness and adjustment problems may force people to give up jobs with a good future and return to old familiar places and to segregation. Project-"Welcome!" is just basic friendliness organized into practical help to newcomers during their adjustment period.

VISITATION DAY

Arrangements might be made for Negro students and potential students and trainees to visit local technical education centers, institutions providing MDTA training, plants providing on-the-job training and plants that have indicated that they have job openings and will hire Negroes for any jobs.

REGULAR PUBLICITY OF SUCCESSES

A local radio, TV or newspaper might be prepared to do a feature story every week on Negroes in non-traditional jobs or in training for those jobs. The county might be divided into geographic areas with publicity and awards each month to the area placing the most Negroes into non-traditional jobs or into training for those jobs.

COUNTY FORUM

Representatives of major employers in the county are invited to a one or two day public forum to make brief remarks and answer questions concerning equal employment in their companies. Others, such as private employment agencies' representatives, representatives of the local office of the State Employment Service and others are invited for the same purpose' so that the Negro public learns what equal employment resources and opportunities are available locally.

JOB FAIR

Some localities have held job fairs to seek out Negroes who want jobs or want better jobs. Often this can be done by the local Chamber of Commerce since it is made up largely of employers. It is important that job fairs be given a lot of publicity among Negroes, that the fairs be held in Negro communities at convenient hours, that the employer be willing to hire on the spot for all kinds of jobs. It is not enough just to pass out application forms.

CAREER DAY

This is something like the new career clinics described above. The two can be combined. It is geared toward careers and jobs which exist now. It can be directed toward high school seniors or it can include youngsters in lower grades who are planning their courses for specific jobs. In some cases they haven't decided. It could be geared toward people in, or who should be in, adult basic education courses. If held during a college holiday such as Christmas or Easter, it can be geared toward Negroes already in college, who might want to live and work in your community.

CONDUCT TEST TAKING WORKSHOPS.

Many job applicants have difficulty in passing tests which are required both for entry into jobs proferred by the pulp and paper industry and for transfer into better paying jobs because of their difficulty in passing personnel tests which companies use as a pre-requisite. Committees can conduct workshops to acquaint potential job applicants and transferees with the mechanics of taking timed tests. It is not always important that the exact test being taken in the workshop is the same as the real test, often times the mere exercise of taking a similiar test will assist interested persons in becoming test oriented. One such test in included in this workbook.

EMERGENCY MEETING OF NATIONAL LEADERS WILL SEEK ANSWERS TO URBAN CRISIS

A new national attack on the ghetto problems that have exploded in this summer's riots will be the aim of an emergency convocation of 1000 leaders of American life which is scheduled to be held in Washington in late August.

At a meeting called on July 31 by Mayor Joseph M. Barr of Pittsburgh, president of the U. S. Conference of Mayors, and Mayor John V. Lindsay of New York, a member of the Conference's executive committee, twenty-two leaders of national civic, business, labor, religious and civil rights organizations agreed to establish an Urban Coalition which will sponsor the convocation as a major step toward redefining the Nation's priorities and mustering greater resources against the troubles of the cities.

In the face of the evident tendency of Congress to cut back on urban and social programs rather than to expand them, the Coalition urged a "commitment of national resources equal to the dimensions of the problems we face" and said that "the country can wait no longer for model cities, anti-poverty, housing, education and job-training legislation and a host of other matters that have been too long denied the cities."

A basic statement approved by the Urban Coalition outlined in its preamble the participants' fear that the wide-spread riots may lead to disastrous racial division and conflict:

> "The tangible results of the urban riots in terms of death, injury and property damage are horrifying in themselves. The intangible damage in terms of the riots' effects on men's minds may yet be even greater.
> "At this moment, millions of Americans are forming attitudes that could mean disaster to our social structure: the homeowner who vows to shoot the next suspicious character he sees in his neighborhood; the businessman who decides to get out of the slums, the labor leader who determines to keep minorities out; the insurance man who refuses to cover slum properties; the Negro or white who goes out to take whatever he can get his hands on; the legislator who fails to meet his public responsibilities.

"These people and others are reversing a trend that, however slowly, was working to the benefit of our cities' disadvantaged minorities.

"Let them realize that it is the citizen, in the end, who will keep our country united or will divide it. It is government's duty to maintain law and order. But all must understand that law and order is not an excuse for oppression. If law and order is to be accepted by the minorities, the majority must clearly and positively demonstrate its belief that justice, social progress, and equality are rights of every citizen."

"Dramatic and Immediate" Correction Called For

"Lawlessness and all its engredients cannot be tolerated," the statement continued. "Looting, burning and bottle-throwing are criminal acts and must be dealt with as such. But let not a reaction to acts, committed by a small fraction of the population of the country's ghettos, blind us to the absolute necessity of moving dramatically and immediately to correct the desperate condition of our urban centers."

Urging a "full new dimension in both the public and private sectors, working together for jobs, housing, education" and the many other needs of the cities, the Urban Coalition called for:

* Development by the Federal Government of an Emergency Work and Reconstruction Program to provide new training programs and jobs for the unemployed.

* Vigorous involvement of the private sector of America in a commitment to investments, job training and hiring, and everything else "necessary to the full enjoyment of the free enterprise system, and also to its survival."

* Establishment of "Earn and Learn" centers in the cities as a joint venture of business, labor and local government.

* National recognition that the "sickness of the cities, including the civic disorder within them" makes it the responsibility of every American to join in the creation of a "new political, social, economic and moral climate which will make possible the breaking up of the vicious cycle of the ghetto."

Among those who attended the meeting which set up the Urban Coalition were I. W. Abel, president of the United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO; Andrew J. Biemiller for the AFL-CIO; Arthur S. Flemming, president of the National Council of Churches; John J. Gunther, executive director of the U. S. Conference of Mayors; Andrew Heiskell, chairman of the board of Time, Inc., and chairman of Urban America; Mayor Arthur Naftalin of Minneapolis, chairman of the Conference of Mayors' Community Relations Committee; Gerald Phillipe, chairman of the board, General Electric; Walter P. Reuther, president, United Automobile Workers of America, AFL-CIO; David Rockefeller, president, Chase Manhattan Bank; Rabbi Jacob P. Rudin, president, Synagogue Council of America; William L. Slayton, executive vice president of Urban America; the Most Rev. Paul Tanner for the National Conference of Catholic Bishops; John Wheeler, president of the Southern Regional Council; and Whitney M. Young, Jr., executive director of the National Urban League.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION
-- A MID-YEAR REVIEW

Although the first session of the 90th Congress is now well past the half-way mark, civil rights legislation is only just beginning to move off dead center. Last year the House passed the civil rights bill after 12 days of highly emotional debate, much of it centered on the open housing provision, only to see the bill later killed by a Senate filibuster. Because of that frustrating experience, the House decided to let the Senate act first this year. It was a position with which civil rights spokesmen could not disagree.

The decision to let the Senate act first led to a new strategy designed to get a bill to the Senate floor by by-passing Senator Eastland's Judiciary Committee, the graveyard of civil rights legislation. It was devised by Senator Hart (D-Mich.), the principal sponsor of the Administration's six-point bill (S. 1026). With the backing of civil rights groups he split up the package into six separate bills so that the housing title (Title IV) and the provision to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (Title III) would go to committees other than the Judiciary Committee. In this way these sections of the bill would be brought to the Senate floor, and one could then be made the vehicle for a major civil rights effort.

Progress So Far "Slow and Halting"

To date, progress in the Senate has been slow and halting. Only the bill (S. 1308) to give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which can now only try to conciliate complaints of discrimination, authority to issue judicially enforceable cease and desist orders to end discriminatory employment practices, has moved forward. It is before the full Labor Committee, to which it was reported by a subcommittee on July 25.

The federal jury reform provision (S. 1319), Title I of the omnibus bill, has been the subject of extensive hearings before the Judiciary Committee Subcommittee on Improvements in Judicial Machinery. Senator Tydings, the Subcommittee chairman, is expected to support a bill which will be patterned on the bill (S. 989) recommended by the chief judges of the federal courts who compose the U. S. Judicial Conference, and essentially like the Administration's proposal. By ending the so-called "key man" system and eliminating the use of subjective tests in the selection of federal jurors and providing instead for their random selection from voters' lists, the bill would eliminate opportunities for racial discrimination in the selection of federal juries and make them more representative of the general community. But, even if the bill should clear the Subcommittee -- Senator Ervin, a key member, has reservations about it -- it would still face the hurdle of Senator Eastland, who has never let a civil rights bill out of his committee without being instructed to do so by a vote of the Senate.

Hearings on the open housing bill (S. 1358) are scheduled to begin on August 21 before the Banking and Currency Subcommittee on Housing, and to run for three days. Hearings on the omnibus bill (S. 1026) first scheduled for May 23 were postponed and rescheduled five times before finally getting under way August 1 with the Attorney General as the lead-off witness. The last time they fell victim to the Detroit rioting -- the Attorney General was tied up and compelled to call off his appearance.

Action in the House

The House, notwithstanding its decision to let the Senate act first, has not been entirely idle. It has taken action on two of the bill's less controversial provisions. On July 10 it voted 282-89 to extend the life of the Civil Rights Commission -- due to expire in January of 1968 -- for an additional five years. The important contributions made by the Commission are so widely acknowledged that House leaders confident of overwhelming support for the extension brought up the bill (H.R. 10805) under the rules suspension procedure requiring a two-thirds vote for passage.

During the debate on the 1966 civil rights bill, an anti-riot bill was tied in on the House floor to Title V, whose aim is to give more effective federal protection to Negroes and civil rights workers exercising their federal rights. This year it was the reverse -- it was the anti-riot bill which provided the momentum for Title V. Under growing demands of House members to report out an anti-riot bill, a House Judiciary Subcommittee headed by Chairman Celler voted out a bill coupling Title V with the anti-riot bill. But, under pressure of Chairman Colmer (D-Miss.) of the House Rules Committee, who objected to linking the two proposals in the same package and threatened to take the bill away from the Judiciary Committee and report an anti-riot bill direct to the floor, Celler yielded. He agreed to have the full Committee report out separate measures, but only after he first received assurances that the Rules Committee would clear Title V (H.R. 2516) for floor action after the anti-riot bill passed, a step which the Committee took on August 2.

Atom-Smasher Goes To Weston, Ill.

In other civil rights developments, the Senate voiced strong opposition to the selection of Weston, Illinois as a proposed site for a multi-million dollar atom smasher in the absence of adequate assurances that Negroes who would be employed on the project would have equal housing opportunities. A group of liberal Senators led by Pastore (D-R.I.) sought to delay the project to give Illinois and the communities surrounding Weston time to enact open housing legislation. Their move to strike the 7.3 million dollar fund from the Atomic Energy Commission authorization bill failed, by a vote of 47-27, a considerably narrower margin, however, than the lop-sided 104-7 vote by which the House had earlier approved the site.

Senator Brooke (R-Mass.) best summed up the attitude of civil rights groups who had criticized the site selection when he declared: "The Federal government should not condone racial discrimination by rewarding it with Federal grants." The same view was expressed in 1958 by the then Attorney General William P.

Rogers when he told an Anti-Defamation League audience: "...the Government, in determining the location of new or expanded federal facilities will have to give consideration to the availability of public schools and other public conveniences as a matter of fairness and justice to its personnel who will be on duty there."

Assault on Office of Education Guidelines

A renewed assault was launched in the House on the Office of Education school desegregation guidelines and Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act which prohibits discrimination in all federally-assisted programs. The vehicle for the attack was the bill, H.R. 7819, to extend the life of the exising school aid legislation. After three days of often bitter and confused debate, three amendments were adopted, one of which, the so-called Fountain amendment, if not modified by the Senate, will have a damaging effect on the Title VI enforcement program.

The amendment adopted by a vote of 116-62 would forbid HEW from withholding or deferring funds for new education programs from a school district which was practicing discrimination until after there had first been a hearing finding the school district to be in non-compliance. The same amendment was adopted by the House last year, but House-Senate conferees worked out a compromise to permit HEW to defer funds for a period of up to 90 days while a hearing is being held to determine whether a school district is in compliance. Secretary Gardner has urged the Senate Labor Committee to delete the amendment, saying that it would "seriously weaken" HEW's compliance efforts.

The second amendment, which was adopted by voice vote, would require the school desegregation guidelines to be applied uniformly in all 50 states. Both HEW and House liberals first opposed the amendment when offered by Mrs. Green (D-Ore.). They viewed it as an effort to "invite evasion and delay" in the enforcement of the '64 Act. But after three hours of debate in which there was disagreement as to the meaning of the amendment and its effect on HEW's enforcement program, liberals reversed their stand and supported the amendment when Mrs. Green explained that its sole purpose was to make sure that the Office of Education would move to end discrimination in the North as well as in the 17 Southern and border states which operated dual school systems before they were outlawed by the 1964 Supreme Court school desegregation decision.

The third amendment, also adopted by voice vote, does no more than to enact into law what HEW's regulations now provide -- that a school district which is in compliance with a court order will be deemed to be in compliance with Title VI.

Proposals Offer an Opportunity for Reaffirmation

The negative mood of the Congress, particularly that of the House, and the failure of the Senate at the beginning of the session to adopt a new cloture rule to make it easier to curb the filibuster, continue to be the major obstacles in the path of the civil rights bill. The rioting in Detroit and elsewhere has raised a new question mark. While it may still be too early to assess its impact -- some backlash and resistance to new civil rights legislation may be anticipated -- the riots will undoubtedly be used by some as an excuse to turn their backs on such legislation.

It is hoped, however, that Congress will see in these proposals an opportunity to reaffirm its own as well as the nation's commitment to outlaw discrimination and assure equal justice for all Americans regardless of race and to help create a climate not conducive to the outbreak of violence -- a climate in which those who would provoke violence would have no one to respond to their call. As Attorney General Clark told the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, "For a decade Congress has led the nation toward equal justice. The need for progress was never greater. We cannot falter now." The fact that the Rules Committee voted to send Title V to the floor may be a sign that Congress will continue to make progress in civil rights. A better barometer will be available after the bill reaches the House floor.

NEGRO LEADERS APPEAL FOR END TO VIOLENCE

Four of the Nation's major civil rights leaders in late July joined in an appeal to the Negroes of the cities for an end to rioting and for the maintenance of law and order, calling violence self-destructive and the Negroes themselves the "primary victims" of the riots. They also urged redoubled efforts by both Negro and white Americans to eliminate the ghettos' "disabilities" of "joblessness, inadequate housing, poor schooling, insult, humiliation and attack."

The joint statement was signed by Martin Luther King, Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference; A. Philip Randolph, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute; Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; and Whitney M. Young, Jr., executive director of the National Urban League. Its full text follows:

"Developments in Newark, Detroit and other strife-torn cities make it crystal clear that the primary victims of the riots are the Negro citizens. That they have grave grievances of long standing cannot be denied or minimized. That the riots have not contributed in any substantial measure to the eradication of these just complaints is by now obvious to all.

"We are confident that the overwhelming majority of the Negro community joins us in opposition to violence in the streets. Who is without the necessities of life when the neighborhood stores are destroyed and looted? Whose children are without milk because deliveries cannot be made? Who loses wages because of a breakdown in transportation or destruction of the place of employment? Who are the dead, the injured and the imprisoned? It is the Negroes who pay and pay and pay, whether or not they are individually involved in the rioting. And for what?

"Killing, arson, looting are criminal acts and should be dealt with as such. Equally guilty are those who incite, provoke and call specifically for such action. There is no injustice which justifies the present destruction of the Negro community and its people.

"We who have fought so long and so hard to achieve justice for all Americans have consistently opposed violence as a means of redress.

Riots have proved ineffective, disruptive and highly damaging to the Negro population, to the civil rights cause, and to the entire nation.

"We call upon Negro citizens throughout the nation to forego the temptation to disregard the law. This does not mean that we should submit tamely to joblessness, inadequate housing, poor schooling, insult, humiliation and attack. It does require a redoubling of efforts through legitimate means to end these wrongs and disabilities.

"We appeal not only to black Americans, but also to our fellow white citizens who are not blameless. The disabilities imposed upon Negro citizens are a century old. They remain because the white citizenry in general supports these restrictions.

"The 90th Congress has exhibited an incredible indifference to hardships of the ghetto dwellers. Only last week the House defeated a rat-control bill which would have enabled the cities to get rid of the rats which infest the slums.

"And finally, we support President Johnson's call upon all our people black and white alike in all our cities to join in a determined program to maintain law and order, to condemn and to combat lawlessness in all its forms, and firmly to show by word and by word and deed that riot, looting and public disorder will just not be tolerated.

"No one benefits under mob law. Let's end it now!"

IN "QUIET" SUPREME COURT TERM, PRECEDENTS WERE SHATTERED

Historically, two or three major decisions in a term of the Supreme Court would suffice to justify calling that term great or important. These days of judicial activism have heightened the public's expectations about the Court, however, so that every time the Justices pass up a chance to breach a constitutional barrier, there are reams of commentary about judicial "retreat."

This helps to explain how the term recently ended could be described, superficially, as dull, or a year in which nothing happened. But to call the term dull or quiet is to have missed the action.

The Court was quarrelsome about crime, impatient over civil rights, fragmented over issues and dissatisfied with past ways of doing things; it was never dull. Nine strong-minded lifetime judges exercised their prerogatives, sometimes sending the Court in several directions at once.

What the Court Did --

No catalogue of things the Court didn't do, and no tally of rulings classified as "liberal" or "conservative", can make the term any less action-packed than it was. These, then, are some of the things the Court did do:

* It shattered eight major legal precedents. The decisions put American citizenship beyond the reach of Congress to revoke against a citizen's will; wiped out state miscegenation laws; struck down New York's loyalty laws for public employes; held that a prying microphone conducts a "search" subject to constitutional restrictions; expanded both the police power to search and the citizen's right to privacy, and said that a lawyer needn't choose between self-incrimination and disbarment.

* The Court extended two more Bill of Rights guarantees to the states: the right to a speedy trial and the right of a defendant to obtain witnesses through court order.

* The Court extended to juvenile courts the major safeguards provided for adults at criminal trials, at the same time offering a generous interpretation of the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination.

* The Court exposed public figures and newsworthy people to the burden of proving -- if they want legal redress for defamation or nondefamatory falsehoods -- that statements about them were published as known falsehoods or with reckless disregard for the truth.

* The Court announced that a legislator has a constitutional duty to speak his mind on such matters as opposition to war, and that a state legislature can't punish him for it.

* The Court reversed its field, at least temporarily, on the most visible part of the civil rights movement, ruling for the first time in this decade against demonstrators whose actions are accompanied by public disturbance.

* The Court added a new constitutional rule to the criminal law -- a suspect is entitled to counsel during police identification procedures -- and limited the rule to future "lineups," declaring broader powers than ever to make its constitutional decisions operate only for the future.

-- And Didn't

Conspicuous among the things the Court did not tackle were local reapportionment, state aid to religion, obscenity, and the rights of public housing tenants. But there is little evidence that mere timidity moved the Court to postpone or avoid dealing with such issues.

Even the local reapportionment issue, which the Justices were weighing while Senate Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen was mounting his campaign against the "one man, one vote" decision, seems to have been handled on its merits.

No "Plain Vanilla" Cases

The makeup of local governing boards proved to be far more complex than the makeup of state legislatures. Indications were that the Court put off deciding whether the "one vote" rule applied because none of the four cases squarely concerned a local governing body with full legislative powers -- or, in a phrase attributed to one Justice, none was a "plain vanilla case."

As for religion and the schools, the Court refused to disturb a Maryland court decision denying state aid to some religion-connected colleges -- those with a more religious "image" -- and allowing it to others.

While the Court does not give reasons for such action, or lack of action, there are plenty of reasons available other than timidity. One might be that the Maryland case, involving one state and a few million dollars but not involving the Federal Government, was an inappropriate vehicle for determining the fate of the multibillion-dollar Federal aid to education program.

Obscenity was simply a Donnybrook of disagreement. The best the Court could muster was a message to states and localities to trim their laws to protect juveniles and inhibit the most offensive privacy-invading and "pandering" promotion of salacious matter.

Portent on Housing

The Court did find a way to avoid deciding the merits of a public housing tenant's argument that when the government is landlord, it must not evict without an explanation. Yet the writing on the wall seemed plain enough: government should think twice before it tries to skirt due process demands just because it is a landlord.

Such a warning message was flashed a few years ago when the Court declined temporarily to strike down all state laws against marriage between races. From the way the majority handled the 1964 case of McLaughlin vs Florida, and with a few Justices signaling their all-out opposition to miscegenation laws, it was clear that one more push would probably finish the job.

When the push came and the case of Loving vs Virginia was decided on the last day of this term, there was no surprise and hardly a ripple of old-fashioned court-baiting outcry. Like the timing of the nomination of Thurgood Marshall to the Court, the miscegenation decision was made in "the right time and the right place." Perhaps timing is the key to the many things the Court did do and the few things it didn't.

JUDICIAL REVIEW OF ACTS OF CONGRESS ON FIRST AMENDMENT GROUNDS

Senator Sam J. Ervin's judicial review bill (S. 3) continues to be stalled in the House Judiciary Committee, of which Rep. Emanuel Celler is chairman. Passed twice by the Senate (89th and 90th Congresses) the bill never has been scheduled for hearings on the House side. An identical bill (H.R. 1198) has been introduced in the House by Rep. Benjamin Rosenthal (D., N.Y.).

Although known to be highly skeptical of the bill, Celler has promised that hearings will be held. There is a possibility, but no assurance, that the hearings will be held before the end of this year.

The bill proposes "to provide effective procedures for the enforcement of the establishment and free exercise clauses of the first amendment to the Constitution.

The Problem of "Standing to Sue"

A bottleneck in such "enforcement" is the problem of "standing to sue." Until now it has been very difficult, if not impossible, to challenge an allegedly improper federal aid to religious agencies in the courts, because of long-standing limitations on the scope of standing to use.

The Supreme Court held in 1923 in Frothingham v. Mellon that a person who tries to stop a government program must show some real damage to himself. The damage must be beyond that caused by the fact that as a taxpayer a fraction of his tax goes to the supposedly improper program's budget. Short of a showing of tangible damage, the person has no standing to sue, and his case is dismissed.

In an effort to break this bottleneck to a challenge of the constitutionality of certain Acts of Congress, Senator Ervin has pushed hard in both the 89th and 90th Congresses for his judicial review bill. The proposal would give three classes the right to court tests on the basis of First Amendment provisions. They are:

1) Any public or other nonprofit agency or institution whose accessibility to loans or grants is reduced because of aids to church-related agencies;

2) Any citizen or group of citizens who have paid income taxes the previous year who feel that such loans or grants violate the First Amendment; and

3) Any public or nonprofit institution or agency whose application for federal aids has been rejected on First Amendment grounds.

Nine Acts Specified

The judicial review bill specifies nine Acts of Congress concerning which standing to sue would be granted. They are: (1) the Higher Education Facilities Act of 1963, (2) title VII of the Public Health Service Act, (3) the National Defense Education Act of 1958, (4) the Mental Retardation Facilities and Community Mental Health Centers Construction Act of 1963, (5) title II of the Act of September 30, 1950 (Public Law 874, Eighty-first Congress), (6) the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, (7) the Cooperative Research Act, (8) the Higher Education Act of 1965, or (9) the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964.

Demands for judicial review of Acts of Congress on First Amendment grounds have been rising during the past half-dozen years. As far back as 1961 there was a draft of such a bill by Senator Wayne Morse. It was reworked in 1963. In 1963 a judicial review amendment by Senators Ervin and Cooper was proposed to the Higher Education Facilities Act. It was passed by the Senate but rejected in conference with the House.

During the 88th Congress the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights received numerous requests for an investigation of the expenditure of Federal funds to aid sectarian institutions. Chairman Ervin began preliminary research in this area of constitutional law at that time. The pressure increased with the passage of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 and the Higher Education Act of 1965.

During the debate on the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, Senator Morse pleaded with those pushing for a judicial review amendment not to do it. He said it would only serve to defeat the education bill. His position was that judicial review should be handled as a separate matter. He later sponsored such a bill.

On July 29, 1966 the Senate approved S. 2097 and referred it to the House Judiciary Committee on August 1 but no action was taken on the bill before Congress adjourned. S. 3 was introduced in the 90th Congress on January 11, 1967 and passed by unanimous consent on April 11.

Opposing Reasons for Support

It is interesting to observe that Sen. Morse and Sen. Ervin support the same judicial review bill but for exactly opposite reasons. Morse expects that the courts, if they get cases properly before them, will uphold the constitutionality of the Acts of Congress under question. He is anxious to get the matter cleared up in the courts so the legislative bottleneck will be broken and the Congress can get on with their programs of education.

On the other hand, Ervin has let it be known that he believes that at least some of the federal grants and loans possible under the listed Acts may very well be unconstitutional. Thus, if his view prevails, many federal programs will be curtailed.

The optimists say that the judicial review bill has a 50-50 chance for passage in the House. Others, however, note that rising opposition from various groups is being made known to the House Judiciary Committee. Add to that the fact that Chairman Celler, Speaker John McCormack, and Rep. Hale Boggs, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, are opposed to the bill and one comes up with considerable pessimism about the passage of a judicial review bill by the House of Representatives in the 90th Congress.

NEW DRAFT LAW MAKES CHANGES IN CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION PROVISIONS

The "Military Selective Service Act of 1967" amending the former "Universal Military Training and Service Act", which was signed by the President on June 30 and is now in effect, makes two basic changes in the provisions for conscientious objectors.

First, the clause defining "Religious training and belief" as meaning "an individual's belief in a relationship to a Supreme Being involving duties superior to those arising from any human relationship" has been deleted. The Congress felt that this clause as interpreted in the Seeger case was too broad, in that it allowed those who were not religious in the traditional sense to be conscientious objectors. This change, it is believed, will make no difference to the vast majority of COs who base their objection on traditional religious grounds. Whether, in fact, the change will make it more or less difficult for the unorthodox to receive the CO classification will probably be demonstrated through experience in the classification process and through test cases in the courts.

Second, the provision which involved the Department of Justice in the appeal process has been deleted. No new cases will be referred to the Justice Department after July 1, 1967. The approximately 2,700 cases presently before the Department will be continued, but processing must be completed by July 1, 1968.

New Wording

The new wording of the law concerning conscientious objectors is as follows:

"(j) Nothing contained in this title shall be construed to require any person to be subject to combatant training and service in the armed forces of the United States who, by reason of religious training and belief, is conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form. As used in this subsection, the term 'religious training and belief' does not include essentially political, sociological, or philosophical views, or a merely personal moral code. Any person claiming exemption from combatant training and service because of such conscientious objections whose claim is sustained by the local board shall, if he is inducted into the armed forces under this title, be assigned to noncombatant service as defined by the President, or shall, if he is found to be conscientiously opposed to participation in such noncombatant service, in lieu of such induction, be ordered by his local board, subject to such regulations as the President may prescribe, to perform for a period equal to the period prescribed in section 4(b) such civilian work contributing to the maintenance of the national health, safety, or interest as the local board pursuant to Presidential regulations may deem appropriate and any such person who knowingly fails or neglects to obey any such order from his local board shall be deemed, for the purposes of Section 12 of this title, to have knowingly failed or neglected to perform a duty required of him under this title."

There is no change in the alternative service program. Although the words "pursuant to Presidential regulations" were inserted in section 6(j) as quoted above, it is understood that this makes no difference in the meaning of the law.

The intent of the law is to speed up the judicial process concerning Selective Service cases. It gives these cases precedence on the dockets of the Federal courts. It puts pressure on the Department of Justice to prosecute such cases as quickly as possible. It strengthens the former provision that the courts may not review the action of the Selective Service System until or unless a registrant has refused induction into the military service or has been wrongfully inducted.

"CONCENTRATION CAMP" RUMORS
SPRING FROM QUESTIONABLE PAMPHLET

Through the late Spring and Summer, college students from many areas alarmed their parents with letters quoting nebulous rumors that the United States has established "five concentration camps" allegedly for persons who engaged in civil rights and peace demonstrations or who were accused of conspiring to bring about acts of espionage or sabotage. With practically nothing to go on except this rumor, we were able to track down its source and obtain a refutation, thanks to the aid of Larry Speiser of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington office, Congressman Don Edwards of California, and J. Walter Yeagley, U. S. Assistant Attorney General.

The basis for this falsehood is found in a pamphlet by Charles R. Allen, Jr., Concentration Camps, U.S.A., published in 1966 by the Citizens Committee for Constitutional Liberties.

A number of organizations have inquired about the rumor, and the question was also raised at a recent meeting of the National Civil Liberties Clearing House. Publication of the following letter from Mr. Yeagley to Congressman Don Edwards (D., Calif.) may help to spike it:

"May 11, 1967

"The Hon. Don Edwards
House of Representatives
Washington, D.C. 20515

"Dear Mr. Edwards:

"This is in reply to your letter of May 9, 1967, with regard to inquiries from two of your constituents who have read and are deeply concerned about the information contained in the pamphlet Concentration Camps, U.S.A., written by Charles R. Allen, Jr.

"The article by Mr. Allen has been reviewed by representatives of this Division and found to be replete with inaccuracies. It can be stated without equivocation that there are no 'concentration camps' in existence in the United States and that the allegations that a master pick-up list of 500,000 Americans was held by the FBI in 1952, and that one million 'detention warrants' have been printed by the Internal Security Division of the Department of Justice and are on hand for immediate issuance to and use by the FBI, Federal, State and local police agencies once 'operation dragnet' is set in motion, are complete fabrications.

"The Internal Security Act of 1950 authorizes the President to proclaim the existence of an internal security measure under specified conditions and also authorizes the President during such emergency, acting through the Attorney General, to apprehend and by order detain persons as to whom there is reasonable grounds to believe that such person will engage in or will conspire with others to engage in, acts of espionage or sabotage.

"In keeping with these provisions facilities were maintained for a few years with funds appropriately authorized by the Congress for this purpose. Such facilities were never used for the foregoing purposes. About 1957 the project was discontinued, the camps abandoned, and since that time no funds have been appropriated for this purpose.

"You may wish to refer to reports of hearings before the House Committee on Un-American Activities for background information on the Citizens Committee for Constitutional Liberties which commissioned Mr. Allen to write his article.

I trust that the foregoing will be of some assistance to you in your reply to constituents.

Sincerely,

(Signed) J. Walter Yeagley,
Assistant Attorney General"

NEW PROPOSALS FOR ABOLITION OF THE FEDERAL DEATH PENALTY

A bill to abolish the Federal death penalty (S. 1760) was introduced in May by Senator Philip Hart (D., Mich). Among the co-sponsors are Democratic Senators Quentin Burdick of North Dakota, Daniel Inouye of Hawaii, Edward Long of Missouri, Eugene McCarthy and Walter Mondale of Minnesota, Wayne Morse of Oregon, Gaylord Nelson and William Proxmire of Wisconsin, Harrison Williams of New Jersey, and Stephen Young of Ohio, and Republicans Mark Hatfield of Oregon and Jacob Javits of New York.

The bill provides that no sentence of death shall be imposed on anyone convicted of any Federal offense. Whatever conviction presently authorizes or requires the death penalty would authorize or require a sentence of life imprisonment. The measure is before the Senate Judiciary Committee, which as yet has not scheduled hearings.

In the House, eight Congressmen have written all Members inviting their co-sponsorship of legislation for the same purpose, emphasizing that the President's Crime Commission has pointed out the discriminatory pattern of the death sentence as it is disproportionately imposed and carried out on the ignorant, the powerless, the Negro and the poor, and the statement of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice that the death penalty has a clearly undesirable effect "both because of the inherent sensationalism of a trial for life which may strongly influence all involved in the adjudication", as well as the possibility that the innocent may be executed. A bill is expected to be introduced by Rep. Don Edwards (D., Calif.) and others in the near future.

Although prospects for passage -- or even hearings -- do not seem good this session, it is the sponsors' hope that their action may stimulate concern with the question, on both the national and the state levels.

PEOPLE AND PROJECTS

THE REV. JOHN P. ADAMS has come from Hammond, Ind., to become the director of public affairs with the Methodist Board of Christian Social Concerns. He will work with the board's Division of Human Relations and Economic Affairs, with primary responsibility in the issues of church-government relations, Christian citizenship and civil liberties. Mr. Adams, a member of Phi Beta Kappa and of Sigma Chi, has served in pastorates in Connecticut and Ohio as well as in Indiana. In community activities he has been president of the Lake County Migrant Council, chairman of the Indiana Council of Churches' migrant ministry, president of the Northwest Indiana Council of Churches, and a member of the Hammond mayor's subcommittee on minority group problems. He and Mrs. Adams have six children.

Americans for Democratic Action's new legislative representative is VERLIN NELSON, a native of Des Moines, Ia., whose background includes work as executive secretary of Iowa's Democratic Central Committee, assistant state personnel director, and a stint with the state legislature's legislative research bureau. He is a graduate of the State University of Iowa, where he also attended the School of Law.

DR. LEWIS I. MADDOCKS, director of the Washington Office of the Council for Christian Social Action of the United Church of Christ, will be on sabbatical leave during September, October and November, and will be working on a report on the legal and civil liberties problems facing the homosexual in America, and what position the Church should take concerning public opinion and public policy on these questions. Lew would be interested in receiving information on these issues from any organizations which have been studying them. Though he will be in and out of Washington, he can be reached through his office at 110 Maryland Ave., N.E., which will be in continuing touch with him.

New associate director of the Washington office of the National Council of Churches and editor of its fortnightly publication, Memo, is the REV. DR. JOHN W. TURNBULL. Dr. Turnbull, who is a clergyman of the Episcopal Church and received his Ph.D. in Religion from Yale, had been since 1958 Professor of Christian Ethics at the Episcopal Theological Seminary of the Southwest at Austin, Tex.

ACADEMIC FREEDOM is redefined to include the rights of students as well as of teachers in a Statement on Rights and Freedoms of Students which has been drafted by a committee of representatives of the American Association of University Professors, National Student Association, Association of American Colleges, National Association of Student Personnel Administrators and National Association of Women Deans and Counselors. The committee, which hopes that the "student bill of rights" will have the same impact on the academic world as did the AAUP's 1940 statement on faculty freedoms, holds that students should be free to extend invitations to controversial speakers and to engage in off-campus activities without college interference; should be protected against improper disclosure of their records, and should be free to publish their opinion with minimum restraint.

Recently named Community Affairs Program Director for the National Council of Catholic Women is MISS RUTH D. WEHLE, whose prior work has included United States government service in the fields of public relations, information and community organization, both at home and in England and South Africa. Among her assignments have been the posts of liaison officer with the Central Intelligence Agency, and second secretary and special assistant to the American Ambassador at Pretoria. Miss Wehle is listed in Who's Who of American Women and the International Who's Who of American Women. The University of Kentucky designated her a Distinguished Alumna, 1966, and she is a recipient of the Alpha Gamma Delta Alumna Award for 1967.

THE REV. EVERETT W. FRANCIS, who has been appointed public affairs officer of the Department of Christian Social Relations of the Executive Council of the Episcopal Church, will be spending several days of each week in Washington, with an office at 110 Maryland Ave., N. E. His new work will include responsibility for co-ordinating the efforts of the divisions of the Executive Council which are concerned with public issues, among them public welfare, civil rights and foreign aid. From 1964 until his present appointment, Mr. Francis had been associate director of program for the Diocese of Michigan, where his community activities included service on the Board of Directors of the Michigan Council of Churches as chairman of their Division of Christian Education.

Equal Education For All Children

by James M. Eagan

EQUAL education for all children has always been the goal of the National Congress of Parents and Teachers. This has been achieved very largely in areas where parents would organize and where their voice could be heard. For the most part these were parents of majority status, largely white and middle class. As internal pressures grew in urban centers, many of these parents moved to the suburbs where new schools, better paid teachers and a forward looking curriculum provided educational opportunity unsurpassed in the world.

Those left in urban centers and those in poverty pockets of rural America did not fare so well. The educational plant deteriorated. Teachers became discouraged and moved to the fringes of the city or to the suburbs. Two kinds of public schools developed, often within the same system, where children of the poor who needed better teaching, a curriculum adapted to their needs, often dropped out of school or rather school dropped out of them.

James M. Eagan,
Vice President
National Conference of Christians and Jews

This posed a major problem in rearing children of good will. Parents and children of the white middle class lived in a world completely separated from the parents and children of the poor in the inner city. There could be little understanding, little empathy, where there was so little personal contact. This presents a major problem to the PTA. More and more its strength has grown in the suburbs and the fringes of the city. The result has been that parents in the ghettoes have had little organization, little help from great national organizations such as the PTA. Fortunately, this situation is now being remedied as the PTA turns its attention to the problems of the inner city. This comes at a time too when parents of the poor are becoming alive to their rights and responsibilities and are beginning to ask for their children the same educational opportunities being offered to those more fortunate children of the suburbs.

What should be the present role of the PTA? First, a frank recognition that there is a problem of equal education. Coupled with this is the recognition that this is a moral and spiritual problem as well. There is a moral imperative to do something about the problem. Some PTA's have been willing to change their kind of meeting, to meet in homes, often on a Saturday or Sunday to involve working parents. Sometime PTA leaders go to the natural congregating places of the poor — to laundromats, to community rooms of settlement houses in order that they may acquaint young parents with the advantages of programs such as Operation Headstart. Other parents have formed tutorial committees to work with children who so desperately need the extra help that they may give. Parents in need are often supplied with books, magazines, records, so that this cultural background will be enhanced. This has had a remarkable effect upon the so-called "IQ's" of their children. Parents and school systems cooperate to conduct visits to concerts, to museums, to study local history. These activities require time, effort, persistence, and dedication to the idea of working with people, not for them.

This approach puts the PTA in the position of a community service organization. Personal contact must not only be followed with action, it must be action directed towards better housing, equal employment opportunity. It involves a willingness to take a sharp look at the entire educational structure of our cities. The neighborhood school, for example, may not be the contemporary answer to the problem of equal educational opportunity. It is far too easy to provide fewer facilities to a neighborhood school in a poverty-ridden district. Perhaps the educational park concept has much to recommend it in terms of being better able to provide team teaching, involvement of parents, highly trained specialists and guidance personnel. In addition, it will certainly provide better integration of school children. If we really "learn by doing" the best way to teach human relations is to provide day-by-day personal contact and experiences. Many of the problems of prejudiced children and parents arise from the fact that there is so little contact with children of differing socio-economic, religious, and racial backgrounds. The educational park idea may provide that necessary contact. Above all, it may set up standards of excellence in education which are not now attainable in our present system.

Such an approach to education involves a continued interest on the part of parents in the kind of training that teachers of their children receive. There is no doubt but that present teacher training is well suited to the present suburban school. But a large number of our children attend city schools where this kind of training is inadequate. Traditionally, teachers in most states have been trained in colleges and universities set in rural parts of the state. Usually practice teaching was done in small schools with largely homogeneous school populations. Increasingly, teachers so trained have sought jobs in the cities. The result is a teacher in a state of trauma school when she discovers that the conditions which prevailed during the training period do not prevail at all in the slum.

There are some signs of change. Some city universities will train teachers through a much longer period of teacher training under slum conditions. A few may even be encouraged to live in the slums while undergoing such training. Future teachers should not be averse to training similar to that given Vista and Peace Corps workers. It is somewhat strange that we train young teachers to work in the slums of Rio de Janeiro but do not train teachers for the Hough area of Cleveland.

Only through this kind of training will teachers develop a concept of what the total life situation of the child will be. Only then will teachers realize that it is more important to teach children and not solely subjects. Since the Russians sent up sputnik, a great deal of emphasis has been placed on teaching subject material. Somewhere the fact has been forgotten that it is children who have to be taught, not just subject matter. Unless the subject matter has some relevance to the child, the teacher's efforts are for naught. One school system which discovered this was Wilmington, Delaware. In An Adventure in Human Relations, Dr. Muriel Crosby, Associate Superintendent of Schools, describes how parents, teachers, and children brought educational emphasis back to the child without sacrificing educational quality. Dr. Crosby has served as educational consultant to Akron, Ohio schools. Her work is published by Follett Publishing Company of Chicago, 1965. It is well worth reading in conjunction with the Action Program of the PTA. The two provide a guideline and a means of implementation if we really desire educational excellence for all children. The PTA publication In All Good Faiths, can be of help in developing concepts of pluralism. The booklet, Rearing Children of Good Will may provide some suggestions for practical implementation.

Above all, we must realize we live in a pluralistic society which enriches our culture. The PTA must be pluralistic. If it represents only one segment of parents, teachers, and children, it does not truly represent America. There are many signs, however, which indicate that the PTA increasingly represents American pluralism. As it grows in this aspect, it will strive to eliminate those flaws in our educational structure and to perfect its aim of the equal (and better) education for all children. □

WHAT IS THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS?

NCCJ is a civic organization engaged in a nationwide program of intergroup education. It enlists Protestants, Catholics and Jews who without compromise of conscience or of their distinctive and important religious differences work together to build better relationships among men of all religions, races and nationalities. Its operation is civic and social although, obviously, the roots of the brotherhood which it seeks to build are in the moral law and in religious faith.

CATHOLIC GUIDELINES ON RELATIONS TO JEWS

THE DIALOGUE

A JOURNAL OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS & JEWS

NCCJ

EDITORIAL

The end of anti-Semitism, political or religious, is not yet in sight. Basic first steps were taken by the World Council of Churches (Amsterdam, 1948; Evanston, 1954; New Delhi, 1961) and the Vatican Council (Rome, 1965). The preceding issue of Dialogue was an interpretation of the Vatican Declaration.

This number is devoted to the interpretation of a necessary second step in de-mythologizing the anti-Semitic Christian tradition, as far as Jews and Catholics in the United States are concerned. That Protestants, and eventually the Eastern Orthodox, will also need to join with Jewish leaders and organizations in adopting or adapting guidelines for Christian-Jewish dialogue and the actions that dialogue must generate, seems obvious. Both nationally and locally, such dialogue has been going on for years, with tacit or explicit ground rules for each occasion — the latest conspicuous instance, nationally, being the consideration of the Role of Conscience in Boston, May 7 and 8, 1967. There, as our text notes, the plans for the consultation did not appear inviting to an important segment of Judaism — and important segments of Protestantism were not officially involved. There is evidently a great deal to be done before the Christian-Jewish dialogue can include all Jews and Christians, even organizationally and at the national level.

How much more remains to be done before individuals and communities throughout the nation are seriously involved in overcoming traditional and currently destructive anti-Semitism, replacing it with the understanding, mutual respect and cooperation that the Jewish and Christian faiths both abundantly support, are questions individuals and communities must answer. Let no one suppose that he can evade his responsibility on the ground that the question is already "old hat." His indifference or boredom will not excuse him from his duty to take note of what goes on in the Near East, in Russia, among the neo-Nazis, and in his own nation, community and church, and to combat it in his own thoughts, speech and acts, and in concert with his neighbors.

We know of no one better equipped to assemble, evaluate and interpret the contents of this issue of Dialogue than our colleague, Dr. Bernhard E. Olson, whose portfolio in the National Conference of Christians and Jews is Director of Interreligious Affairs. As student, teacher, writer, speaker and program director, he has arrived at a maturity in the field of Christian-Jewish relations which justifies our pride and gratitude in presenting him as the editor of this issue of our bulletin.

TEXT OF GUIDELINES ON CATHOLIC-JEWISH RELATIONS

WASHINGTON, D. C. (RNS) 3/16/67. Following is the text of the "Guidelines for Catholic-Jewish Relations" issued by the Subcommission for Catholic-Jewish Affairs of the U. S. Catholic Bishops' Commission for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs:

Perspectives

In its Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions of 1965, the Second Vatican Council issued a historic Statement on the Jews and summoned all Catholics to reappraise their attitude toward and relationship with, the Jewish people.

The statement was, in effect, a culminating point of initiatives and pronouncements of recent Pontiffs and of numerous endeavors in the church concerned with Catholic-Jewish harmony. It was also the point of convergence of many insights opened by Pope Paul's Encyclical Ecclesiam Suam and the Council's Constitution on the Church and Decree on Ecumenism.

HOUSTON'S SHACKLED PRESS

by Ben H. Bagdikian NEWS MEDIA

AMONG the most fervent declarations about American institutions are public testaments to the need for freedom of the press, and no one pronounces these with more passion than the press itself. From standing mottoes on page one, in prose and poetry across editorial pages, and in unrelenting rhetoric from publishers' conventions comes the message: the democratic process is founded on the rock of free and independent newspapers.

Most of these calls imply the danger of control by government. Some suggest other threats, from welfare statism to public apathy. Over the years, among the most insistent alarmists of the internal threat to freedom has been the Houston Chronicle, the largest paper in Texas and at one time the property of Jesse Jones. But so far in this decade the greatest contribution the Houston Chronicle has made to the maintenance of native American institutions is to conduct a continuing and depressing demonstration on how not to operate a free paper in a free society, and to remind its brethren in the trade that the most immediate threat to a free press in this country is their own conflict of interest.

In the 1950s the Chronicle was an unabashed mouthpiece for the city's aging oligarchy, dull, jingoistic, reactionary, and falling behind its competitors. Brought in to rejuvenate the paper in 1960 was William P. Steven, a professional editor (moderate Republican) who reversed the paper's dying tendencies and looked at the Chronicle as though it were being published for the whole community. In addition to this heresy, he was pretty radical: he supported higher education, Lyndon Johnson, and civil rights. So last September he was fired by the oligarchy. It was the most spectacular story in American newspapering that week, reported in all major Texas dailies, the wire services, and national newsmagazines. But in the Chronicle's account of its change — the conservative team of the 1950s was put back in charge — Steven's name did not appear, and he became an unperson in the manner of fallen political gods in the Soviet encyclopedia. The paper began shifting back to the right.

When a big and powerful newspaper fires its hard-driving editor, then changes hands only to reverse the change a few months later, that's news — but barely so to the newspaper in question. Mr. Bagdikian, Washington-based author and reporter, needed weeks of intensive querying and checking to get at the facts about the policies and the goings-on of the owners of the Houston CHRONICLE. The results have great relevance to the state of the free press.

Three months later the oligarchs agreed to sell the Chronicle to the Houston oil millionaire John Mecom as part of an $85 million package that included hotels, banks, office buildings, and a laundry. The deal would change the commercial power structure of the sixth largest city in the country, but the Chronicle's bland story was one eighth as long as the one in the opposition Post. After Mecom moved in, the paper continued its rightward shift and changed largely by playing up its new proprietor's interest in oil, horse and automobile racing, and providing spectacular coverage of his daughter's wedding.

On June 7 of this year the Mecom deal collapsed, and the Chronicle reverted to the oligarchy, along with the laundry. Apparently the deal fell through over disagreement on the final price for the biggest bank in the package. The Chronicle did not report that the deal had been canceled, let alone why, presumably on grounds that it was none of the public's business. Readers were not even told that they had lost a newspaper proprietor. Mecom's name, like Steven's before him, was merely dropped from the masthead and replaced by that of Jesse Jones, who has been dead ten years. If Houstonians depended on their biggest paper, they would not know that their community had undergone a profound change, even though the paper was part of that change. And they would not know that their leading newspaper, the most prominent Texas representative of that crucial institution of a free and independent press, was being bought and sold like an anonymous link in a string of corporate hot dogs. On the basis of that record, the Chronicle's readers will probably have to rely on rumor and gossip to tell them what happens next to their newspaper.

Among the depressing morals to be drawn from the turbulence in Houston is the reminder that the American press has hardly begun to think about, let alone solve, a fundamental problem of conflict of interest. The press has been vigorous about pointing to conflict of interest among politicians, occasionally exposing men and agencies in government who let private profit interfere with their public duty. Newspapers were particularly noticeable stressing the horrors of conflict of interest and payola in broadcasting. At infrequent times a few papers will even expose individual reporters or editors who compromise their reportorial objectivity by taking money, favors, or glory from news sources. But they have been virtually silent about a major source of conflict of interest in journalism: the danger that the publisher of a local paper will have a financial interest in an enterprise that should be reported objectively but is not.

For example, the group that controlled the Chronicle last year also controlled a large bank in town which experienced a bitter stockholder struggle that was reported in the Wall Street Journal and on page one of the opposition Post, but never mentioned in the Chronicle.

So it was typical that when the Chronicle was sold last December, along with the same large bank and downtown real estate, Houstonians depending solely on the Chronicle would have known nothing of the event unless they had caught the final edition of the December 6 paper, and even there they would have been limited to a twelve-and-a-half-inch story. Six months later when it was "unsold," the readers were told nothing. The Post had three chaste paragraphs forty-eight hours later.

The Post has not always compensated for the deficiencies of the Chronicle. It cooperated, for example, in keeping out of print in Houston the name and fate of the discharged Steven. Competition does not necessarily produce good newspapers. There are too many cities where it seems to produce the opposite — Boston, San Francisco, the afternoon papers in New York City — and a number of places where monopolies print good newspapers — Louisville and St. Petersburg. Competition merely increases the odds that news will be printed and public questions asked and investigated. There is no longer competition in 96 percent of American cities with papers, and in the remaining 4 percent the tide of monopoly seems to move on inexorably, as it has in Houston in recent times.

UNTIL 1964 there had been three papers in the city. For years, the best one was Oveta Culp Hobby's morning Post, staid, occasionally enterprising, but never as vigorous or as authoritative as one would expect from the only morning paper in the country's sixth largest and remarkably rich city. There were two afternoon papers. The Scripps-Howard Press, a wretched paper, was a flamboyant, superficial jab in the civic rib cage. The other was the Chronicle, reactionary and stingy with the news, for years the voice of its early owner, Jesse Jones, and after his death, of his fiscal trustees.

In 1960 the Press had a circulation of 102,000. The Post, with 218,000 and the only staff exhibiting signs of metropolitan-caliber ability, grew slowly to dominance in the city. The Chronicle had a circulation of 205,000, but it was out of sympathy and out of touch with large segments of the community. John T. Jones, Jr., the titular head of the Chronicle, decided it was time for a change. Jones, the favorite nephew of Jesse Jones, is tall, slender, slow-speaking, with a facial resemblance to his uncle except for a contemplative quality.

John Jones decided to change the Chronicle to a paper for a modern metropolis, which Houston desperately needed. For years the city had been wracked by ideological wars of the most primitive kind, most dramatically in its educational system. The schools were dominated by citizens who regarded sympathetic mention of the United Nations in the classroom as Communist indoctrination, racial integration as an alien plot, and who eschewed such forms of federal aid as school lunches but grasped it in the form of federally supported military training for high school boys.

Jones's instrument for the awakening of the Chronicle was William P. Steven, a man of heavy build and hearty voice, with a national reputation for rejuvenating newspapers. He had started out in his native Wisconsin, had edited in Tulsa, and had enlivened the Minneapolis news scene. He is of that breed of newspapermen who possess instinctive rapport with their generation, a drive to go where the action is, and an immunity from the contagion of bureaucracy and ultrarespectability.

Like his friend Lyndon Johnson, Steven is a calculating plunger. (Years ago he told a Time magazine reporter that his editing philosophy is "Plan now, print later," but it came out in Time as "Print now, plan later" and continues unchangeable in the corridors of Time as a famous Steven quote.) He parted with the Cowles management in Minneapolis largely because young John Cowles had risen to the point of editorial leadership, and a good newspaper can stand only one leader at a time. It is typical of Steven's shrewd enthusiasm that he found his next job by compiling a list of all the papers in the country with three characteristics: big enough to pay him a good salary, dull, and with an editor over sixty. There were eight. In each case he arranged for a friend who knew the owners to let the publisher know Steven was a good man and available. One of the papers was the Chronicle.

In September of 1960 John Jones and Steven spent a day and a half talking in a room of the Rice Hotel in Houston. Jones wanted Steven to do for the Chronicle what he had done for papers in Tulsa and Minneapolis, make them interesting and make them grow. The two men liked each other. As they approached a decision, Steven told Jones, "You know, John, there is one thing that troubles me about working in the South that you ought to know. I feel that integration is an essential fact in the demonstration of democracy. I think it is necessary for the full development of the economy. And I think it is the only way to make our foreign policy mean anything in a world of mostly dark skins. Outside of that, I have no strong feelings on the matter."

As Steven remembers it, Jones replied, "The Chronicle supports the law of the land. The only trouble I'll have with you is that you may want to talk about it too much."

The Chronicle stopped being dull and archaic. Emphasis moved from columnists of the far right, like Paul Harvey and Fulton Lewis, Jr., to those of the center, like James Reston and Max Freedman. The paper subscribed to the Los Angeles Times–Washington Post wire service and the New York Times News Service (after the Times service appeared, conservatives in town began calling the Chronicle their Pravda).

Almost at once Steven began building the local news staff, which was suffering from inbreeding, age, and malnutrition. Top reporters at the Chronicle in 1960 were getting $120 a week, and he raised their salaries to $165. He attracted bright young journalists from outside to the paper. One photographer, Ted Rozumalski, became the only man ever to be named twice as national Photographer of the Year. Reporter William Porterfield won an Ernie Pyle Award in 1963. Saul Friedman was named a Nieman Fellow at Harvard. The staff began doing a series of articles on urgent local problems, among them sympathetic accounts of the nature of racial relations in the city (there are 300,000 Negroes in a city of a million). Much attention was devoted to the need for faster development of higher education. The Chronicle withdrew its support from the conservatives on the school board, pressed for televising of school-board proceedings against the bitter opposition of conservatives, and won.

Steven spent money, but he also saved some. For years it had cost the paper $100,000 to publish a 6 A.M. edition merely to get an extra 7000 circulation in the fight against the Post. Steven scrapped that edition. In 1964 the Press finally gave up and sold its assets to the Chronicle, which then became the largest paper in Texas, with 254,000 circulation.

The opposition Post began to perk up. It brought down William Woestendiek from the highly successful Long Island Newsday, and its national and foreign news improved. The changes were long overdue in a city with four universities (total enrollment 25,000), a large petrochemical and shipping community with global rather than parochial interests, and the huge NASA space center.

For the first time, urgent issues could be discussed openly without destructive recrimination. The pre-Steven Chronicle spoke for the financial lords of the territory and their eccentric politics, and everyone knew it; the most dangerous political radicalism it had entertained was to support Governor John Connally, even though he is, in a manner of speaking, a Democrat.

A man who lived and worked in Houston during the Steven period said, "You have no idea what a difference it made that the Chronicle changed. It wasn't dangerous to be a Johnson Democrat anymore, or to support minority groups, or speak in favor of Medicare. Before, if you supported these things, they made you feel like the village crazy man."

The nature of this change is implied in the award given Steven in October of 1964 by the Houston chapter of the American Jewish Committee "in recognition of his constructive and effective labors in guiding the Houston Chronicle toward accomplishing the information of our populace and the improvement of opinion in Houston."

It was typical of the new role of the paper that on September 2, 1965, Steven and his counterpart on the Post, William Hobby, Jr., spent much of the day conferring with Houston Mayor Louie Welch over an alarming local development. It was during the Watts rebellion in Los Angeles, and though Houston Negroes showed no sign of hostility, hysterical whites had bought out all the guns in a number of stores and were mounting armed patrols of neighborhoods. Steven put in continual calls for his boss, John Jones, and for his managing editor, Everett Collier, but, oddly, could not reach either one.

Steven arrived home tired and worried, but his wife, Lucy, an alert and articulate blonde, insisted that he shake his concern and join a family celebration. It was a gay evening. But by eleven thirty Bill and Lucy were in bed reading when John Jones called and said that he was coming right up. Bill assumed that Jones wanted to talk about the racial tension.

Just before midnight, Mr. and Mrs. Jones arrived at the Steven home in the fashionable southwest of Houston. Bill and Lucy were in bathrobes and over an initial drink made friendly small talk. Then Jones blurted out: "This is the hardest thing I ever had to do. Bill, they had a meeting today, and they got you."

As Bill and Lucy Steven reconstruct it, the conversation went like this:

Steven: Who is "they"? And what do you mean, they got me?

Jones: You know. The Endowment.

Lucy: Who?

Lucy: What do you mean, they got Bill?

Jones: You're all through, Bill.

Lucy: Why? Why?

There was no direct answer. Much later that night, Jones said: "Bill, you had a vision. They don't want a vision; they want a voice."

The Endowment is The Houston Endowment, Incorporated, a tax-free charitable foundation started by Jesse Jones in 1937 with a gift of $1,050,000. Jesse Jones, banking, lumber, and real estate millionaire and a government administrator under Herbert Hoover and Franklin Roosevelt, died in 1956. Today his Endowment calculates its assets at $168 million. Others think it is $400 million, but no outside audit has ever been made.

Under the law, the Endowment exists solely to support charities. But its primary impact on the community is as a powerful, tightly held corporate force. It has an important interest in thirty-two corporations, a majority interest in twenty-five, including half a dozen banks, three hotels, several downtown office buildings, real estate, and the Mayfair House hotel on Park Avenue, New York. Through its communications properties it has been the major controller of political and social intelligence in the city of Houston. At the start of the counterrevolution that swept Bill Steven out of his job, the tax-free foundation owned 100 percent of KTRH Broadcasting Company, a major station in the city, 31 percent of a local television station, and 100 percent of the Houston Chronicle.

From 1951 to 1964 the Endowment had an income of $97 million and gave $19 million in charity. When Representative Wright Patman of Texas began investigating abuses by some tax-free foundations, the Internal Revenue Service momentarily revoked the Endowment's foundation status but later restored it.

Four men and one woman controlled probably the largest single corporate force in the city. John Jones used to be a sixth trustee and chairman of the board, but he resigned last August, in order, he said, to buy $3 million worth of broadcasting properties from the Endowment without conflict of interest. The remaining five trustees are all related to Jesse Jones by blood, marriage, or former business association. They are J. Howard Creekmore, president, a former bank employee of Jones's; Mrs. Audrey Jones Beck, granddaughter of Jesse; John Beck, her husband; J. Hurt Garrett, a former employee of Jones's and now senior vice president of the Texas National Bank of Commerce, second largest bank in the city, controlled by the Endowment; and W. W. Moore, former associate of Jesse Jones's, now president of Bankers Mortgage Company, a holding company owned 97 percent by the Endowment.

There is special irony in the episode. Reformers of newspapers have long dreamed of ownership by a foundation that would be immune to commercial attitudes and pressures. But as it unfolded in Houston, foundation ownership produced a list of almost every pitfall in business domination. This does not necessarily negate the idea of foundation support, but it would seem to for foundations run by men who are essentially corporate administrators with control of operating businesses. For example, the Chronicle represented only one twentieth of the Endowment's total assets. Even if the newspaper never showed a profit, this would be tolerable to the total economy of the foundation. It served the trustees instead to have the paper protect the property and politics of its owners and do it more effectively by overwhelming its competing papers, which it did by consistently cutting its advertising rates secretly for big advertisers, keeping its monthly subscription rate abnormally low, running exorbitant editions to help put one competitor out of business and dominate another. The owners of the Chronicle had another convenience: they held notes for some time on the owners of the Post.

The chief evil of the Endowment's ownership is the same as that of any business conglomerate possessing a newspaper: the paper is always in danger of becoming a means to the parent corporation's nonjournalistic ends, a handmaiden rather than a detached reporter.

A second danger is that such ownership is ideological. A man who controls a dozen nonjournalistic businesses usually has nothing in his experience telling him he is obliged to make his property available to the ideas of others. The owners of the Chronicle seemed to find any such notion of obligation intolerable, and Steven insists he was fired because of that intolerance. "The conservatives won," he says.

As he cleaned out his desk, Steven got a call from President Johnson, who wanted to know what was going on. "Mr. President," Steven said, "we carried every precinct but the right one." He meant that the paper had support from the community but not from the boardroom of the Houston Endowment in the Bankers Mortgage Building. It was from here that the counterrevolution was mounted. First the foundation trustees dissolved the board of the Chronicle, which had included Steven, replacing him with their new editor, Collier, who had been a columnist during the paper's reactionary period in the 1950s. Then they loaded the paper's board with members of the foundation board — Creekmore, Garrett, Moore, and John Beck.

Jones seems to have been a powerless witness to the wreckage of his paper. He has said that he was told to take it or leave it.

There was almost unanimous indignation among the new hierarchy of the paper at reports that politics of the paper had anything to do with the firing. I tried to ask all the trustees, but most of them were unapproachable. The receptionist for Mr. Moore at Bankers Mortgage brought back the message "He knows what you want, and he won't see you." But I found the number two man on the board less bashful. J. Hurt Garrett has his office on the executive third floor of the Endowment's Texas National Bank of Commerce (the biggest bank it controls). He is an elderly jowl-faced man reminiscent of veteran overseers of New England textile mills.

"We didn't like their editorial policy, that's all," he said. "They had everyone up in arms. Nobody liked it. I never heard anything but complaints about it. . . . It was all this racial desegregation business. Things were all right in Houston before they came down. But all this racial business — nobody liked it. And I don't like all this Johnson stuff, and all his civil rights, too. I know that Jones and Steven are friends of Johnson, but all we got was complaints about the paper's policy on that."

Mr. Garrett sounded quite credible. When he said of the paper's policy, "Nobody liked it," presumably he meant nobody on the third floor of the Texas National Bank of Commerce. Two thirds of Harris County voted for Lyndon Johnson in 1964. And when he said he heard nothing but complaints, this, too, sounded plausible. My guess is that he does not subscribe to a Houston weekly called The Forward Times, which goes mostly to the Negro community, and which ran almost a full-page editorial on the firing of Bill Steven, saying:

> A strong positive force that has quietly but effectively gone about the business of helping Houston Negro citizens move up into new heights of dignity and opportunity has been fired from his position.
> Not many Negroes were personally acquainted with William P. Stevens [The Forward Times made a common error of putting a terminal "s" on the name], but most were well aware of the fact that for the last four years The Houston Chronicle had shifted from a staunchly conservative newspaper to one that openly advocated school integration and printed editorials that warmed the heart of the depressed and disadvantaged.
> What the Negro citizens did not know was the man responsible for all this change was William P. Stevens, backed by John T. Jones, Jr. What they may not have realized recently, when a front-page announcement was run in the Chronicle announcing that a new editor had been hired was that the old editor, William P. Stevens, had been fired. . . . It is an ominous warning of things to come or to say the least it is an indication of the end of a short, short era.

The editorial referred to the possibility that people in Houston might not know that Steven had been fired. On September 3 the Chronicle ran a large story on page one on the new appointments but omitted any mention of Steven, and of the Endowment, which made the changes. Over at the Post a story about the firing was prepared but killed by the top brass.

So the news of Steven's discharge had to travel by underground: two church newsletters (one said "truly disturbing," another "a tragic mistake"), two weeklies (The Forward Times and the conservative weekly, Tribune, which ran a straightforward news story). Later someone mailed out thousands of reproductions of stories in national papers and newsmagazines on a sheet entitled "News all over the U.S. but not in Houston."

JOHN MECOM, the new owner of the Chronicle, inherited all its problems, and some of them were even magnified. Under the previous ownership, when a columnist in the Chronicle had mentioned in print that there was a plan to study a downtown air terminal, the head of the Endowment, Howard Creekmore, personally called the paper in anger. The Endowment also owned the Rice Hotel, where most of the airlines have their offices. A new downtown terminal was not encouraged in the Chronicle.

Under Mecom the Rice Hotel was still owned by the owner of the Chronicle, who still had a controlling interest in the bank. In addition, Mecom has worldwide oil, industrial, hotel, and banking interests, and in the Houston area he owns the Warwick Hotel, the Reed Roller Bit Company, the Keystone Drug Company, a building construction firm, a half interest in a huge industrial complex on the Houston Ship Channel, and 20,000 acres of land, some of which he is using to construct 5000 homes and high-rise apartments. The possibility of a conflict of interest was as inherent under Mecom's ownership of the Chronicle as it was under its previous owners. But the Houston Endowment had been under pursuit by the Department of the Treasury and by Congressman Patman. Patman was digging deeper into the Endowment in the summer and fall of 1965, compiling an impressive record, only partly publicized at the time, of the Endowment's large-scale corporate dealings and its modest indulgence in charity. Patman proposed and even the conservative Treasury agreed that there ought to be a law limiting the right of tax-free foundations to control operating businesses.

During this period, the foundation was looking for a suitable buyer, Steven was fired, and Creekmore decided that John Mecom was the man to buy the Chronicle. Why did they pick him?

Collier's explanation is: "The trustees of Houston Endowment were determined to keep these properties in the hands of someone who has the same deep love of this community and the same concepts for its betterment and progress that Jesse Jones had." The trustees no doubt felt they were expressing "the same concepts for its betterment and progress" when they fired Steven for being too liberal, too pro-Negro, and too militant a reporter of the town.

Mecom is pro-Johnson in a Texas sort of way, but he is not an ideologue. He maintained an office in the Chronicle and ran the same kind of paper the post-Steven editors did under the Endowment. The paper remained to the right of the Steven paper. Three months after Mecom took over, its columnists on domestic affairs were William White, Henry J. Taylor, Raymond Moley, Les Carpenter, Marianne Means, Victor Reisel, William Buckley, James Reston, Max Freedman, and David Lawrence. Four of these (White, Freedman, Carpenter, and Means) are close friends of Lyndon Johnson's. The only nonconservative among the remainder is Reston, and he appeared less frequently than before. Liberal cartoonist Herblock no longer appeared. The paper dropped Ralph McGill and Whitney Young, and conservative columnist David Lawrence was run twice as often as before.

Almost a year after Steven was fired, a series of articles on the Negro community, criticizing among others the slum landlords, had not been published. Reporter Saul Friedman, who has since gone to Detroit, had worked on the series four months. It was ready for publication when Steven was discharged.

On a number of urgent local issues the editorial page went blank. It decided, in an abrupt change, that the televising of school-board sessions was not important. When Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach made a major speech urging the city to complete its racial integration willingly and without rancor, the Chronicle, whose editorials under Steven had not been reticent about giving opinions, merely suggested that readers look at the speech. Another editorial recommended that readers look at a certain column of William White's. An editor told a subordinate, "That will be a signal to President Johnson that we're still with him." The new Chronicle apparently hoped to send esoteric signals to the President that would go undetected by the owners and the readers.

WHEN the Houston Endowment fired Steven, an indignant citizen of Houston wrote to the White House: "The time has come to license newspapers — to assure that they will use their licenses for the benefit of the public and not just for special interests."

Licensing of the press is, of course, unconstitutional and unwise. But newspapers ought to worry about how often the idea appeals to a frustrated public. There is almost nothing a community can do about a local newspaper that fails in its primary duty. Starting a new metropolitan competitor is too much like a man dissatisfied with his automobile trying to start a new General Motors. He might have done it fifty years ago but not today. Nor is there any effective way he can reach owners who choose to remain unresponsive.

The country's newspaper proprietors, the vast majority enjoying a monopoly, preside over an institution that should be the most sensitive detector of change in society. But among major American institutions, newspapers have been the least responsive to upheavals in civilization since World War II. Government, education, religion, and much of corporate life have adapted to altered conditions in economic and social life, but newspaper owners have clung to the past. They seem to be reminded of their special status under the First Amendment only when someone suggests changes in the second-class mailing privilege or the payment of standard wages to delivery boys. Their response to the notion of the press being accountable to the public is to bar reporters from sessions of the American Newspaper Publishers Association. In addition, the dangers of news monopoly are increasing.

The basic answer to this vacating of responsibility is for owners to include in their corporate hierarchy, their directorships, and their wills some meaningful representation in the public interest, quite divorced from simple property interest.

In the absence of that there are methods by which a paper ownership can establish working communications with its own community. The editor, publisher, and owner of one of the best papers in the country, Barry Bingham, of the Louisville Courier-Journal and Times, has proposed local press councils in which community representatives would regularly sit with the paper's hierarchy to adjudicate complaints and public issues. No one has been trampled in the rush to try it.

Because there has been little evidence of publisher interest in creating some method of public accountability for the press, the government may have to step in. The least that can be done is to take away the "they" of ownership of newspapers, the usually faceless controllers of the community's news. The Post Office requires users of the second-class mailing privilege to list each year all parties who own one percent or more of the stock in the publication. But at present, there is no distinction made between a one percent owner and a 99 percent owner. And the listing, usually published in the paper in early October, is meaningless because it lists only the holders of record, often trustees and third parties acting as executors of wills.

Although a few newspapers offer stock publicly, there is no good reason in law or logic why newspapers should not file for public scrutiny, under postal law, the same information the Securities and Exchange Commission requires of 4500 companies who trade their stock in the open market. The SEC requires the filing as a public record of the names of all officers, directors, and holders of 10 percent or more of stock. Each of those persons in turn must file their holdings in any other traded firm in which they are an officer, director, or holder of 10 percent or more of stock. The present postal requirement was passed to prevent the use of government mailing subsidy by parties using the cover of education and news for propaganda or concealed advertising. The present listings do not usually tell the Post Office or the readers who the beneficial owners of newspapers are or what other financial interests they have that might constitute a conflict of interest and a distortion upon the news.

Newspapers have generally supported the idea that policy-making federal officials should disclose their financial holdings and sell those that might conceivably tempt them to influence their work for their own benefit. The American newspaper is almost a branch of public administration. It is the most important single instrument of information in a society peculiarly dependent upon public knowledge and public opinion; for its own future and the national good it needs to be as free as possible, and it needs to assure increasingly dubious readers that it is free.

The Message of Marshall McLuhan

McLuhan, right or wrong?

The Oracle of Toronto thinks big—his theory of communications offers nothing less than an explanation of all human culture, past, present and future. And he excites large passions. "McLuhan's teaching is radical, new, animated by high intelligence, and capable of moving people to social action," writes the novelist George P. Elliott. "If he is wrong, it matters." "He's swinging, switched on, with it and NOW," says Amherst Prof. Benjamin DeMott. "And wrong." "He makes us question all the shibboleths of Western culture," counters critic Gerald Stearn. "He can only be considered a stimulating thinker on a scale quite similar to Freud and Einstein."

Freud, Einstein—Marshall McLuhan?

On first inspection, there are some rough similarities. Freud and Einstein, each in his turn, offered propositions about the psyche and the universe that were plainly contradicted by the senses of all right-thinking men (Sex drives in infants? Space is curved?). And now McLuhan proclaims equally barmy notions to contradict the eye and bend and boggle the mind. He firmly avows, for instance, that watching television is a tactile rather than a visual experience; that man goes through life looking through the rear-view mirror, aware of his environment only after he has left it, and that what is communicated doesn't count as much as how it is communicated. This last, of course, is expressed in the aphorism that is McLuhan's trademark: "The Medium Is the Message."

If these propositions are correct, the implications of McLuhanism are staggering. In his world view, wars are obsolete and so are political dogmas, the assembly line and white supremacy; the age of the individual is over, and a new man is emerging.

"I explore, I don't explain," McLuhan explains. Yet he offers himself to the world as a kind of Dr. Spock of pop culture. Are the children alienated? McLuhan has the answer there—somewhere. From Marshall's McClues, Camp Followers supposedly can tell which fashions will sell, and politicians which candidates will go over big. A girl can even read McLuhan's notion of why she makes herself more provocative when she wears dark glasses and fishnet stockings.

LSD and Needles: Naturally enough, McLuhan himself is viewed through a rear-view mirror, darkly. To critics he is, at best, obscure; at worst, a charlatan. But the McLuhanite tong around the country is enthusiastic enough to have made him courted by industry, and to have made the paperback edition of his major work, "Understanding Media: The Extensions of Man," the fastest-selling nonfiction book at Harvard and at Ann Arbor. At Columbia, a coed likens reading McLuhan to taking LSD. "It can turn you on," she says. "LSD doesn't mean anything until you consume it—likewise McLuhan." Fordham has tapped McLuhan next semester for the Albert Schweitzer Chair, a New York State-supported sinecure with a $100,000 per year fund to cover salary and research.

In "Understanding Media," McLuhan needled Bell Telephone's research department for being "oblivious to the real meaning of the telephone." Stung, the Bell people recently journeyed up to Toronto for a séance. McLuhan has an office at Time Inc. and an arrangement to write articles for Look. And last year he signed—at a handsome fee—with the Container Corp. of America to give a lecture to Container executives and selected customers. In the lecture, McLuhan told his audience they were engaged in the business of mass production at a time when the age of mass production was coming to an end.

'Mysterioso': Already apotheosized in a score of publications ranging from the New Mexico Quarterly to Life magazine, McLuhan is the subject of a new anthology, "McLuhan, Hot and Cool," edited by Gerald Stearn and due out in May from the Dial Press. This week, Bantam Books will bring out McLuhan's latest treatise, "The Medium Is the Massage" (160 pages. $1.45). The pun is intended: "massage" is a once-over-lightly kneading of the ideas contained in McLuhan's "Understanding Media." On March 19, he will be the subject of an hour-long NBC television documentary that eschews the usual sequential reporting in favor of quick cuts, overlapped images and out-of-focus shots of McLuhan. "Mysterioso," explains Ernest Pintoff, the producer. And in the ultimate accolade, McLuhan's name has passed into the language. The French apply the term mcluhanisme to the mixed-media world of pop art; more invidiously, "McLuhan" has become a synonym for impenetrable prose, as when one columnist accused George Romney of reading too much McLuhan.

Most literary critics tend to favor this second usage. "It is not possible to give a rational summary of McLuhan's ideas," George Elliott declares. "His writing is deliberately antilogical: circular, repetitious, unqualified, gnomic, outrageous." McLuhan, as one not unsympathetic critic says, is too "messy and journalistic" for the academic-literary Establishment. And Jerome Agel, an early McLuhan booster and the publisher of the non-Establishment tabloid Books, claims McLuhan was "discovered by young people and the artists, not by the literary crowd. Most of the critics panned him," he adds, "and they still do not understand his books." Nevertheless, the harshness of the reviews didn't hinder sales too much. "Media" has sold more than 9,000 in hardcover—not bad for a serious $7.50 work—and more than 100,000 in soft.

Even more than style, the critics abhor McLuhan's message. McLuhan, it is whispered, actually likes television. He is accused of electronic chiliasm, of being an evangelist on behalf of the whole adwracked, meretricious pop kingdom-to-come of the media. He has become, as Elliott puts it, "a double agent" who "went out among tribalizing Media as a spy from civilization but stayed there too long." As the CIA knows, however, the intelligence agent's position is always an ambiguous one, and Madison Avenue tends to treat McLuhan gingerly. San Francisco advertising man Howard Gossage proclaims McLuhan is "an Archimedes who has given the ad industry levers to move the world." But Doyle Dane Bernbach president William Bernbach says he "has read only bits and pieces of McLuhan and our agency has not been influenced by him."

Whose Miasma? That McLuhan should be indicted for treason to scholarship and accused of shilling for pop culture, constitutes perhaps the greatest paradox of all about this paradoxical man. As it happens, he is an Establishment figure himself; his doctorate is from Cambridge University, and for two decades he has been writing serious textbooks and straight prose for such scholarly media as the Sewanee Review and the Journal of Economic History. He is a devout Roman Catholic by conversion, and far from selling out to the brave new media world, McLuhan may have a means of coming to grips with it.

Just possibly, then, the miasma about McLuhan may reside in the eyes of his critics. Just possibly, the new environment that McLuhan discerns should be studied as carefully as the O_2 system in the Apollo spaceship. Just possibly, understanding McLuhan may help ensure that earth's environment sustains rather than destroys the crew. Right or wrong, then, it matters to understand McLuhan, his media and his message.

Oar No. 3: McLuhan was born in Edmonton in 1911. "My mother was Baptist, my father [an insurance salesman] was Methodist," McLuhan recalls. "Spiritually, I shopped around as a student." At the University of Manitoba, he started out by studying engineering and reading G.K. Chesterton, later switched to English literature and the more weighty Catholic writers, such as Maritain and Gilson. As an undergraduate at Cambridge University from 1934 to 1936, he rowed for Trinity Hall and his varnished No. 3 oar now hangs in his office in a converted town house on the campus of the University of Toronto's St. Michael's College, along with a large photograph of beat poet Allen Ginsberg and a portrait of James Joyce. At Cambridge, McLuhan came under the influence of Wyndham Lewis, one of the first literary figures to study popular culture seriously.

At Cambridge, too, McLuhan acquired the galaxy of heroes that shaped his later message: Edgar Allan Poe ("He was the inventor of the detective story," McLuhan says. "He made his readers work, made them do-it-themselves"); James Joyce ("He starts with language as the ultimate medium; the whole of 'Finnegan's Wake' is a study of the effects of technology on all of human society"); Gustave Flaubert ("He pointed out that style is a way of perception"); T.S. Eliot and Ezra Pound ("Their poems are full of jazz idioms and pop cult forms"); and Rimbaud, Baudelaire and Mallarmé ("I learned my style from the symbolists—they suggest but do not say all . . .").

McLuhan returned to Cambridge again as a graduate student in 1939, to write his thesis on the poet Thomas Nashe—and, incidentally, to take his honeymoon with Corinne Lewis, a young Texas-born actress he had met the year before at California's Pasadena Playhouse. A strikingly handsome woman, Corinne McLuhan occasionally edits her husband, chauffeurs him around town in the family Toronado and keeps track of their two sons and four daughters.

By his own account, McLuhan's first practical encounter with popular culture occurred in 1936, when he arrived to teach freshman classes at the University of Wisconsin. "I was confronted with young Americans I was incapable of understanding," he recalls. "I felt an urgent need to study their popular culture in order to get through."

Subliminal Sex: The eventual result of this confrontation with pop culture was McLuhan's "The Mechanical Bride" (1951). The Bride is subliminal sex in the service of technology, particularly as revealed by the way some advertising tries to move goods. McLuhan wants to know what mass media have done to American culture; to find out, he looks at ads for autos, caskets and deodorants.

The targets were familiar enough; in the early '50s, sociologists like David Riesman and Reuel Denney, among others, were looking at similar topics. But McLuhan went about his analysis in a jazzier, elliptical manner. In "Bride," his Ph.D. dissertation prose gave way to provocative headlines or glosses. "Does the American immigrant have to reject his father?" asks McLuhan in introducing a discussion of Maggie and Jiggs. There were Joycean puns and word plays; with Life Buoy and Lysol, "Little B.O. Peep Has Lost Her Sheep."

Though well-received by his peers, "Bride" has long been out of print. But a Daughter of the Bride will soon appear;

McLuhan, aided by his 24-year-old son Eric, is just finishing up and sending to his editors at McGraw-Hill a series of some 140 ads and glosses he has been collecting over the last ten years. The new collection is entitled "Culture Is Our Business," and is full of his re-joycings and probes of such new cultural manifestations as the Jolly Green Giant, Muzak and the Television Information Office.

Coming of Age: After "Bride" came "The Gutenberg Galaxy" (1962) and "Understanding Media" (1964), which examine not only the pop objects of the new technological age but how the age itself came into being. As McLuhan tells it, he has a box seat. Canada and Catholic-supported St. Michael's—the public University of Toronto went ecumenical long before Vatican Council II—provide him with a quiet nineteenth-century vantage point to view the frantic twentieth-century to the south.

McLuhan says he is fond of Canada because it is "a backward country. There are no interruptions and distractions and yet it is close to the center of the world." Also, his light teaching load, together with his disinclination to play the academic climbing game, provide him with time to go with his perspective. McLuhan has been Director of the University of Toronto's Centre for Culture and Technology since 1964, but the imposing name is misleading; actually the Centre consists of McLuhan, his secretary and the down-at-the-heels office they share. No computers, no labs and no staff. Instead, various Toronto professors attach themselves from time to time to collaborate with McLuhan.

In his two decades at Toronto, McLuhan used his time to remain a student. In the 1950s, it was a case of informally but assiduously supplementing his literature major with a strong minor in science and art. With designer Harley Parker and anthropologist Edmund Carpenter, a student of Eskimo culture, he put out Explorations, a magazine modeled after Wyndham Lewis's Dadaesque venture BLAST. McLuhan plans to use some of his Fordham money to bring Parker and Carpenter to New York.

"The Gutenberg Galaxy" and "Understanding Media" reflect the synthesis of literature and science. Both books show off McLuhan's appallingly encyclopedic erudition, his exasperating method and the scatter-shot sweep of his theory of culture and communications. The whole is so chaotic that even friendly critics despair. Many of the sources he uses to build his theory, as Prof. Raymond Waddington has pointed out, are "eccentric and simplistic." He cites, for example, an economist who believes trading can be traced to the monkey's habit of swinging from tree to tree.

Leaving aside most of the monkeyshines, McLuhan in short-course form goes like this:

The basic premise is that there have been three Ages of Man—the Pre-literate or Tribal, the Gutenberg or Individual and the present Electric or Retribalized. Each age, says McLuhan, is shaped by the form of the information available. And by information McLuhan means not only the standard media such as print and TV, but also clothes, clocks, money and any artifact that conveys meaning.

Triple Play: McLuhan's claim is that these information modes or media alter our sensory life—that is, what we see, hear, feel, taste and smell, and, therefore, know. For example, the development of such "media" as tools and language among the low-browed hominids led to the explosive development of the brain and to man's differentiation from other species—and not the other way around. McLuhan sees each medium as a similar extension and modifier of man; just as the caveman's ax is an extension of the hand, so the book is an extension of the eye, and so electric circuitry—the telegraph, telephone and television—is an extension of the central nervous system. Each such extension, McLuhan maintains, changes the balance among the five senses—making one sense dominant and altering the way man feels, thinks and acts toward information. As a result, a new environment is created, spatial relations are re-conceptualized. It is a triple play: new media to new sensory balance to new environment. This, he says, is why the medium is the message, why the effect is important, why the fact that the TV image is composed of phosphor dots is more important than whether the dots are carrying the Smothers Brothers or Uncle Vanya.

Bomb: Thus in the pre-alphabet age, the ear was dominant; "hearing was believing." Man lived in acoustic space—a world of tribes, emotion, mystery and communal participation. Beginning with the Greeks, the new medium of the phonetic alphabet forced the magic world of the ear to yield to a new sensory balance centered on the neutral world of the eye. Later, Gutenberg's invention of movable type forced man to comprehend in a linear, uniform, connected, continuous fashion. A whole new environment—the Gutenberg Galaxy—emerged. The portable book was like a hydrogen bomb dropped on the tribal world; for the first time, man could read and think in isolation. Individualism was born, and it became possible to separate thought from action (vide Hamlet). Politically, the newly discovered privacy of the reader made a point of view possible; economically, linear thought produced the assembly line and industrial society; in physics, it led to the Newtonian and Cartesian views of the universe as a mechanism in which it is possible to locate a physical event in space and time; in art, linearity produced perspective; in literature, the chronological narrative.

Then, in the nineteenth century man entered the Electric Age with the invention of a new medium, the telegraph. The Gutenberg galactic explosion that had shattered the old tribal unity of the ancients gave way to a huge implosion; electric circuitry bound up the world in a web of instant awareness and brought all the fragmentary pieces back together. The old, linear visual connections were severed, and the aural and tactile senses emerged once again. With Telstar and other high-speed communications annihilating space and time, an "all-at-once" environment has taken shape. Tribal man has returned and the world has contracted into a global village in which everyone is involved with everyone else—the haves with the have-nots (foreign aid, war on poverty), Negroes with whites (sit-ins and rights marches) adults with teen-agers (Sunset Strip riots).

'Hot' and 'Cool': Thus, to McLuhan, the key word in the new Electric Age is "involvement." His second major insight (or outrage, if one disagrees) is that the old print medium involves one sense (the visual) while the new electric media, particularly television, involve all the senses simultaneously. This is why he says that some media are "hot" and some "cool." Print, McLuhan insists, is a hot medium: the printed page projects plenty of information; it comes in as high definition for one sense—but does not involve all the senses. By contrast, he says, TV is a cool, low-definition medium; that is, it provides a minimum of information—but involves all the senses all at once. This means there is high participation and involvement.

To the man who has stared for hours on end at the little black box this simply doesn't make sense—to him, quite naturally, TV seems visual. McLuhan would reply: that's eye thinking. In reality, he says, with television you are the screen; the TV image is not a still photo but a ceaselessly forming contour or mosaic projecting all those little Seurat-like dots onto you, the screen, at the rate of 3 million impulses a second. You have to fill in the mosaic, connect all the dots. "You have to be 'with it'," McLuhan admonishes, adding Delphically that "the phrase 'with it' came in since TV."

McLuhan also holds that the same messages come over differently via different media. As a prime example, he cites the 1960 debates between Nixon and Kennedy. To those who simply concluded that Kennedy looked and spoke better, McLuhan's theory seems absurd. The public Richard Nixon, he says, was a hot, forceful, high-definition type, while the public Kennedy was a cool, nonchalant low-definition figure. During the later debates, Nixon became more forceful—hot and definite in McLuhan's terms—and many of the political sages thought he was catching Kennedy. But for McLuhan it was the end of Nixon. In a newspaper interview which appeared on Oct. 15, 1960, McLuhan gave the nod to Kennedy. (Yet when McLuhan watched Nixon in another context on TV—talking in a relaxed manner on the "Jack Paar Show"—he knew that that Nixon could have won the Presidency.)

Newsweek—Bernard Gotfryd

McLuhan, his wife and four of their children: Retribalized man

Television brings not only the voting booth into the living room but also the civil-rights march along Alabama's U.S. 80 and the bulldozing of a village in Vietnam—and involves the audience intimately. "Without television, there would be no civil-rights legislation," McLuhan declares, sweepingly. Moreover, "a hot war like Vietnam over a cool medium like TV is doomed. The young oppose the war not out of pacifism but out of their pain of involvement."

Ending—eventually—the war in Vietnam is only one of the effects McLuhan claims for television. McLuhan holds that the changes in the environment "since TV" are so pervasive that he despairs of presenting them. All he is able to offer is an "inventory" of effects that includes:

▪ Sex. Among the first victims of television that McLuhan counts are his own views in "The Mechanical Bride" emphasizing the visual nature of advertising, particularly the sexual come-on. "There has been a dimming down of the visual," he says. "We are now in the all-involving tactile mode." That's why discothèques are loud and dark. It is also why a girl is sexier in cool media like dark glasses and fishnet stockings: these things invite involvement.

▪ Morals. There will be more sleeping around among single young people, McLuhan says, but married couples will be models of rectitude—because that's how it is in tribal culture.

▪ Fashions. The shift from the visual to the tactile also is signaled by boys and girls who dress alike and cut their hair alike—gender differentiation now comes with touch. Miniskirts, topless waitresses and the trend toward nudity on beaches and in films are also signs of the TV times: as the visual becomes less important no one minds a show of skin.

▪ Sports. Baseball is linear, individual—the pitcher stands on the mound, the batter waits. By contrast football is like the TV mosaic itself—action occurs simultaneously, with the entire team involved and scattering all over the screen. So football has supplanted baseball as the most popular U.S. sport.

▪ The politics of consensus. McLuhan claims TV is killing off the voting bloc and elevating the leader who tries to be the all-inclusive image; instead of offering a political viewpoint, politicians now will take inclusive political postures.

▪ The generation gap. The young TV generation has a completely different sensory life than the adult generation which grew up on hot radio and hot print. Hence, young people today reject jobs and goals—that's linear thinking. They reject the consumer life—that's fragmented and specialist. They want roles, that is, involvement.

▪ Business reorganizations. The mosaic mesh of TV is driving out lineality in industry. Since TV, McLuhan declares, the assembly line has disappeared and staff and line structures have dissolved in management. In fact, all lines are disappearing: stag lines, receiving lines and pencil lines from the backs of nylons.

Some of this looks—sounds, feels—plausible; some, preposterous. Pencil lines have disappeared from nylons, but have assembly lines disappeared from Detroit? Certainly they have, McLuhan would reply. What then are the autoworkers doing in those plants? Beginning to make custom cars, McLuhan says, like the "basic" Mustang which comes with a score of optional accessories. Why then don't we all realize this? The trouble, says McLuhan, is that people are still looking through the rear-view mirror.

The idea of rear-view mirrorism is the newest McLuhanism. When faced with a new situation, McLuhan writes in "The Medium is the Massage," "we always tend to attach ourselves to the objects, to the flavor of the most recent past." Contemporary society is like a driver who sees neither ahead to the future nor outside his side window to the present but looks only at the past in the rear-view mirror. U.S. adult society, he says, exists imaginatively among the Cartwrights of Bonanza-land, closing off its life—like so many wagons drawn in a circle—unaware of what's happening outside.

DEW-liner: But a few people are alert. Mostly they are the avant-garde poets, artists and sleuths—McLuhan includes himself in these categories—who have consciously sharpened their perceptions, realized the phoniness of the rear-view mirror and forced themselves to look ahead and see the environment as it really is. The artist, McLuhan says, serves like Canada's Distant Early Warning (DEW) Line; his job is to alert society.

From this short—and considerably glossed over—course on McLuhan, several judgments can be drawn.

First, none of his basic ideas is in itself startling or even original. Discussions about form as content date to Aristotle; Buckminster Fuller, and Henri Bergson before him, explained how tools of man can become extensions of man, and sociologists long ago gave the designation "cultural lag" to situations in which social organization falls behind technological development. Even the aphorism about the medium and the message is not wholly new; the late Canadian economic historian Harold Innis pointed out the role of print in the transformation of culture more than a decade ago—a priority McLuhan has graciously acknowledged.

Reply: Second, McLuhan is a synthesizer. He has gathered amorphous and scattered ideas, thought them through with force and vivacity, and opened up new areas of awareness. "He has joyously enriched the scope of what is relevant," says the English critic George Steiner. "He has made the jungle of the world more interesting." And Harvard's David Riesman lauds McLuhan as "a reply to the solemn commentators who look with alarm on the rise of pop culture."

Third, McLuhan himself isn't a very good DEW Line. The essence of a DEW Line is to discriminate between the radar scope blips of real incoming enemy planes and the patterns caused by flights of geese and the northern lights. But in his books and in his conversations, McLuhan lets everything through, no matter how outrageous or exaggerated or contradictory. He often takes the good insights that he has hit upon and pushes them too far. The U.S. may still be largely a visual culture just emerging from the nineteenth century. The Soviet Union may be an aural-tactile culture, just emerging from the Middle Ages. But is that why the CIA sends U-2 reconnaissance planes over the Soviet Union while the KGB plants bugs in U.S. embassies? Everything becomes grist for his mad, mod mill. Is the subject the youthful Red Guards? That's easy. China is still a tribal environment, says McLuhan, and, of course, this permits participation of children in adult affairs.

Fourth, the leaky DEW Line and the impossibly broad argument are the inevitable consequences of McLuhan's own beliefs. He is delivering his message via a medium—the printed page—which he has stated is no longer adequate to command the attention and involvement of modern electric man. McLuhan's solution in "Galaxy" and "Media" is to invent a "mosaic writing" that attempts to simulate the disconnected, low-definition coolness of television—and thus capture the reader. The result is deliberately repetitious, confused and dogmatic. In McLuhan's new picture book, "The Medium Is the Massage," he attempts to go further toward mosaic presentation but in shorter, less repetitive takes.

No sweatshirts yet, but a lively cult

Tailor-made: Despite his dilemma, McLuhan doesn't plan to abandon the book form. He and Toronto Prof. Richard Schoeck are collaborating on a series of volumes of poetry and prose for high-school seniors and college freshmen (written non-mosaically but with accompanying tapes); there is "Culture Is Our Business" as well as "Space in Poetry and Painting," with Harley Parker and "A Message to the Fish," with management-consultant Ralph Baldwin. "The Fish," explains McLuhan, "are the corporation heads moving about in a media they know nothing about." Finally, he is writing "The Future of the Book," with William Jovanovich, the president of Harcourt, Brace & World. The future of the book? Yes, thanks to photocopying and computers, McLuhan allows that books have a future; they will no longer be assembly-line products, they will be services, tailor-made (like the car of the future) to meet specific demands phoned to the information retrieval center.

But neither does McLuhan plan to abandon his methods of presentation. "Unless a statement is startling," he says candidly, "no one will pay any attention; they will put it down as a point of view." He considers statements in his books and his speeches as tentative probes—disposable as Kleenex. "I don't necessarily agree with everything I say," he adds.

"Most of my work in the media is like that of a safecracker," McLuhan says in the introduction to Gerald Stearn's "McLuhan, Hot and Cool." "In the beginning I don't know what's inside. I just set myself down in front of the problem and begin to work. I grope, I probe, I listen, I test—until the tumblers fall and I'm in."

Jokes: But does he really want to get in—or stay out? His attitude about the media is a little like the punch line in one of his after-dinner jokes: a man went out on a date with Siamese twins and the next day a friend asked if he had a good time; his answer: "Well, yes and no."

Sometimes he seems to be saying the media threaten man. Education, he says, must serve as civil defense against the media fallout; the Ivory Tower must become the control tower. And he likens modern man to the mariner in Edgar Allan Poe's story, "A Descent Into the Maelstrom." The mariner is caught in a whirlpool; but he figures out the relative velocities of currents and saves himself. The sailor's strategy, McLuhan suggests, is his own: understand our predicament, our electrically configured whirl, and save ourselves from drowning.

On the other hand, McLuhan describes, with obvious approval, cool men in a tribal world of full sensory involvement and group participation. It is a situation that the Catholic McLuhan finds not unlike the rich liturgical services of his church. Further, the scholar McLuhan acknowledges that a world where the Ivory Tower is so important can't be too bad.

McLuhan isn't specific about his future strategy of social action; he speaks instead in science-fiction terms about learning how to control the thermostat of the environment in order to shape the new world to come. The thought of just such a thermostat, manipulated by technicians or hidden persuaders, chills many of McLuhan's readers. But he says, optimistically, that the futurists will use their thermostats rationally, for "who would want to turn up the heat to 150?"

McLuhan, right or wrong?

Well, yes and no.

Papers in South Expanding Negro News Coverage

By WALTER RUGABER
Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, May 10—A recent issue of The Star-Tribune, a small weekly newspaper in Chatham, Va., included a front-page picture of Ruth L. Harvey, a Negro lawyer, seeking election to the state's House of Delegates.

Miss Harvey's photograph appeared at the top of the page adjacent to a picture of Dabney K. Hall, a white man campaigning for sheriff in the same election. A lengthy article quoted Miss Harvey and set forth her personal history in detail.

At the top of an inside page, there was a three-column photograph of a Negro voter registration rally at a local high school. The caption reported that "a large crowd attended," and an accompanying story gave an account of various speeches.

In other recent issues, The Star-Tribune has carried a large photograph of a local Negro glee club and has published an article about a local Negro minister who had completed 40 years of service at his church.

The weekly's open-handed coverage of Negro affairs is an example of an important trend in many Southern newspapers over the last decade. The drive for Negro equality has reached the region's news rooms.

Pattern Is Uneven

The pattern is quite uneven, however. Southern coverage of everyday activities by Negroes has become an issue in recent weeks during a bitter controversy involving two other Virginia newspapers.

Less than 50 miles north of Chatham, two much larger publications in Lynchburg — the morning News and the evening Daily Advocate—present a contrast to The Star-Tribune's approach to the Negro community.

The arch-conservative dailies in Lynchburg, published by Carter Glass 3d, grandson of the late Senator, have been subjected to sharp national criticism and charges of biased handling of local stories about Negroes.

While skipping obituaries and news of other developments of interest to their Negro readers, the News and Daily Advance gave extensive coverage to the trial of a Negro dishwasher charged with the rape of a 63-year-old white woman.

The papers repeatedly referred to Thomas C. Wansley, who had won a new trial, as a "twice-convicted Negro rapist." One of the defendant's lawyers, William M. Kunster of New York, was often identified as a man linked "with Communist-front organizations."

Open Letter of Protest

Angered by such coverage, 67 publishers have discontinued it under heavy pressure.

Most papers have dropped awkward references to "the Jones woman" and now give Negroes the courtesy titles of "Miss" and "Mrs." Also, an area of particular expansion in coverage is the sports section.

"Hell, we're just up to our ears in colored athletes all the time," said W. D. Workman, associate editor of the Columbia (S. C.) State. He added that the paper also reports on Negro scholarship winners, speakers and other notables.

When the city's predominantly Negro Benedict College got a new president recently, Mr. Workman said The State published his picture and a news article under an eight-column headline on the front page of its second section.

"There's been no drastic change," Mr. Workman declared, "just an evolution of growing with the times over the past 10 years." Negro affairs, he added, are now judged by editors strictly on their news value.

Society Pages Sensitive

In another move typical of many Southern papers, The Arkansas Gazette dropped the identification of Negroes in obituaries two or three years ago and integrated these notices with announcements of white deaths.

The society pages are considered the most sensitive area on Southern papers, and the least touched by change. While notices of Negro engagements are beginning to appear, pictures of the bride-elect remain widely taboo.

There have been advances, however. Hugh B. Patterson Jr., publisher of The Arkansas Gazette, said the paper began printing pictures of Negroes in its society sections about six months ago.

Mr. Patterson said the paper had included photographs of Negro beauty queens and prize winners as well. Recently, he added, it carried a picture of a group of local Negro debutantes.

While coverage of Negro news has scarcely been expanded by all Southern newspapers, some papers long considered especially hostile in reporting Negro activities have done so.

The Jackson (Miss.) Clarion-Ledger and The Jackson Daily News grant courtesy titles to Negro women and have expanded their reports of Negro sports. A source sensitive to the treatment of racial news in the state observed:

"I would say that if three years ago these papers were terrible they can now be considered merely drab. That represents a hell of an improvement."

As is often the case, however, the editorial policy remains hostile to civil rights activities.

Mr. Struby of the publishers association said he expected that in perhaps five years coverage of Negro news in the South would have become "as general a practice as elsewhere in the country."

TO: Intergroup Relations Agencies -- Public and Voluntary

FROM: Isaiah Terman

SUBJECT: Mass Media and Race Tensions

We have had a heartening response to Harry Fleischman's memorandum of April 20 on "Help Shape A Safer City" and there are signs that local intergroup agencies are taking steps to demonstrate support and concern for police needs and professional interests as an essential part of police-community relations programs.

This encourages us to write to you about another program which warrants greatly increased attention at this time, namely, the development of guidelines and machinery to ensure responsible and constructive reporting of news with intergroup significance.

The attached report of a Mass Media Briefing Session held by the Philadelphia Commission on Human Relations exemplifies an ongoing effort to develop such a program. We have been granted permission to share this report with professional intergroup practitioners on a confidential basis only. It is not for publication.

(More background on the Philadelphia effort is given in Burton I. Gordin's article, "The Mass Media and Intergroup Relations," published in the NAIRO Journal, Summer 1961, which is known to many of you as is the pioneering and continuing work in this field by the Chicago Commission. Relevant also are our reprints, "Racial News Gap" and "Improving the Image of a Group.")

We would like to gather information from Commissions and voluntary intergroup agencies who have -- or are in process of establishing -- active consultative and collaborative relations with mass media. If you permit, we will make the material available to others who can benefit from it.

Readers of this memo hardly need to be told that the solution to problems of intergroup tensions lies in dealing with the root causes and effects of discrimination and prejudice, not simply with the treatment of intergroup problems by the mass media. (Suggestions for immediate remedial action are given in our "Case Study of a Riot," p. 55-62.) Yet we cannot deny that the media have a crucial role, in the long run as well as in tension situations, for resolving intergroup problems constructively.

An idea that emerged following the Philadelphia Mass Media Briefing Session concerns the creation of a small Media Advisory Committee which, during the summer months, will receive special reports and briefing from the Commission on Human Relations, the police, etc. This group of high level representatives would issue periodic bulletins to the media with regard to the handling of racially inflammatory material and other news of intergroup significance. Also planned is another session for media executives, following through on the one reported herewith.

Let us hear from you and let us know if we can be of further service in this regard.

CONFIDENTIAL

PHILADELPHIA MASS MEDIA BRIEFING SESSION

August 4, 1966

On Thursday, August 4, 1966, the Commission on Human Relations and the City of Philadelphia's Division of Information held a briefing session on the current status of intergroup relations in the city. Representatives of the press, radio and television, at policy-making levels, attended.

City Representative Abe S. Rosen opened the session by stating that its purpose was to acquaint the media with the background and specifics of City efforts in human relations areas (particularly those of the Police Department, Commission on Human Relations and the Anti-Poverty Program). Mr. Rosen also noted that there are different approaches toward the handling of news on human relations issues, ranging from the view of those who think it better not to say anything to those who believe everything must be said.

Mr. Fred T. Corleto, managing director, asked the group for help, as newsmen and as responsible human beings, to "keep Philadelphia clean of serious trouble" this summer. He said the city was doing everything possible to keep human temperatures down by anticipating the problems which might spark difficulty. He cited programs of recreation, health, welfare services, and police-community relations.

He said that an irresponsible news story could inflame the public and urged the mass media to be guided by their sense of responsibility to their profession as well as to their community.

Deputy Commissioner of Police Frank Rizzo described the various action programs sponsored by the police to prevent intergroup disharmony and to improve police-community relations. He noted that no other city in the country has a police-community relations division as effective and well-staffed as Philadelphia.

Mr. Rizzo also made a plea to the media for a more understanding attitude toward the police. He extended an invitation to all members of the press to ride in a police patrol car any Friday or Saturday night to "see what goes on." He criticized media's handling of the 13th and Fitzwater incident. He said the press called the situation a "near-riot" and stated that the police retreated. Mr. Rizzo said it was not a near-riot — rather, it was a fairly ordinary street occurrence and that it was normal for a policeman to meet situations he could not handle alone and, therefore, to request aid — that such a situation equalled neither a riot nor a police retreat.

Mr. Rosen then pointed out that the police do as much preventive work as possible, such as their work in individual communities through the community's own leaders. He then called on one of these community leaders, Rev. Licorish of the Zoar Methodist Church, to tell the group about such activities.

Rev. Licorish expressed concern about "the manner in which things are reported by the media." He said media sometimes "got carried away and didn't realize what effect they had on the public." Rev. Licorish said that, on unsavory stories, "the Negro seems to get the punch line more so than the others, that the press should realize this is saying it's alright for the other fellow (to do this) but not this one." He observed that the press says it's in business to sell papers but should be aware of what it's doing to many who may be less responsible by glorifying certain kinds of tragedy — like stories about a well-known entertainer who takes dope.

Mr. Rosen then introduced Mr. Charles W. Bowser, executive director of the Philadelphia Anti-Poverty Action Committee.

Mr. Bowser said "...what we're talking about is a riot. We don't want one." He then described his own experiences as a North Philadelphia teenager during the riot of the 1940's. He pointed out that both he and those he knew who participated in the riot felt completely justified in their behavior. He spoke of the hopelessness with which they all viewed their world and said that no delinquent in North Philadelphia believes he has anything to lose. He attributed this feeling of hopelessness to the fact that he and the others had never heard anything good about the neighborhood they lived in — that everything said about it was negative — that no one ever writes anything about North Philadelphia unless it's bad. He said that an emphasis on the negative intensifies the frustrations already there and that "we all have a responsibility to try to point to the positive also."

Mr. Bowser noted that, in the past few years, the press had given good publicity to the Opportunities Industrialization Center although this program did not directly involve great numbers of people. He mentioned the fact that Anti-Poverty's summer program for children reaches 300,000 youngsters yet it gets minor coverage. He said that, though this lack of coverage doesn't affect the program, it does affect the community in the sense that such publicity could give hope to the people — that the press was in a pivotal position — it could emphasize the possibility of hope or communicate that it is hopeless.

Mr. Willis Selden, Community Relations Service, Department of Justice, Washington, D. C., then spoke about some of his experiences with human relations groups and issues throughout the country. Mr. Selden noted that there are 30 to 40 cities in the country, including Philadelphia, with tension situations but that Philadelphia had better machinery to handle this problem than many of the others.

Mr. Terry C. Chisholm, executive director of the Commission on Human Relations, described a recent Commission on Human Relations study of the North Philadelphia community which revealed many similarities in the aspirations and views of the Negro and white groups in the area. He noted that these aspirations were fed by the media's reflection of our affluent society and that the disparity in the opportunities afforded minority groups to achieve these goals led to the feelings of hopelessness in the community. He said that the biggest problem is frustration, lack of hope and that the media could help alleviate this by "weaving into its daily output information about existing programs and plans, all the things that make it possible for people to have hope." He concluded, "We all must go to great pains not to have hopeless people in our society."

The meeting was then opened for discussion by Mr. Rosen.

A radio executive suggested the City had the cart before the horse and that, if the City agencies would solve the underlying problems which caused the tension situations, they would not have to worry about what the press had to say.

Mr. Bowser, in answer to this remark, commented that problems could not be solved that quickly, that no one was even sure what the solutions were but that, if we could stop inflaming the situation, we buy a little more time to arrive at solutions.

The representative of another radio station then commented that a riot was the community against the police and that the police must give respect to the community if they expect respect.

This remark prompted Mr. Irving Tranen, Community Relations Service, Department of Justice, to comment that the police are unpopular because they represent the authority of the community, and hopeless, depressed people are angry at the community. He said that the press can and is obligated to do something when it comes to an incident like the "13th and Fitzwater" situation. Mr. Tranen stated that he did not favor censorship but that, in Chicago, the media got together and voluntarily adopted basic guidelines for the handling of such incidents. He also gave his own "thumbnail" definition of a riot ("when the police have lost control of a situation"). Mr. Tranen concluded by suggesting that a committee be formed to establish, as a cooperative venture, guidelines for the Philadelphia media on the handling of such tension situations. Mr. Tranen termed this a "cooperative self-control mechanism." He also noted that, in his opinion, the Watts riot began because the people in that community wanted someone to notice them and their problems and that the message must be gotten to such people that others do care about them.

A TV newsman responded to Mr. Tranen's remarks by noting that the Chicago system had worked during the recent rioting in that city. He mentioned that an article in "Variety" reported on this.

Another member of the Philadelphia media said he had just returned from Chicago and the system worked.

The TV newsman added that the Chicago system works because the city has a central news office to act as a clearing house. He said that some sort of agreement, such as that adopted in Chicago by the media, was imperative. He noted that, when a story breaks, he often wants direction but can't get it fast enough.

A wire service official said that he thought his organization has the machinery to provide such a service.

One of the editors of a daily newspaper said that there should be some restraint until one can check the facts. He added that, if there is a riot, it's a serious situation and the news media must report what exists, not what they would like to exist, but that there is need for restraint, particularly for TV and radio since they are more immediate media than the press.

A radio commentator noted that he had broadcast an erroneous report that James Meredith had been killed. He regretted this and underscored the need for a reliable method of checking such stories.

Another participant mentioned that there was a group in Philadelphia which feeds positive stories about youngsters to the news media.

Mr. Randolph Wise (Philadelphia's Commissioner of Welfare) responded as a member of the board of "Story", the organization referred to, and said that the group's title stood for "Salute To Our Responsible Youth." He explained that the organization was created to emphasize the positive things kids were doing and was administered by the Junior League of Philadelphia which communicated the stories to the media.

Mr. Tranen again suggested that the group create a media committee that could begin to solve a problem which could become acute.

The wire service official requested that the wire services be represented on such a committee.

A major radio-TV executive said that his organization would also like to participate. He added that the Chicago system, however, was far from a panacea — that it didn't work so well because "it has forgotten media's obligation to the public which has a right to know." He concluded by stating that his group has a plan of its own — a good one — that they believe will both serve the public and have a calming influence.

Mr. Rosen stated that a media committee already existed and that the Commission on Human Relations would follow-up the suggestion for an expanded committee which could implement the proposals which had been offered.

Participants in the Mass Media Briefing Session were 10 representatives of 6 publications, 23 representatives of 13 radio and TV stations, and 17 members of voluntary and public agencies (American Jewish Committee, Zoar Methodist Church, City Government, Commission on Human Relations, Police Department, Federal Community Relations Service).

Action Due on Court Plan

By JAY JENKINS

Raleigh Bureau, The Charlotte Observer
Special to Atlanta Journal-Constitution

RALEIGH, N.C., Jan. 7—Minutes after the North Carolina General Assembly convenes on Feb. 8, a measure will be introduced calling for establishment of an intermediate court of appeals.

The new court would consist of six judges, and on the judicial ladder would be between the Superior Courts and the State Supreme Court.

NORTH CAROLINA

State Sen. Lindsay C. Warren, Jr., of Goldsboro, chairman of the N.C. Courts Commission, said the measure will propose that Gov. Dan Moore be allowed to appoint the six judges, who then would have to run for election to the eight-year terms in 1968.

CREATION of the court was authorized in a 1965 referendum. The General Assembly was given a free hand in deciding how to implement the public mandate.

Sen. Warren said there is some opposition to the idea of letting Gov. Moore appoint the judges initially. But Warren said any other course would fail to give prompt relief to the overworked justices on the Supreme Court.

Even if Moore does name the judges of the appeals court, they could not begin hearing cases until January, 1968, Warren said. Requiring them to stand for election in 1968 before making the court operative would lead to still another one-year delay, he added.

MEANWHILE, Chief Justice R. Hunt Parker of the State Supreme Court has dropped a broad hint that the sooner the new court is set up, the better. Parker said the court wound up its 1966 winter term with 105 cases still to be ruled on.

During the winter term, Parker added, a total of 276 cases plus another 134 motions and petitions were submitted to the high court. Opinions were written in 171 of the cases. Even with the seven members of the court working six days a week, he said, some of the 105 carryover cases still will be pending when the court begins its spring term on Feb. 6.

"THE N.C. Supreme Court has one of the heaviest dockets of any of the Supreme Courts in the nation," Parker said. "The Supreme Courts of California and New York will write about half the opinions that the Supreme Court of North Carolina writes."

One reason for the heavy caseload, Parker added, is that in those two big states there are various intermediate courts of appeal. Another is that every citizen of North Carolina "has a constitutional right to appeal to the Supreme Court." Some states limit appeals to certain types of cases.

For the Courts Commission, Sen. Warren indicated an effort may be made to limit appeals to the top court after the court of appeals is in operation.

"IN GENERAL," Warren said, "the Commission hopes the new court will hear questions of law that aren't novel."

That is, the new court would pass upon cases in which points of law and precedent are fairly clear and routine.

The Supreme Court would continue to get appeals from criminals condemned to die in the gas chamber for capital offenses.

"This would be the ideal situation," Warren added.

TIME TO GET FANCIER

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 (UPI)—The Post Office Department, the nation's largest tenant, is getting some fancier, more modern buildings over the next five years.

Postmaster General Lawrence F. O'Brien said that 59 new buildings would open within the next five years and an additional 102 buildings will be built within the next decade.

He said that in most of the 161 large cities handling 60 per cent of the nation's mail the post office is located in a building dating back to the 1930s, when mail volume was one-third the 80 billion pieces predicted for 1967.

North Carolina Governor Asks New Drinking Law

Special to The New York Times

RALEIGH, N. C., Feb. 9 — North Carolina's "brownbaggers" found a friend today in Gov. Dan K. Moore. The Ku Klux Klan found an enemy.

The Governor, addressing a joint session of the General Assembly, said he believed the brownbagging custom should be legalized but that he was opposed to permitting the sale of liquor by the drink.

Thus the Governor sided with persons accustomed to carrying their bottles into private clubs and restaurants and mixing their drinks there. The custom received a setback in December when the State Supreme Court ruled it illegal.

Cross-Burning Opposed

Tourist and convention interests, who have been advocating sales of liquor by the drink, said that despite the Governor's opposition they would continue to press for favorable action at this session of the legislature. With the Governor now against them, their chances have grown more remote.

Gov. Dan K. Moore

The Governor, once accused of being soft in battling the Klan, asked the assembly to enact laws that would do the following:

¶Make it a felony to burn a cross or other symbol without permission of the owner of the property on which the burning occurred.

¶Fix a minimum penalty of 10 years in prison, and a maximum of life, for bombing occupied property. Governor Moore said there was "no more dastardly crime" than this.

¶Authorize the Governor to offer rewards up to $10,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of anyone who commits a felony. The reward limit now is $400.

Dispute Over College

In June of last year, Malcolm Seawell, a former state Attorney General, resigned as chairman of the Governor's Law and Order Committee because of differences with the Governor over the handling of Klan activities.

Mr. Seawall advocated a tougher line than the state was taking at the time, saying the Klan's charter should be revoked under existing statutes.

In his speech, the Governor also stepped into the middle of a dispute over university status for East Carolina College at Greenville. The college, which has over 9,000 students, is making a strong bid for elevation to university status but insists that it should be separate from the consolidated University of North Carolina, which has branches in Chapel Hill, Raleigh, Greensboro and Charlotte.

The state has been dedicated to a one-university system since 1931.

"While all institutions must develop to the fullest, I remain convinced of the soundness and the many advantages of the one university concept," the Governor said. "It has served and continues to serve this state well and I remain determined to oppose any effort to deprive the people of North Carolina of the positive benefits of consolidation."

The Governor also said that in his budget message next Monday night he will recommend an increase of 17.58 per cent in salaries of public school teachers and 5 per cent in salaries of state employes.

Urban Planning Project Publication No. 2

A HOME OF OUR OWN

Southern Regional Council, 5 Forsyth St.,
N. W., Atlanta, Ga. 30303. Nov. 1966

INTRODUCTION

To the average family, buying a house is the most important business transaction it will ever undertake. Yet few of us have a clear understanding of all that is involved in the process. For how large a loan should one obligate oneself? What neighborhood considerations should one take into account in looking for a house; what structural considerations in the house itself? What is the meaning of such terms as equity, title deed, mortgage? This pamphlet, prepared by Mrs. Jerry Dell Gimarc of the Southern Regional Council's Urban Planning Project, attempts to answer fully, and yet in language comprehensible to the lay reader, these and many other questions related to the buying of a house.

In presenting this information we have chosen a fictionalized account of the "adventures" of a Negro family considering home ownership for the first time. The course the Walters take is the same that any buyer must pursue. The definitions of terms and the check list for deciding on a good house are the same for anyone looking for a house in any neighborhood or city. There is special emphasis on the problems and complications which may face a Negro family who find their house outside traditionally Negro neighborhoods. At the end of the pamphlet is a list of other booklets and materials which may be helpful and of interest to the prospective house buyer.

This pamphlet is a work book. The reader will notice that various check lists are provided throughout the text. The boxes in the left hand margins should be checked as each step is completed. The pamphlet is designed to be used, marked on, and made valuable as your own house-buying guide.

1 | WHY NOT BUY?

One evening after the dinner dishes were put away and the three children tucked into bed, Sue turned to Joe and asked, "Why can't we buy a house of our own?" Joe hesitated, for he had heard this question before, then replied, "Perhaps we could." And so began a long search as the Walters looked carefully at their desires, financial capability, future plans and willingness to undertake the responsibilities and costs of home ownership.

First, they wrote down the reasons why they wanted to buy.

☐ 1. MORE LIVING SPACE FOR THE MONEY THEY WERE SPENDING ON RENT. They had three growing children, and the family was probably not complete. The Walters lived in a small six-apartment unit in a two bedroom apartment; they were already feeling crowded, but apartments with enough space cost more than they could pay.

☐ 2. They wanted more PRIVACY. Their landlord, who lived nearby, dropped by too often to "look around," and the people in the other part of the apartment building were too near.

☐ 3. Sue wanted a GARDEN of her own. She could have used some ground where they were, but it didn't seem worthwhile to invest in plantings for someone else's property.

☐ 4. The Walters liked their town and intended to remain there. A house of their own would give the children a sense of STABILITY or PERMANENCY. Sue and Joe wanted to be part of a community where they felt they belonged!

☐ 5. Two of the children were already in school, but the neighborhood school was overcrowded and did not offer as much individual attention to the pupils as the Walters had hoped. In another neighborhood they believed they would find BETTER SCHOOLS.

☐ 6. Although the thought of the house as a "home" was uppermost in their minds, the Walters also considered the purchase as a sort of enforced savings, for they would be slowly building up EQUITY, or redeemable value, in the property as they paid for it over the years.

☐ 7. In the not too distant future Joe hoped to own his own small business, a garage, where he would be his own boss. He realized that the purchase of a house, with prompt and regular payments, would give him a good CREDIT RATING. When he was ready to establish his garage, he would have less trouble borrowing the money for his business.

Then the Walters made a list of the reasons why they should not buy.

☐ 1. They wanted to remain in their town, but it was quite possible that they might move out of the state in the next five years. If so, could they SELL the house quickly? If not, then they might own a house in one city and be living in another state!

☐ 2. They would have to take CARE OF THE HOUSE themselves if they owned it; would have to see about repairs, repainting, pay real estate and other taxes.

☐ 3. They would have to BUDGET carefully, making sure part of their weekly income was put aside to pay for monthly house notes. This might be difficult for a while until they got used to planning for bills and expenses on a monthly and sometimes a yearly basis.

Sue and Joe considered and reviewed the lists carefully. The list for buying was much longer and weightier than the one against, but they were concerned that they really might not be able to afford buying. They did not want to go beyond their means and fail to meet their payments. They decided they would take a careful look at their present income and expenditures to see how much they could spend on shelter. They had heard several simple formulas about how much a family could or should spend for (1) monthly house notes: 25 or 30% of the effective monthly income (the income for a month less deducted federal and state taxes, social security and retirement fund) or (2) total price: two and a half times the family yearly income. But the Walters wanted more than these simple formulas; they wanted to look closer at their own spending. To do this they made a list of their income, living expenses and obligations and gave as true a picture as they could from the records they had of the real expenditures they made for each item and of the income they could count on.

INCOME (Monthly)

Joe's Take Home Pay	$ _____
Any other steady income*	$ _____
TOTAL INCOME	$ _____

*Sue worked occasionally in a department store, but since her job wasn't steady and since she had small children at home and was still of childbearing age they did not count any income from her.

LIVING EXPENSES (Besides Housing)

Food (per month)	$ _____
Clothing (per month)	$ _____
Education (money required by children for school fees)	$ _____
Medical and dental (budgeted)	$ _____
Automobile (or other transportation) - operating expenses, repairs	$ _____
Recreation & entertainment (books, hobby supplies, newspapers, magazines, sports events, movies, etc.)	$ _____
Miscellaneous (dues to organizations, charitable contributions, church)	$ _____
Savings (as a regular item)	$ _____
Taxes (besides those deducted, such as ad valorem or property tax on autos)	$ _____
TOTAL	$ _____

FIXED OBLIGATIONS (Monthly)

Installment payments (on car, furniture, appliances, etc.)	$ _____
Other debts, payments (personal loans, debts, etc.)	$ _____
Insurance premiums (auto, theft or life - any premium not already deducted from check)	$ _____
State income tax (if not deducted)	$ _____
Retirement fund or health insurance (if not deducted)	$ _____
Miscellaneous (support of parents, alimony, child support, etc.)	$ _____
TOTAL	$ _____

To figure monthly expenses from weekly figures, Sue and Joe multiplied the weekly figure by fifty-two (for the number of weeks in a year) and divided by twelve (for the number of months).

$$\text{Monthly} = \frac{\text{weekly x 52}}{12}$$

Sue and Joe added their fixed obligations to their living expenses and got a total which was their total monthly expenditures besides housing expenses. They subtracted this total from their total income. The difference was what they had per month for housing expenses.

TOTAL MONTHLY EXPENSES (besides housing)		$————
FIXED MONTHLY OBLIGATIONS	+	$————
TOTAL MONTHLY EXPENDITURES		$————
TOTAL MONTHLY INCOME		$————
TOTAL MONTHLY EXPENDITURES	—	$————
HOUSING MONEY PER MONTH		$————

The housing money had to include:
MORTGAGE LOAN — Principal and interest
Plus Mortgage Insurance Premium (if FHA loan)
Hazard Insurance Premium
Taxes and any special assessments
Estimated maintenance and repairs
Estimated utilities — heat, light, water, air conditioning

Sue and Joe decided that in the next week they would learn what all the words meant — mortgage, interest, principal, equity, and so on.

They learned these definitions:

☐ 1. LOAN — the money they would have to borrow to buy a house; the money lent them either by a lending institution alone or lent by a lending institution and secured (underwritten) by the Veterans Administration or Federal Housing Administration for buying a house.

☐ 2. INTEREST — the fee they would have to pay the lending institution for the loan; the amount of money they would be charged for using the money borrowed. The interest was usually given as a per cent, like 5½% or 6%, and meant they must pay that per cent each year for the amount of money borrowed for the number of years borrowed.

☐ 3. PRINCIPAL — the sum borrowed. When the borrower repays the loan, he pays each month a certain amount for the interest on the money lent and the rest on the principal, or the money borrowed. (Some payments also include small amounts for taxes and insurance.) At first, most of the monthly payment is taken up by the interest on the loan and only a small amount goes to pay back the money borrowed. The amount each month which must go to interest declines over the years of the loan as the principal is repaid. Each month a little more of the monthly payment is applied to pay the principal, and the owner's equity thus increases.

☐ 4. DOWN PAYMENT — the money given as partial payment for the house at the time of purchase.

☐ 5. MORTGAGE — agreement for a long-term loan where the lender has a claim on the property as security for the money he has lent and may foreclose, or take back the property, if the borrower does not pay the amount borrowed according to a time schedule.

☐ 6. EQUITY — the actual dollars and cents value that an owner has in his home — in effect, his investment — once all fees and charges against his property have been paid.

☐ 7. TITLE DEED — legal document stating that a piece of property belongs to the owner and was transferred to him from the previous owner with no legitimate claim remaining unsatisfied. When real estate is sold an investigation of the records must be made to show that the seller really owns the property, that it is without debts or ownership claims on the property.

☐ 8. TITLE INSURANCE — insurance to make sure that the lender does not lose money if the title to a property is defective. This insurance provides funds to defend the insured title against any claims (such as a forged deed or an undisclosed heir) and to pay the insured party (the lender, and at a small additional cost the buyer, can also be covered) against loss. This insurance cost is paid only once, at the time of sale, and is a per cent of the sales price.

☐ 9. HAZARD INSURANCE — insurance against fire, wind storm and other specified natural hazards. This is usually part of the payment to the lender each month.

☐ 10. TAXES AND SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS — property owners must pay real estate taxes which are based on the appraised value of the property. These taxes pay for schools, civic improvements, parks, etc. Usually, they, too, are part of the monthly payment to the lender. He charges the borrower part of the tax month by month, accumulates it, then pays the tax on the property for the borrower when it falls due.

☐ 11. CLOSING COSTS — these are a number of items which are charged to the buyer at the time of purchase. Often they are unexpected, and they must be paid for in cash. They include the cost of title insurance and the amount of hazard insurance premium due for the remainder of the year, the amount of real estate tax due for the remainder of the year, recording fees which are charged by state and and sometimes city offices to record the change of ownership, recording tax fees for states which require revenue stamps (tax stamps) to be placed on the documents filed. Besides these charges are the fees the lending institution may demand for the services of experts used to check items for borrower before he is lent money — title search or the check to see that the title to the property is in good order, property survey or the check on the dimensions of the property the lender may lend his money on, appraisal of the value of the property to guide the lender in deciding how much to lend, personal credit report on the borrower to see if he is a good credit risk, has a steady job and pays his debts. A fee for the outside lawyer who is attending to the seller's interest may be charged to the buyer. The buyer's own lawyer's bill is in addition and does not usually appear at closing.

The Walters were staggered by all the complicated terms, but gradually, after studying them for a while, they began to feel more comfortable with the definitions. One thing they were terribly curious about was how much the closing costs would be since they had to be paid for in CASH at the time the mortgage agreement was signed, and this was in addition to the CASH required for the down payment. They found these costs depended on the property and its locality but that the CLOSING COSTS are a per cent of the cost of the house. They usually range between 3 to 5 per cent. This varies according to the location of the house and the custom of the neighborhood. Who pays the costs can be negotiated. The seller may agree to pay some of them. The terms of payment can be established prior to the closing of the sale. The buyer's lawyer should check these terms and costs to get the best possible terms for his client.

After considerable discussion Sue and Joe thought they would be able to buy if they could find a modestly priced house and get a good loan. They had saved $1,500.00 which they could use for down payment and closing costs. Now they began to find out the difference between the three types of loans — conventional, FHA, and VA.

CONVENTIONAL LOANS — two-party loans between the borrower and lender. The "security" the borrower offers is the house he is buying and his own value as a credit risk, as a person who can and will repay the money lent. Usually the terms of a conventional loan are more conservative than for FHA or VA. This means that these loans require a larger down payment, sometimes a higher interest rate, and often are for shorter terms than in the other two classes. Conventional loans have more flexible terms. For people who are able to make a down payment of several thousand dollars they are easier to get. These loans are obtainable through banks, savings and loan associations, insurance companies and mortgage bankers. FHA and VA loans may also be obtained at the same places.

FHA LOANS — a three-party agreement. Besides the borrower and lender (as with a conventional loan) the Federal Housing Administration, a government agency, is involved. The FHA tells the lender that in addition to the borrower's credit rating and house it will offer further security for the loan by insuring the lender against the loss he might incur if the borrower does not live up to the loan agreement.

The borrower, however, is charged ½ of 1% more for this insurance. This money goes into a common pool to pay the losses when borrowers default. This additional security often enables the borrower to get a larger loan than he could ordinarily. At present the borrower, if approved, could get a loan for all but three per cent of the total price of the house. This means that up to a $15,000 loan, a borrower might have to pay only 3% as down payment. And in some cases the time allowed for repayment may be up to 40 years. The rate of interest which can be charged for the loan is usually smaller than for a conventional loan. A family, then, with little ready cash could buy a house under this type of loan.

VA LOANS — also a three-party agreement. This time the Veterans Administration guarantees repayment of part (60%) of the loan up to a maximum of $7,500.00. This extra guarantee means as with FHA that the lender may be willing to lend more than he would for a conventional loan. Also, the VA requires no down payment, if this is satisfactory with the lender. But not everyone can qualify for a VA loan. One must have served in the U. S. Armed Forces during World War II, the Korean War, or since January, 1955.

The FHA-insured or VA-guaranteed loans must be applied for at the time of application for a loan from a lending institution. FHA and VA do not lend money directly (there are some exceptions for VA), but they do guarantee loans from lending institutions under the special conditions mentioned above. The borrower fills out an FHA or VA application form when he applies for a loan. These applications are usually available at the lending institutions. (For comparison of the different types of loans, see the chart at the back of the book.)

The Walters studied their finances and the possibilities of getting a satisfactory loan and decided they would be able to afford to buy without undue stress on their present budget. Although they were paying a good deal for shelter, they felt that with their small regular savings for emergencies they could accept the responsibility of home ownership and long-term debt with little likelihood of defaulting or being unable to make payments, and they knew they would keep their house in good condition, well-maintained at all times. They had talked to enough FHA people and loan people to know that if they couldn't make payments and their house was repossessed they would find it very difficult to get a loan ever again. This then was a serious step for them, but one they felt was reasonable and justified.

But now that they had decided they would buy if they could find a house which suited them they began to wonder how to locate "their" house and how to tell if it were a good buy when they found a place which appealed to them.

2 | THE SEARCH

Early the next Sunday morning Sue and Joe grabbed the paper, got out a map of town, found pencil and paper and began looking through the classified section for "Houses for Sale." They decided they would become acquainted with what was available in all sections of the city for several weeks, go through some of the houses, drive by others, so they would get used to "looking." They read the ads and prices, checked the locations on the map, bundled the children into the car and set off.

They first wanted to look at the location of the houses. Joe had made up a check list of things the location of "their" house must have and Sue had added a few items of her own. They drove and looked and checked— "a" for excellent, "b" for good, "c" for fair and "d" for bad — each location according to these needs:

☐ 1. NEIGHBORHOOD

What did the other houses look like, were they nicely kept, was the house they were interested in the best of the group or one of the less impressive in the area? (They had read that it was better to buy a less expensive house in a good neighborhood than the best house in a poorer neighborhood, at least as far as resale value was concerned.)

☐ 2. NEARNESS TO WORK AND GOOD TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES

Sue sometimes needed the Walters' car to run errands; Joe didn't want to live on the other side of town from the large repair shop where he was depended on as foreman mechanic. He wanted to be able to reach his job by public transportation without spending several hours going back and forth.

- Was there a bus running near-by?
- What was its schedule?
- Would it take Sue to town quickly and conveniently at non-rush hours?

☐ 3. GOOD SCHOOLS

To both the Walters it was very important to know where the nearest grade school was and what sort of program it had.

- Was it overcrowded?

- Were its teachers well-qualified and interested in their teaching and their pupils (according to other parents in the neighborhood)?
- How far away was the high school and what sort of place was it? (After all, the children grew so fast.)
- Could the children walk to school without crossing streets with heavy traffic?

☐ 4. CHURCH
Sue wanted to make sure a church of their denomination was near so that the family could be involved in weekday activities as well as Sunday services.

☐ 5. CONVENIENTLY LOCATED SHOPPING AREAS
Sue would prefer being able to walk to local stores. Until they could afford a washing machine she would have to take the clothes to the laundromat. Was there one nearby?

☐ 6. RECREATION AREAS
The children would soon need a park or playground for games and activities.
- Were there any in the area?
- Could they be reached by the children without danger from heavily trafficked streets?
- Were these areas well lighted in the evenings and properly cared for by the city?

☐ 7. AWAY FROM HEAVILY TRAVELED STREETS
- Was the house protected from the noise and dust created by heavy traffic?
- Could the children walk to their activities without undue danger?

Sue and Joe found houses in several neighborhoods which got many more "a's" than "b's" and no "d's" at all. The following weeks were devoted to intensified examination of the houses offered for sale in the classified section of the paper. The Walters also contacted a real estate agent, told him their problems, price range and approximate neighborhood. They looked at many houses and from their experiences drew up yet another checklist to mark "a," "b," "c," and "d" for houses.

☐ 1. FLOOR PLAN—The Walters were looking for a house with a quiet area for sleeping set off from the rest of the house and buffered from the noises of other activities (by closets or halls). They wanted an area for entertaining and family activities (the living room and perhaps a dining room or den) which would allow these activities to proceed undisturbed by constant traffic to other rooms. They wanted adequate work space—the kitchen and a place for Joe to work on cars and keep his tools screened and private from the street and neighbors. They could find how well a house took care of these needs by drawing a floor plan and marking off the different areas in different colors. This showed easily how one area related to another and which areas overlapped. Sue and Joe wanted to make sure that the bathroom (or rooms) and kitchen could be reached from other rooms without going through bedrooms (a continuing disturbance in their present apartment).

☐ 2. ADEQUATE PLUMBING—Certainly Joe was not an expert and could not check pipes and the whole plumbing system, but he could and did apply simple tests to check water pressure by turning on the water in the bathroom lavatory, then flushing the commode. If the pressure fell there was not adequate water pressure. Joe also inquired about the water heater; he knew with his family of five he needed a 50-gallon tank, especially since they hoped to be able to afford an automatic washer soon and would need extra hot water. Joe asked about the guarantee on the heater, too; he knew it was false economy to put in a cheap heater which would soon give out. Some of the houses the Walters looked at were in new suburbs which did not have connections with the city sewerage system and were equipped instead with their own septic tanks. Joe always asked about this point, knowing that a septic tank poorly placed or inadequately drained or too small for its load was a danger to the whole neighborhood and especially to the people it serves. He decided he would contact the local health officer if he was seriously interested in one of these suburban houses and have him check the water and the septic tank.

☐ 3. ELECTRIC SYSTEM—In their present apartment the Walters had had trouble with fuses blowing frequently. They knew they had used too many electrical appliances for the current, but they needed each item. Their OWN house must have enough wiring. Joe read that the minimum wiring standard currently being recommended by builders and electricians calls for 100-amp service that offers both 129- and 240-volt circuits and a basic capacity of 24,000 watts. This would be quite adequate for their small appliances and even a window air-conditioner in the bedroom window. When they inspected a house Joe went to the main service panel (where the wiring enters the house), opened it and counted the fuses or circuit breakers. If he found only six he knew the electrical capacity would be no better than in their apartment. Even eight fuses were only a little better. Sometimes the capacity rating was written on the panel. Joe decided he would call an electric utility representative or an electrician to check the capacity for him when they thought they had found THEIR house. While Joe was looking at the fuse box Sue was counting the electrical outlets in each room. One, she knew from experience, was not enough. It was dangerous as well as inconvenient to string extension cords all over the room from the one plug. In their dining room it was even worse because appliances had to be plugged into extension cords hanging from the light socket.

Two outlets would be an absolute minimum in each room and four should be the norm. Joe pointed out that increased outlets only was no relief from blown fuses without increased amperage (current). Joe hoped the house they chose would have an outdoor self-grounding electrical outlet for power tools, one that was covered to protect it from weather and children. He liked to work outside, doing odd jobs and working on cars; an outside plug would be a real convenience.

☐ 4. SOUND ROOF—Although Joe was not a roofing expert, he could and did look for ordinary signs of wear. Dry, cracked asphalt on the roof meant a new roof would be required soon. He also checked the flashing (metal strip around the chimney and at the place where different roof planes meet such as at the junction of roof and gable) to see whether it was visible and in good repair. Joe knew that most roof leaks occur at the flashing points when the flashing is not tight. Joe looked for rain gutters and down spouts and their condition. At the point where the down spout lets water out to the ground the best provision is a gutter which directs the water into the street, but the minimum is a splash block or concrete scoop which splashes the water off and away from the house. Letting the water run along the ground with no other provision for drainage meant erosion in the yard or standing puddles to breed mosquitoes and undermine the foundation of the house.

☐ 5. PROPER DRAINAGE OF LAND—Joe knew from experience that lowlying land, improperly drained, caused disagreeable consequences for the houses located on it. Besides the mosquitoes and probable termites there was constant mud (which the children played in and Sue scrubbed up). Grass and flowers wouldn't grow well. And the water against the house kept the wood damp; damp wood rotted. Joe was so concerned that the house they bought have proper drainage he made a point of checking the land around houses they were interested in after the rains. Joe did not accept the assurances of house owners or real estate agents.

☐ 6. DRY BASEMENT—In a few houses the Walters were shown basements. This was not common construction, but they could see some advantages for it. It could be used for storage, for a children's playroom, and it would be cool and comfortable in the summer. They checked the walls for tell-tale signs of moisture and checked the walls again after a rain. They asked neighbors if they had had trouble with their basements. And finally they looked carefully, inside and out, to see whether there were any high water marks. Sue remembered faintly that she had read of water backing up from a creek into one residential section of the town; was this the one?

☐ 7. SOUND FLOORS—In the rooms with wooden floors Sue and Joe walked carefully all around, looking for boards which seemed loose, looking for signs of moisture and heavy wear, trying to determine the slant (an indication of the settling of the house), trying to feel for soft spots in the floor which might indicate a bad brace. They attempted the same survey on the floors covered in vinyl tile, noting especially any places where the tile was loose or where the adhesive oozed through. Then they stepped back to see if the different flooring materials created a harmonious effect with each floor flowing into the next rather than every room having a different floor.

☐ 8. CONVENIENT ARRANGEMENT OF THE KITCHEN—While Joe looked over the roof and basement, Sue cast a critical eye over the kitchen since that was where she would be spending a great deal of her time. She wanted a place which would be large enough for the family to have room to eat in and one where she could look out the windows and keep an eye on the children playing. She looked to see if there were plenty of cabinets and if she could reach them without climbing on the kitchen stool each time she needed a muffin tin. Sue played cook in the kitchens of the houses they were interested in, trying out the "work triangle" or the path from sink to stove to refrigerator and back. She tried how the refrigerator door would fit, opened cabinets and drawers to see how much they interfered with one another. And she looked for adequate ventilation. She knew an open window simply didn't function well enough to take away cooking odors and heat. She had vowed that in her new house she would have an exhaust fan in her kitchen. Finally she made an especially careful check for electrical outlets. She liked to play the radio while she worked in the kitchen and it would be an inconvenience if she had to unplug it every time she used the toaster, or the electric iron.

☐ 9. ROOM FOR FUTURE GROWTH—Sue and Joe together stood back from the houses they were considering and thought where they might add another bedroom in five years or so, or possibly a large family room. They wanted their house to be able to grow with them as their family increased and as the children's demands for space increased with age. The Walters realized that what seemed enough land was not always the deciding factor for there were ordinances and zoning laws which restricted building which was too close to the street or too close to the property line. They decided they must find out about these laws for any house they thought they might buy.

After five weeks of looking at houses, Sue and Joe became very observant "lookers" and the children bored travelers. The family almost despaired of finding a suitable place already built. Sue and Joe began investigating building their house themselves. Their first question was where to find the sort of plans they might like. They discovered they had several courses.

1. ARCHITECT — His plans would be drawn up to fit their own unique needs as they explained them to him. This would take some time and a specific understanding of their needs and desires themselves plus the ability to express them specifically to the architect. The architect would continue submitting plans until all changes had been made and the plans accepted. This was time consuming for architect and client. They found that architects ordinarily would not take jobs for houses on budgets as limited as theirs. The architect must spend many hours drawing the plans, and he is paid a per cent, 8% to 15%, of the total cost of the house. Since they wanted to spend about $10,000 to $12,000 on the house it was uneconomical for an architect to take the job.

2. STOCK PLANS—These are plans drawn up by an architect and mass produced and distributed. They are available through government agencies, home and garden magazines, building material supply houses, lending institutions, builders' magazines, department stores, furniture stores and home plan services. The Walters looked through several plan books and found a plan they liked. They considered sending off for it. The cost of one set of drawings was $30 to $35. The drawings consisted of a set of blueprints, four to eight sheets showing the floor plan, foundation plan, all four elevations, the roof and wall framing schemes and various construction details. Generally included with the blueprints are a list of specifications (telling how deep to make the foundation piers, temperature when pouring concrete, etc.), a list of materials needed, and directions on doing the actual work. Sometimes there is also a blank contract which could be used for the agreement between builder and contractor. As Sue and Joe studied further the possibility of building they were a little hesitant because they felt they knew so little about it. They learned, for instance, that the lot they bought must be perfectly level if ready-made plans were used; if it were not there might be complications when altering the foundation plans. They were afraid to pick the plan and the contractor and then oversee the construction. They wanted to be able to look at the house as a finished product before buying.

3. READY-BUILT HOUSE — A friend suggested that one alternative might be to buy in a subdivision where the builder was showing model homes. Here the Walters could look at a house like the one which would be built for them. The friend cautioned them, however, that when looking at the model, they should look beyond the glamour, find out how much space they really had, how many of the fancy appliances and light fixtures came with the house and which were extras—and besides that, if they were truly interested, get all the specifications down in writing. He also advised them to inspect the building lot rather than picking it blindly off a subdivision map. They began to look at the builders' homes and seriously considered buying one of them.

While looking at these homes they found that this particular subdivision was financed by FHA and that both FHA and VA required builders to conform to certain standard specifications before they would insure the builder's loan. During construction of these houses FHA or VA officials make inspections to see that they are built according to plans filed with FHA or VA and according to the government specifications. This doesn't mean that the federal government is guaranteeing that the home will be satisfactory in every way, but only that it must conform to minimum building requirements. The owner's main reliance must be on the reputation and integrity of the builder chosen to build the house.

3 | CLOSING THE DEAL

Three more months of looking passed before the Walters found THEIR house. At least they thought it was the perfect house for their family; it seemed to pass all the tests they had created for judging houses. But they wondered if perhaps they were compromising or lowering their standards because they were tired of looking. Before making their final decision, before putting up "EARNEST MONEY" (the payment which said, "Hold the house for me till I see if I can get a loan"), they wisely decided to contract for a lawyer. They had never before needed any legal help, and they were wary of being tricked by an unscrupulous lawyer. They had heard stories about such people. In the neighborhood where they were living they knew there was a Legal Aid Office, so they went to it. Since their income was above the level which would allow them to be eligible for free service, the Legal Aid Office could not help them itself. It could and did, however, give them a list of names of reputable attorneys who would be willing to advise them for a reasonable fee. The Legal Aid Office told them that they were very wise in requesting this advice now. Their office had many clients who came in for help AFTER they had signed a contract —at a point when Legal Aid could be of no help since the agreement was already signed. Sue and Joe found a pleasant and patient attorney who told them that he would be happy to help them with the technicalities of home purchase. They arranged in advance what his fee would be, and the lawyer agreed to payments spread over three months.

Sue and Joe followed these precautions before deciding on their home:

☐ 1. LAWYER—They retained (or hired) an attorney to look after their interests. The lawyer made his own title search to double check the one made by the lending institution. He looked over the Walters' preliminary purchase agreement to buy the property, making sure that there was a clause which said their money would be returned in case they could not get the necessary loan. He drafted their loan note and mortgage since it was not done by the lender, but he would have examined the mortgage had it been drafted by the lender. And on the final day of the signing of the mortgage papers, he attended the meetings as the buyer's representative and read and approved all documents before the Walters signed. The cost of such services depends on the locality; sometimes it is 1% of the total sale price. Joe wisely inquired first so that he would be prepared for this bill which was separate from the bill presented at closing of the transaction.

☐ 2. TITLE SEARCH — The examination of records and documents concerning previous ownership to make certain that the title (or deed of ownership) to the property does not have any debts against it. This is ordinarily part of the fee presented by the lending institution at closing and a necessary prelude to obtaining the title insurance which is usually required by the lender. The cost ranges between $50.00 to $100.00 and may be listed as part of the cost of the title insurance.

☐ 3. TITLE INSURANCE — The Walters knew they would have to pay a certain amount for insurance to protect the lender from loss should the title to the property prove defective because of a prior claim even after the most careful search. As they inquired about this insurance they realized that their part of the equity (that portion of the property they paid for through down payment and later increased by paying on the loan) would not be insured in this insurance. If a claim were brought, and the court did not rule in their favor, they would lose all they had invested. The Walters also found that it did not cost much more to buy additional insurance with the same company to cover their own equity. The insurance, which is paid only once and is part of the closing costs or lender's fees, usually runs several hundred dollars.

☐ 4. PROPERTY SURVEY — Ordinarily this is a part of the requirements of the lender and is billed to the borrower as part of his costs at closing. The land surveyor checks the boundary lines of the property to make sure they coincide with the description on the deed. He also determines whether the buildings are set back from the street and property lines the distance required by community law. The lender will insist that this be done before agreeing to lend the money, and Joe wanted to be sure that the land and house he intended to buy was the property which belonged with the contract. Survey fees range from $30 to $75.

☐ 5. APPRAISER — If the loan is FHA or VA underwritten, then government appraisers will look at the property and decide what is a fair evaluation of the property's worth. By law these valuations must be made known to the purchaser. Conventional lenders also have the property appraised and its value as a long-term investment determined. The amount they lend will depend on this appraisal and their limitation by law of per-cent-of-value (such as 80% of evaluation for a $15,000 home). These appraisals are not made known to the borrower-buyer although the fee for the appraisal is generally part of the closing costs. The FHA appraisal fee is paid by the seller. For a conventional loan, the charge, if any, is usually part of a general "lending charge." It may be that a first-time buyer like the Walters—or even an often-time buyer—may want to hire his own appraiser from a private firm to look over the property, inside and out. The appraiser considers neighborhood stability, analyzes the present housing market by checking the price of houses sold in the area recently after inspecting them and comparing them with the house the buyer is interested in and the price he is being asked for it. Sue and Joe felt that it would be money well spent to hire an appraiser. They found that for a detailed analysis the price range would probably be $75 to $100 and for a less detailed study about $30. The man they hired was an experienced appraiser who belonged to the Society of Residential Appraisers; he was also a member of the Appraisal Institute. They made certain that he was a member of these organizations; the Walters had been told that such men were usually reasonable and well-trained professionals who knew their business. They found out about these organizations by asking questions of real estate agents and at a near-by consumer education facility.

☐ 6. EXPERT'S ADVICE — Joe was still concerned about aspects of the house which required an expert's eye to evaluate. How sound was it structurally? Was the roof in good condition? What was the state of the plumbing and electrical wiring? He learned that an architect might be able to answer these questions. Joe's attorney suggested he ask the local branch of the American Institute of Architects, the Chamber of Commerce or various lending institutions to recommend architects to make this survey. He was able to locate a willing and well-thought-of architect who agreed to the fee of $15.00 per hour for his inspection. The architect looked at the exterior and landscaping as well as basic construction (foundation, beams, roof supports, flooring, windows, doors, insulation, wiring, plumbing and floor plan). Joe could have engaged for a small fee separate roof, electrical and flooring experts to do the same sort of job the architect did. He decided on the architect for his own convenience. Although Joe's lawyer said that the payment of the fees was negotiable with the seller, Joe said and his lawyer agreed that it was better to have the experts on the buyer's payroll where their opinions would not be influenced by another's interest.

☐ 7. TERMITE INSPECTION — To make sure that the house was free from termites the Walters contacted an exterminating company which gave the house a free inspection. It was agreed that if termites were found the seller would pay the exterminating fee, which generally amounted to several hundred dollars, and contract for permanent bonding. The permanent bond meant the exterminating company would check for termites each year for a small continuing fee.

While the Walters were paying for advice from various people with specific training, they had set up for themselves a check list to make their own inquiries about their possible future home and its neighborhood.

☐ 1. ZONING — Sue was concerned about the zoning regulations for the neighborhood, whether they allowed for industrial sites, businesses and construction of multi-family dwellings. Besides that she wanted to know for herself how far back from the street property had to be set, whether it would be possible for Joe to have an office or small workshop at home when the time came for setting up his own business, and what, if any, other restrictions were on the use of the property. To find out about zoning, Sue first had to get the "legal description" of the property which means the lot number and addition. She finally found that she could get this "legal description" either from a copy of the tax receipt (which the seller had) or by calling the local auditor's office or city engineer and giving him the street address of the house they wanted to buy. Once she had the "legal description," Sue called the city zoning office (or planning commission) which gave her the regulations applicable to the property the Walters were considering buying. Sue also asked in the neighborhood whether these zoning regulations were strictly enforced or whether people with political influence could obtain special exceptions. She was glad to find that the property was protected by uniform application of the regulations.

☐ 2. FREEWAY CONSTRUCTION — With "legal description" in hand Sue went to the local planning commission and asked about future highway construction in that area. She inquired further about city plans for urban renewal areas, municipal facility construction, school construction and university expansion, anything which might affect the neighborhood where they wanted to buy. Although the planning commission couldn't guarantee that the neighborhood would be untouched for the next twenty-five years, Sue could see that they were working on plans which might take effect five or ten years from now. Their house seemed safe for the next ten years; none of the plans related to their neighborhood.

☐ 3. PROPERTY TAXES — The seller was willing when asked to show the Walters his tax statements which showed the amount of city and county property taxes he had paid in recent years, but to check once more Sue took the "legal description" with her and went to the tax offices (there turned out to be more than one). She asked about the tax rate, what use the taxes were put to in that area and what new facilities were being planned which would require new tax levies. From this trip she found that it would be likely that property taxes would rise in the next few years to pay for building a new school with an attached park.

☐ 4. CITY SERVICES — Sue asked the seller and neighbors about how efficient the garbage pick-up was and how it was paid for, about the sewage service and how it was supported; she checked street lights and inquired if broken or burnt-out lights were quickly repaired or replaced. She found where the nearest fire station was and how large the area was it had to serve. She located the nearest police precinct and asked neighbors if police protection were routine and satisfactory. After collecting answers from the seller and neighbors Sue called the various city services and inquired directly.

☐ 5. UTILITIES — From the seller Sue found what the approximate bills were per month for gas, electricity and water; then she checked with the utility companies to find what their rate per unit was for that neighborhood. The Walters wanted to know as definitely as possible what their monthly expenditures would be for utilities so they could budget accordingly.

☐ 6. INSURANCE — Joe knew that the lender required "hazard insurance," and he was curious about the rates for this insurance from various companies. The lender had suggested that the insurance be bought from a certain company, apparently an affiliated company, but Joe decided he would see if he could get the same coverage elsewhere for less. This was his privilege. Joe also wanted his own equity in the house covered and not just that part of the value of the house which was the lender's. Joe found that different locations meant different insurance rates—that the distance from the house to the nearest fire hydrant, the location and service area of the nearest fire station, and the construction of the house (frame, brick or stone) along with other factors all had a part in determining this rate. Joe also found that with just a little added to the monthly premiums for hazard insurance he could have a "homeowner's policy" which included not only fire and wind insurance but also insurance on personal belongings and insurance to cover liability for injuries others might suffer while on the Walters' property. Joe was still able to have the insurance premium prepaid as part of the monthly note on the house.

After checking off all these questions, Sue and Joe felt they had a pretty good idea of the true state of the house they wanted to buy, how much it would cost to live there and what might happen to the neighborhood over the next ten years or so. Finally they took a good hard look at the prospects of continued maintenance. They knew they would have to set aside a little each month for the maintenance jobs when they came. Fortunately, Joe was handy with tools and could do many repair jobs himself, but they knew the house would have to be repainted every few years for the house was frame, not brick. The yard needed some additional landscaping, and they would have to buy gardening tools. The roof would have to be replaced within the next ten years, and parts of the interior would soon need repainting.

All of this would not be cheap. And they had no intention of falling for the sales talk of the bogus repairmen who tricked people out of their money and sometimes their homes by pretending they would make repairs for little money and long terms but actually doing no work and taking the money. Joe said when they needed help on repairs for the house they would go to an old and established firm—after they had checked its reputation and called to see if there were any complaints filed against it with the Better Business Bureau.

With that last thought about the responsibilities for maintenance the Walters were ready to go ahead with the sale. They signed the preliminary sales papers and made their partial down payment (the "earnest money" which would be applied to the full down payment once the loan was approved) AFTER THEIR ATTORNEY HAD LOOKED OVER THE PAPERS. They applied for and secured an FHA-insured loan; they could not afford a very large down payment.

On the big day for the final settlement, the seller and his attorney met with the Walters and their attorney and the lender. The Walters' attorney read over the mortgage agreement and loan note and advised them to sign both. This done, the lender handed the seller a large check. Then a list of closing costs was presented to the Walters which included:

— fee for recording the deed
— fee for registering the title — fee for recording the mortgage
— real estate transfer tax
— part of real estate tax remaining for the rest of the year (if prepaid by the seller)
— part of insurance payments for the remainder of the year (if prepaid by the seller) — gas or water bills (that part, if any, prepaid by the seller)
— title insurance (includes charge for title search; the premium is paid only once) — mortgage service charge (charge to pay for such expenses as inspections, preparing loan papers, lender's attorney's services, photographs, notary fees, processing fees, commission and such overhead as stationery and postage); usually 1% to 2½% of the sum borrowed — property survey (to determine lot lines and usually required by lender)
— credit report (required by lender with charge passed on to borrower; cost about $10.00 for long-term residents of a town).

In total the closing costs for the Walters were about $500.00. They paid them along with the rest of the down payment from their savings and were told that the house would be theirs—in only 25 more years!

That evening the Walters celebrated with just the family. They had worked hard to select a house which would serve their needs, retain its value over the years of the loan and afterwards, grow with the family and be sound and comfortable and pretty. They had found such a house, they believed, and now it was theirs. Certainly, they knew they would have to be responsible, keep the house well painted and repaired, make their monthly payments on time. All this would mean careful budgeting. But they had considered the disadvantages and demands in advance and were willing to devote the time, thought and money required of home owners for the sake of a better home.

4 | BREAKING BARRIERS

After the Walters were settled in their new home they were considered local experts on house buying among their old friends. When asked for advice, when friends wondered if they should expect any trouble if they bought or built in a neighborhood of another race, Sue and Joe gave them some suggestions. They understood the problems since they, too, were Negroes.

1. Although there is not a national fair housing law which requires that a seller not discriminate against a prospective buyer because of race or color, creed or national origin, there are some houses which must be sold on a non-discriminatory basis. These houses are those which have received FHA or VA assistance in construction (one-or two-family dwellings which have been occupied by the owner are not under this ruling) or those which have FHA or VA financing. The FHA or VA repossessed houses are often good buys. Anyone interested can obtain a list of properties acquired by FHA for resale in their state by contacting their state FHA office. For VA repossessed houses the buyer must contact a real estate agent to learn which properties are available.

2. Sometimes builders and sellers try to impose a "color tax" on non-white buyers. Checking to determine the truth of suspected discriminatory treatment could be organized through the state Council on Human Relations or the nearest Urban League office. After an interested Negro couple looked at a house, learned whether it was for sale, what price was asked, what financing terms were suggested by the seller, they would turn this information over to their white checking couple. This couple would give information very similar to that given by the Negro couple as to number in family, job, length of time working, financing needs, housing requirements, age, etc. The white couple, giving the seller this similar information, would then find out if the house were for sale, the price, financing, etc. If the answers varied considerably for the two couples, then their careful documentation of the questions, answers and treatment might constitute a strong case to prove that discrimination existed or that a "color tax" (higher price for the Negro prospective buyer) was being exacted. This information would only be useful directly for that property which is under the President's Executive Order 11063 forbidding discrimination in government aided or financed housing.

3. If the seller or builder or lender is seen to be discriminating where there is a legal basis to sustain a complaint, those being discriminated against should write the regional VA or FHA office, the national VA or FHA office, the regional U. S. Commission on Civil Rights and the state Advisory Committee to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights. Any results follow long delays and continued prodding by the aggrieved party; even if no action is taken in time to assure that the minority group buyer is able to buy the property against which the complaint was filed, the complaint will probably make it easier for a Negro to buy similar property next time.

4. It may be that the neighborhood in which the Negro homeseeker is interested is hostile to minority groups. If so, some precautions Negroes might take are:

A. Do not appear too interested in the house you are looking at. Intense interest might cause panic in the neighborhood and give these people a chance to unite for disagreeable hostility. Instead, if a Negro homeseeker is interested, it might allay fears to have a white appraiser or white friend make the careful inspection of the house.

B. Engage a lawyer when serious looking and/or consideration of property begins. Forward all papers or information received to this lawyer. Have your lawyer make a careful title search; make sure the property survey is carried out and all checks possible on the property are made. The lawyer should examine carefully the preliminary sales agreement, the sales agreement and the agreement with the lender. These transactions must be as tightly drawn as possible.

C. If the house is not subject to the non-discriminatory directives of FHA and VA, then it may be necessary to use the services of a white friend to act as decoy buyer. In this case, he could buy the house himself for a price agreed on in advance with his Negro friend, who would become the owner by assuming the loan. The first buyer should first be released from liability for the loan; this places the full responsibility for repayment on the shoulders of the Negro buyer just as if he had contracted to buy the house from the initial owner.

D. Once the house is purchased and it appears that there is hostility in the neighborhood, notify the local law enforcement officials of any fears so that they may provide protection of property and person. In areas where the local police have not given equal protection to Negroes, then it would be wise to notify the nearest state and federal officials. It is unlikely that these officers will provide actual protection, but they would be alerted to the possibility of violence. Although violence is less likely now than in the past, even in the South, the new Negro resident in a predominantly white neighborhood should be prepared for its eventuality. Besides law enforcement authorities the new home-owner should contact the nearest Council on Human Relations or similar group and clergymen in the new neighborhood. The clergy especially could be of great help in reducing tension.

E. On moving day, use a moving van if at all possible. It costs more than the move-it-yourself method, but movers can move the new family much quicker, and the van out front gives a look of stability and ordinariness to the operation. The first job inside the house should be to put up some kind of curtain over the windows to cut out curious neighborhood watchfulness. Once this is done, continue the unpacking operations quietly and proceed with ordinary activities, staying indoors if possible.

F. In the following weeks, entertain a minimum of visitors. Give the neighbors time to get used to the new family. White friends, clergy or white members of the local Council on Human Relations (bringing their children along to play) should call and be seen going in and out of the house. This could do much to relieve neighbors' fears and establish a pattern of behavior for the neighborhood.

Sue and Joe were glad to make these suggestions. They were not meant to alarm their friends or discourage them from moving into a neighborhood of another race. The Walters felt that they had a right to live where they could find the best housing for the money they could spend, in a neighborhood which best fitted their needs. If the neighborhood happened to be white, they knew difficulties could arise, and they thought ahead about how to cope with them.

HERE'S HOW HOME LOANS COMPARE

	FHA LOANS	VA LOANS	CONVENTIONAL LOANS
What's the interest rate?	Currently 5¾%. With the ½% premium for FHA insurance, you pay an effective rate of 6¼%. On loans of $8,000 or less, there may be a service charge, too, up to ½%.	Currently 5¾%.	Varies with lenders, locality and time. Also may vary by type of property and size of your down payment. Rates are in the 6½% minimum range.
How long to repay?	10, 15, 20, 25, 30 or 35 years, but no longer than three-fourths of FHA's estimate of the remaining economic life of the structure.	Up to 30 years, but no longer than the estimated economic life of the structure.	Generally 20 to 30 years, but sometimes under 15 years.
What's the most you can borrow?	On a home you live in yourself, $30,000.	No limit as such. But you cannot pay more than VA estimate of "reasonable value."	No dollar limits. But there are percent-of-value limits. See below.
How much of house value can you borrow?	For a house okayed by FHA before construction or one completed longer than one year: 97% of $15,000 plus 90% of the next $5,000, plus 75% of value over $20,000. For other houses, use 90% of the first $20,000 plus 75% of value above $20,000.	VA allows 100% loans. Actually, how much you can get depends on how much a lender will risk on the strength of VA's maximum guarantee of $7,500.	Depends on the lender. Usual limits: Insurance companies 66⅔%-75% Savings & loan associations 80%-90% Most banks 75%
How big a down payment?	For homes valued $8,400 to $10,000, at least $300 down. For those valued $11,700 to $13,300, at least $400 down. Others more.	May be nothing but closing costs.	Difference between maximum loans as above and purchase price.
Prepay (paying the loan ahead of schedule) without penalty?	Yes, up to 15% in any one year.	Yes.	Some restrictions on prepayment likely.
Put a second mortgage with it?	No.	No.	Yes.

FHA AND VA REPOSSESSED HOUSES

Repossessed houses are those houses which have been foreclosed (or taken back) by the lender because the borrower has failed to repay the loan (or money borrowed). FHA and VA loans mean the federal government backs up the loan and assures the lender repayment. After the government's obligation to the lender is satisfied by paying off the loan, the government (the Federal Housing Administration or the Veterans Administration) takes possession of the house and resells it. VA and FHA repossessed houses come under President Kennedy's Executive Order 11063 forbidding discrimination in the sale and rental of houses. Much of this property is well built and can be purchased for a reasonable price.

FHA REPOSSESSIONS: When the FHA repossesses a house, it takes a number of steps which eventually lead to the house's resale:

1. The repossessed house is APPRAISED and a reasonable selling price is fixed. The appraiser tells FHA what repairs, if any, need to be made to make it conform to FHA standards.
2. These repairs are made.
3. If there are many repossessed properties in an area, a MANAGEMENT BROKER is hired. This man (or firm of real estate agents) supervises the repairs and keeps the house in shape while it is on the market.
4. After the house is fully repaired, it is publically advertised for sale (in Atlanta, Georgia, in the Sunday Journal-Constitution) and listed in the monthly FHA-ACQUIRED PROPERTIES mailing list. (This list may be obtained by writing the nearest state FHA office and requesting it.)
5. Only after public notice is given can the property be shown or sold.*

Interested persons must deal through a real estate agent or the management broker. This agent or broker contacts the state FHA office to make the offer to buy. In cases where there is a management broker, the real estate agent must contact him and deal through him.

After the public listing in the paper, offers may be presented to the FHA office. Usually several offers are received at the same time. When

*The management broker knows in advance which houses are FHA repossessions and what progress has been made on repairs. He has the key to the house. Sometimes he shows the house prematurely before the public listing, which is contrary to FHA policy. With the management broker's advantage of prior knowledge of property and approximate time of its sale, his clients are often able to have their bids in first. This means that the Negro buyer may have to contend with double discrimination if the agent of his choice is not the management broker.

this occurs the FHA decides which offer to consider first by seeing which ones show a willingness to buy the house at the FHA-appraised price and for the necessary down payment (usually 3% of the sales price). If the offers all indicate willingness to accept the appraised price and submit the necessary down payment and are accompanied by an appropriate earnest money deposit in the form of a certified or cashiers check made payable to the FHA, then the order of the offers is decided by lot. Only after drawing for order of consideration does the FHA run a credit check on the applicants.

FINANCING for FHA-acquired properties may be any one of three ways:

1. Purchaser pays all cash.
2. Purchaser obtains a conventional loan.
3. If private financing is unavailable under the first two means, then the FHA may accept a mortgage given by the purchaser.

VA REPOSSESSED HOUSES are handled in approximately the same way as the FHA repossessions.

The houses are appraised before foreclosure and a fair market value is assigned to the property. Repairs are made if necessary, but the houses can be bought "as is." If they are bought "as is" then the prospective buyer may, with VA approval, occupy the house for rent during the closing of the sale. The houses must be bought through management brokers; a buyer's broker must place his offer for the property through the management broker if there is one. The management broker cannot sell the house until the price has been established and the list of available properties with price and minimum down payment sent to all real estate agents requesting it. (The list is not ordinarily available to private individuals.) After this list is published, offers may be submitted to the VA (through the management broker), and all offers submitted during the first 48 hours are considered as having arrived at the same time. The VA then considers the offers in order of being most advantageous for the government; that is, which offer is willing to make the largest down payment, requires the shortest repayment time and is the best credit risk. Offers are considered in order of their risk, with minimum risk being considered first. In all cases, a veteran's offer comes first. After the first 48 hours, offers are considered in the order they are received.

If a prospective Negro home buyer is interested in the FHA-repossessed properties and he feels that he is being discriminated against by the real estate agents in the area or by the management broker, he may make a complaint to the FHA field office. "Discrimination" could be refusal to show an FHA-acquired house, or refusal to sell such a house. Proof of discrimination may come through the use of "checkers" or white "buyers" who go to the same real estate agent who has told a Negro buyer that no FHA-acquired property is available. If the checkers are told that repossessed property is indeed on the market, that woud constitute discrimination. Another proof of discrimination would be if a real estate agent told a Negro buyer that the FHA-acquired house he was interested in had an "offer in process." The Negro buyer could check with the FHA field office to see if for that property an offer was in process. If it were not and the real estate agent had lied, then that would be proof that the agent was discriminating. The complaint of discrimination should be backed with as much evidence as possible, something more than just a "feeling." To prove discrimination is often difficult; it requires a knowledge of real estate practices and legal rights which the layman often does not have. The home buyer could turn for help in building his case to his local Legal Aid Society, NAACP chapter, Urban League office or Council on Human Relations. (See page 42 for addresses).

Researchers who worked on this pamphlet found it very difficult to extract from FHA a written description of complaint procedures in cases of alleged discrimination. The VA could not provide any such written description at all. FHA procedures apparently have not been given wide distribution and anyone asking the agency is likely to be given the impression that the procedure is, at best, vaguely defined, involving only that a written complaint be submitted to the local field office.

In reality, Executive Order 11063, sections 51601-51612 (which outline these procedures) is very specific. These sections provide, in part, that: (1) all complaints be submitted in writing by the individual or an officer of the organization on whose behalf it is filed, using FHA form 797 where possible; (2) that the responsibility for processing the complaint rests with the Insuring Office Director having jurisdiction over the housing involved; (3) that FHA must make every effort to properly dispose of the complaint within 30 days and that when more time is needed preliminary reports should be submitted giving reasons for the delay and establishing a new terminal day; (4) that no public statement be made concerning the details of a complaint pending a final decision on its merits; (5) that acknowledgement of the complaint be made by the Insuring Office Director within two working days of its receipt; (6) that the alleged violator after first being informed of the complaint against him, also be notified not to take any action that would cause the housing accommodations which are the subject of the complaint to become unavailable to the complainant until the matter is properly settled; (7) that where the Director has found evidence of discrimination no further FHA applications of the violator be accepted for processing and any applications that he has in process shall be discontinued until either (A) the discriminatory practice has been eliminated and satisfactory assurances of future compliance have been received or (b) the findings of discrimination are reversed by the commissioner.

Complaint procedures through the VA—as already stated—were not available in written form. Through conversations with VA spokesmen, however, the process seems essentially to amount to this: If real estate agents in the area and the management broker will not show to a prospective Negro buyer the VA-acquired properties, then that buyer may appeal directly to the VA which may then sell the house to him without dealing through the broker. The complaint should be submitted to the local VA office in writing together with all other documents to prove the discriminatory act.

Both FHA and VA indicate that they have had few complaints; both were extremely cautious in discussing their procedures. Whatever the reason for such an attitude, this much is certain: complaint procedures should be adequately defined by both agencies and should be readily available at all local and field offices. In filing a complaint with either agency it would be advisable to send a copy to the regional U. S. Commission on Civil Rights and the state Advisory Committee to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights.

Redress for complaints in any event will probably be slow and reluctant. But if rights under the President's Executive Order are not used then they are really meaningless. And unless those who have been discriminated against are willing to file a complaint and to carry it through with persistence there likely will never be adequate complaint procedures.

PRESIDENT'S EXECUTIVE ORDER 11063

On November 20, 1962, President John F. Kennedy issued Executive Order 11063 which forbids housing discrimination in federally aided housing programs. The housing affected by the order is that:

1. owned or operated by the federal government (homes repossessed under FHA or VA programs fall in this group);
2. provided in whole or in part with the aid of federal loans, grants, advances or contributions;
3. provided in whole or in part by loans insured, guaranteed or otherwise secured by the credit of the federal government (all homes financed through the Federal Housing Administration or the Veterans Administration);
4. provided by the development or redevelopment of real property made available by a state or local public agency through federal financial assistance for slum clearance and urban renewal.

The order applies to all housing and related facilities provided with federal assistance made available after November 20, 1962. It also applies to all housing that is owned or operated by the federal government, no matter when provided (such as FHA and VA foreclosures). The order also covers all housing owned or operated by the Defense Department, as well as any housing that is financed with the aid of FHA mortgage insurance for defense personnel.

BUILDERS AND DEVELOPERS OF NEW HOUSING PRODUCED UNDER THE FEDERAL LOAN INSURANCE (FHA) OR GUARANTEE PROGRAM (VA) ARE PROHIBITED FROM DISCRIMINATING in the sale or rental of this housing if their applications for government assistance were filed after November 20, 1962, the time of the executive order.

HOME FINANCING INSTITUTIONS ARE PROHIBITED FROM DISCRIMINATING on the basis of race, color, creed or national origin in their lending practices with respect to housing loans which are insured, guaranteed, or otherwise secured by the credit of the federal government as the result of applications filed after November 20, 1962.

AN INDIVIDUAL HOMEOWNER SELLING HIS OWN HOME IS NOT COVERED BY THIS ORDER. The Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans Administration have exempted owner-occupants of one- or two-family houses from the regulations issued by these agencies to implement the executive order. Lenders, however, doing business under FHA or VA programs may not refuse a loan to a qualified buyer in such cases because of race, color, creed, or national origin.

EXPLANATION OF TERMS

CLOSING COSTS: Charges to the buyer presented at the time of purchase. The charges are usually unexpected, and they must be paid for at the time of purchase in CASH. They include the cost of title insurance and the amount of hazard insurance due for the remainder of the year (if prepaid by previous owner), the amount of real estate tax due for the rest of the year, recording fees charged by state and sometimes city offices to record the change of ownership, recording tax fees for states which require revenue stamps (tax stamps) to be attached to the documents filed. Besides these charges are the fees the lending institution may pass on to the borrower for the services of experts used to check the investment value of the property and the position of the borrower before making a loan (title search or the check to see that the title to the property is in good order; property survey or the check on the dimensions of the property; appraisal of the value of the property to guide the lender in deciding how much to lend; personal credit report on the borrower to see if he is a good credit risk, has a steady job and pays his debts). A fee for the outside lawyer who is attending to the seller's interest may be charged to the buyer. In FHA loans closing costs also include a discount percentage which is, in effect, a service fee paid the lending institution for handling the loan. The items charged to the buyer at closing are negotiable. Sometimes the seller may pay part of them. In all cases the buyer can find out a few days in advance the approximate sum necessary for these costs by telephoning the lender or the real estate agent or by having the buyer's lawyer do so.

DOWN PAYMENT: The money given as partial payment for the house at the time of purchase.

EARNEST MONEY: The money given by a possible buyer to the seller to show that he intends to buy the house. With this money as promise to buy, the seller holds the house for the buyer while he is arranging for a loan. Usually in a preliminary sales agreement (have a lawyer check this agreement before signing), the possible buyer has his earnest money returned if he is not able to get the necessary loan.

EQUITY: The actual dollars and cents value that an owner has in his home; in effect, his investment once all fees and charges against his property have been paid.

HAZARD INSURANCE: Insurance against fire, windstorm and other specified natural hazards. This insurance is required by the lender and is usually part of the payment each month to the lender.

INTEREST: The fee paid lending institution for the loan; the amount of money the lender charges the borrower for the use of the lender's money. Interest is usually given as a per cent. The borrower must pay that per cent per year for the money not repaid the lender.

LOAN: The money borrowed to buy a house; the money lent either by a lending institution (such as a bank) alone or lent by a lending institution and backed by the Veterans Administration or Federal Housing Administration for buying a house.

Conventional Loan: Two-party loans between the borrower and lender. The loan is "secured" or backed by the value of the house being bought and by the credit evaluation on the borrower. This credit evaluation depends on the borrower's job, salary and prospects of remaining at the job and his record in paying past debts.

FHA Loans: Three-party loans where the Federal Housing Administration is involved as well as the lender and borrower. The FHA insures the lender against loss if the borrower fails to repay the loan. For this insurance the borrower pays ½ of 1% of the total loan. This money goes into a common pool to pay the losses when borrowers default.

VA Loans: Three-party agreement where the Veterans Administration guarantees repayment of part (60%) of the loan up to a maximum of $7500.00.

MORTGAGE: Agreement for a long-term loan where the lender has a claim on the property as security for the money he has lent and may foreclose or take back the property if the borrower does not pay the amount borrowed according to a time schedule.

MORTGAGEE: Another name for the lender.

MORTGAGOR: Another name for the borrower.

PRINCIPAL: The sum borrowed. When the borrower repays the loan, he pays each month a certain amount for interest on the money lent and for insurance and taxes; the rest of the payment is paid on the principal or the money borrowed.

TITLE: The right to exclusive or sole ownership.

TITLE DEED: Legal document stating that a piece of property belongs to the owner and was transferred to him from the previous owner with no legitimate claim remaining unsatisfied.

TITLE INSURANCE: Insurance to make sure that the lender experiences no loss if the title to a property has earlier claims to it. This insurance provides funds to defend the insured title against any claims (such as a forged deed or an undisclosed heir) and to compensate the insured party against loss. The buyer, for a small additional fee, may cover his own equity with title insurance. The insurance is paid only once, at the time of sale, and is a per cent of sales price.

TITLE SEARCH: The examination of records and documents concerning previous ownership to make certain that the title (or deed of ownership) to the property has no claims or debts against it.

General discussion as to how to determine a good house and a good value:

"Buying a House—Is the Price Right?," Changing Times, Vol. 18, November, 1964, pp. 30 - 32. This article points out ways to try to determine whether or not a house's price represents "true market value"; it suggests that if the prospective buyer hasn't the time himself for determining the value then he should hire a professional appraiser.

"How to Take the Questions out of Buying or Selling a House," Better Homes and Gardens, Vol. 41, March, 1963, pp. 117 - 120. Discusses with detail the problems of home financing, finding a good location, checking construction, determining the condition of the house and true market value and how to make an offer.

Before You Buy A House by Robert A. Marshall, Changing Times. Published by Kiplinger Washington Editors, Inc., 1729 H Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C.
This 96 page paperback booklet discusses in detail and in an interesting manner the many questions a buyer has when deciding on a new home. It helps the buyer select a house which suits him and explains in simple but precise language the intricacies of financing. Although it was published in 1964, very little of the material is dated. It would be $1.95 well spent by any serious home buyer.

GEORGIA COMMITTEE ON

INTERRACIAL COOPERATION

Block Voting

Politicians, columnists, and a host of dubiously authoritative observers — most of them resembling stone-throwing people who live in glass houses — have had a lot to say these past two years about "the Negro bloc" in Georgia.

Some of their talk has ben malicious, some oi it well meaning, some of it no more sinister than bridge club gossip. With few exceptions, however, such talk has been based on no more than superficial knowledge of the facts.

Negroes do vote in blocs, of course. There is as much a Negro bloc as there is a labor bloc, a farm bloc, or a Southern bloc. But this bloc is not formed on the signal of corrupt Negro leaders, as some people would have us believe. In the main, Georgia's Negro leadership has been responsible, sensible, and admirably restrained. Rather, the bloc has been merely the Negro's inevitable reaction to the vicious race baiting of some politicians and to a long history of cultural, economic, and political discrimination.

Since March 6, 1946, when the U. S. fifth circuit court of appeals granted Negroes the right to participate in Democratic primaries, Georgia Negroes have voted in about a dozen elections, including the 1946 state primary. The record is not complete on Negro voting, neither as to its extent nor character. In some counties, purposely, no separate count has been made of Negro ballots. In others, Negro ballots have been deliberately miscounted. In still others, Negroes haven't been permitted to vote at all. Nevertheless, from the record as it stands one can draw a highly significant judgement: to date, the chief result of Negro enfranchisement has been to stimulate the dormant white electorate to a more serious concern for politics, and to aid immeasurably in the accomplishment of needed political reforms.

Perhaps more pertinently, the Negros' voting history of the past two years shows these things about bloc voting:

1. In state elections the solidifying factor almost invariably is the Negro's right to vote. Negroes will vote in a bloc only when white supremacy is the issue.

2. In county and municipal elections Negroes tend to vote in a bloc against candidates who have demonstrated a disregard for Negro rights and aspirations, and for those who have proved themselves sympathetic. Sometimes, too, local issues may force them into a bloc vote, especially when those issues relate directly to the welfare of the Negro communities.

3. In those few counties where the Negro's right to vote has come to be accepted, and it is the practice for all candidates to bid for the Negro vote as earnestly as they do for the white, there is no Negro bloc.

The first Georgia primary to which Negroes were admitted was held in Glynn County in March, 1946, less than a month after the Primus King decision. It was in this election, it will be recalled, that all but one of seven incumbent commissioners were turned out of office.

Even without the not unexpected enfranchisement of the Negro, Glynn County politics would have been in ferment that spring. Very simply, people had grown tired of county commissioners who, in the words of one citizen, had acted for too long "as if the county and the court house belonged to them."

A total of 7,200 persons voted in that election — 2,160 Negroes and 5,040 whites. Except in the election of one Commissioner who had a particularly strong following in the Negro community, white and Negro votes were cast on about the same percentage. The majority of Negroes opposed the old commissioners; so did the majority of whites.

Four months later, when the State Democratic primary was held, Negroes again went to the polls in Glynn County. This time, they cast what probably will become a typical Negro vote. They voted in a bloc against a gubernatorial candidate. who had used white supremacy as his rallying cry. But in the election of Representatives to the General Assembly, they voted proportionately as white citizens voted, scattering their votes among all candidates; in this race no candidate had pitched his appeal to prejudice.

The Richmond County primary of April, 1946, was in many ways similar to the earlier primary in Glynn. Here, however, the reform movement was rooted in more than resentment against incumbent office-holders. In opposition to the entrenched Cracker Party, which had dominated the city of Augusta for 34 years, a well-organized Independent party had sprung up with a long-range program for municipal progress.

The extraordinary interest with which Richmond County Negroes viewed the campaign was considerably heightened during its last ten days by the injection of the Negro issue. In posters, leaflets, and speeches, the Crackers repeated that the Independents were a bunch of "niggers" and "nigger-lovers", whose election was sure to bring a mixing of the races on public vehicles and in the schools. This was a lot of nonsense, of course. The Negroes, quite intelligently, sided with the insurgents, but how little the Independents owed them for victory was shown conclusively when the ballots were counted. The total number of votes cast was 20,241, of which only about 2,500 were cast by Negroes. The three Independent candidates for the legislature won with an average majority of 5,022 votes — a white majority of 3,526, a Negro majority of 1,497. Cracker Party candidates, to whom in times past many Negroes had looked for jobs, received an average of 474 Negro votes, and actually carried the Negro vote in Augusta's Fourth Ward. Thus, the Independents won with a white majority that was greater by a thousand-odd votes than the total number of Negroes voting. They would have won even if every Negro vote had gone for the Crackers.

In Chatham County, coincident with the 1946 state primary, the Negro bloc expressed itself similarly in a local election that saw the successful beginning of a movement to replace the oldline Administration machine with the Citizens' Progressive League. It was not so much the race issue that caused Negroes to oppose the Administration, although they had ample reason to distrust an Administration tax collector who had tried, unsuccessfully, to block Negro registration. Savannah Negroes had been plugging for some specific benefits for a long time, and they figured merely that their chances for getting them were better with the CPL.

Both the CPL and Administration made bids for the Negro vote. The Administration, though, got a polite turndown. Negro leaders had little faith in the promises of Administration forces who in 25 years had failed to provide anything more than bare minimum services to the Negro community. With the Citizens Progressive League however, they talked straight politics. The Negroes would like some Negro policemen to patrol colored residential districts, several Negro matrons in the city jail, some paved roads, more street lights, better schools, and better health facilities. The CPL said it would do its best.

As it turned out, Negroes voted in a bloc for CPL candidates for the legislature, who won, and voted in a bloc for an independent candidate for judge (a woman lawyer who had declared herself unequivocally in favor of the Negro's right of ballot), who lost. In the legislative race, CPL candidates polled an average of 23,005 votes, and against 13,359 for the Administration slate, giving a total majority of 9,646. The CPL's white majority was 4,542, its Negro majority 5,106. Administration candidates received an average of 1,463 colored votes. The majority of Negroes did vote for the Citizens Progressive League, but, significantly, so did the majority of whites.

Despite the irrefutable evidence of the returns, there is a persistent opinion, encouraged by some of the defeated candidates, that the Negro vote alone was responsible for the reform victories in Chatham, Glynn, and Richmond Counties. Negro participation was an important factor in those victories, but for an entirely different reason. It was important because, in each instance, it brought to the whole electorate — predominantly white — a new sense of civic responsibliity.

This was manifested particularly by some phenomenal increases in registration. The result was that in all three counties registration lists soared far beyond the limits of machine control. In Glynn, registration went from 3,500 to 9,157 (2,400 Negroes); in Richmond, from 9,000 to 26,541 (4,716 Negroes); in Chatham, from 15,000 to nearly 60,000 (19,000 Negroes). Then, sometimes to their mutual surprise, the newly franchised Negro and the newly registered white found themselves on the same side of the political fence.

Since present Georgia laws do not provide for educational qualifications for voting, since most rural Negroes are poorly educated and kept in poverty, it is undeniably true that in some Counties Negroes, like many whites, can be controlled and "voted" — just as in others they can be controlled and not allowed to vote. They can be bought exactly as any oppressed, dependent people can be bought — by threats, by cash, by deceptive promises, sometimes by a simple display of kindliness.

The Georgia Association of Democratic Clubs, the statewide Negro group for political action, has recognized this danger and has consistently fought to avert it. From the beginning the Association has resisted the impulse to rush the Negro population politically beyond the natural limits of its preparedness for citizenship. Wherever feasible, the Association has set up regular orientation classes, their purpose being to acquaint eligible colored voters with the mechanics of the election process and to teach them some simple principles of democracy. It has insisted that Negroes look to their own leaders for political guidance, rather than to white politicians. To further reduce the Negroes' vulnerability, it has maintained that all programs with political implications be financed exclusively by the Negro communities. To preclude the charge of "outside control", the Association has scrupulously avoided taking any partisan stand in local elections.

Yet it has been charged, not without substance, that a recent election in Liberty County was swung by a Negro bloc controlled by a white politician.

Liberty County is one of the 39 Georgia counties where Negroes outnumber whites. It is a coastal county, however, and unlike that of most counties in the Black Belt, in recent years its dominant political temperament has been pro-Rivers, or anti-Talmadge. In 1946 it was perhaps the only county in the Black Belt where no effort was made to purge Negroes illegally from the registration lists. It is the only such county where Negroes have voted in strength.

The outstanding political figure in Liberty is Sheriff Paul Sikes, part owner of the Lilberty Oil Company and an employer of many Negroes. Whether his reasons were laudable or not, it was he who championed the Negro's right to vote in 1946. Liberty County Negroes have been grateful ever since.

When Sikes came up for reelection last January, his reputation as a law enforcement officer was hardly exemplary. A citizens' committee had charged him with having conspired in the illegal operation of slot machines and had filed a petition seeking to remove him from office. Nevertheless, he was reelected by an overwhelming majority. He polled 1,500 of the 2,316 votes cast. His nearest opponent received 449.

The Liberty County election seems to be a unique instance in Georgia where a candidate has won entirely on the strength of a Negro majority. It is reported that of the 2,316 voters, between 1,200 and 1,500 were Negroes and between 800 and 1,100 were whites. It is impossible to know exactly how, or in what percentage, votes were cast, but in Liberty County it is generally believed that all but a few Negroes voted for Sikes—so many that he would have won even if all the white voters in the county had united solidly behind one of his three opponents. Besides the evidence of the election count, indignant white citizens cite the fact that for weeks before the election Sikes had been appealing directly to the Negro population.

Negro leaders do not deny that Sikes actively courted the Negro vote. They do resent the inference that Negroes were "voted." They say that the Negroes supported Sikes primarily because two years earlier, at a crucial time in their political growth, he had defended their right of franchise. Their voting for him indicated only that) they recognized where and with whom their fundamental interests lay. To them, the slot machine scandal—as deplorable as it was—was strictly a side issue.

Such has been the character of local elections during the past two years that Negroes frequently have viewed candidates simply as friend or foe. It may be regrettable that in their support of a friend they have sometimes overlooked what to other people seem to be the superior merits of opposition candidates, but it's nonetheless understandable.

In voting solidly for Lewis Wilson for mayor of Macon last summer, Negroes were voting for a proven friend. Wilson is a progressive-minded grocer who through the years has demonstrated a generous understanding of his Negro customers. They would have voted for him in a bloc, even if his opponent hadn't solidified their loyalties by raising the race issue. "After all he'd done for us," one Negro man said, "we had to back Mr. Wilson. Why, if we hadn't, no white man running would ever again have any faith in us."

In Albany last November, Negroes voted in a bloc against the winning candidate for mayor, because, in their minds, he had proved himself "foe." Of 864 Negro votes cast, 819 were cast against him, a fact The Albany Herald decried as evidence of "thoughtless leadership." On the contrary, Albany's Negro leaders were quite thoughtful. In 1946 Smith had managed Eugene Talmadge's campaign in Dougherty County. On several occasions he had taken the stump for Talmadge and employed the Talmadge brand of race baiting. At a rally in Mitchell County he had presented Talmadge a check for $500. Negroes simply did not have it in them to support such a man, no matter how many worthy municipal reforms he might advocate.

It was this same psychology, of course, that caused some 100,000 Negroes throughout the state to vote in a bloc against Eugene Talmadge for governor. Talmadge ran in 1946 on a white primary platform, and, undisputably, Negroes opposed him with all the strength they could muster. As one legislator has explained it, "They voted against him for the same reason that I would have voted against him if my name were Knucklehammer and he'd said that if elected he would see to it that nobody named Knucklehammer would be allowed to vote."

For Georgia Negroes, these past two years have been a severely taxing transition period. Having finally won a fundamental political right, that of the ballot, they have had to exercise it in a segment of society which had taught them from birth to regard citizenship as the special prerogative of the white man. The amazing fact is that, despite their own unpreparedness and the prevalent hostility of election officials, they have, on the whole, handled themselves in such a way as to be a healthful and constructive influence. That influence promises to be more and more healthful as the fact of Negro participation becomes less and less restricted.

Considering the terribly irresponsible attitude of all too many white voters, it would be impertinent to make any special apology for the voting conduct of Negroes. With respect to bloc voting, the experience of the past two years would seem merely to confirm a verity: the trouble with Negroes is the trouble with whites - and that is, simply, that they're human beings.

FOREWORD

The first study in this series was of Houston, Texas and was published in November, 1961. A note at the beginning of that pamphlet indicated the purpose of the series. We know of no better introductory statement to this second report than the following paragraphs from an editorial in the Durham Morning Herald, September 19, 1961:

> Every obstacle which keeps Negroes from fitting themselves for skilled jobs must be paid for over and over again by every one of us. Indeed, the price mounts each year.
> For by discouraging the training of more skilled Negro workers, the state is promoting the very technological unemployment the nation as a whole is trying to combat. It is ironic in the extreme to figure out ways of promoting new skills among workers in depressed areas while blocking others from learning skills that would keep them from joining the ranks of the chronically unemployed.
> . . . We condemn a significant percentage of our labor force to scramble for the ever dwindling proportion of laborers' jobs. Their requests for training toward higher skills are often ignored, or worse turned down with the fatuous claim that it is no good training them because there would be no openings for Negroes even if they were skilled.
> The results of this self-defeating response to the Negro's need for job training are abundantly clear. They are clear in the out-migration of North Carolina's most able and intelligent Negroes. They are clear in the wasted capabilities of other Negroes who, for one reason or another, choose to remain despite the lack of opportunities. They are clear in many other ways.
> And in each one it is also clear that the Negro is not the only loser. For so long as he makes an artificially small contribution toward the development of the state, the entire state is poorer.

The material in this report is based upon interviews carried out during the summer of 1961. The Southern Regional Council and the co-sponsor of this study, the Chattanooga Council for Cooperative Action, not only acknowledge the contribution of Dr. Major J. Jones but also that of the 28 member organizations of CCCA and its president, Rev. Horace Traylor, and of the many citizens of Chattanooga without whose cooperation this study would not have been possible.

NO PLACE AT HOME

Last spring 300 young men and women were graduated from Chattanooga's Howard High School. They were a class of normal American youth. They liked football, dancing, movies, television, popular music. They came from all walks of life, all religious faiths. Some aspired to professional careers. Some wanted to be housewives; some, to learn trades.

There was, in brief, nothing extraordinary about the situation except one thing: these young people were Negroes.

What does this mean?

To the 30% who wanted to go to college it meant that they had to enroll in schools at least 100 miles away, despite the existence of a fully accredited university in their home town; for this university bars members of their race.

And what of the remaining number?

Thirty-two per cent left Chattanooga altogether to seek employment in other cities.

Three per cent entered the armed forces.

Thus, 65% of a graduating class of 300 for one reason or another migrated elsewhere.

Of the more than a third who remained in Chattanooga, 14% have since married and established new households.

Twenty per cent were forced to take menial jobs with little or no opportunity for advancement.

One per cent were employed as apprentices in skilled trades.

The record can be verified by statistics on file at the high school.

Taken out of context — without being aware that the young people were Negroes — one might suppose that the city of Chattanooga is in the midst of an economic recession. Aware of the race, one familiar with employment practices in the South regards the situation as standard operating procedure.

The evidence strongly indicates that discrimination in employment against Negroes is practiced in a wholesale manner throughout the entire South. This fact being acknowledged, it seems pertinent to inquire if there are any evidences of change on the way. If so, in what areas? Let us explore the Chattanooga employment scene in more detail.

UNEQUAL OPPORTUNITY BEGINS AT SCHOOL

Essential to such an investigation is an analysis of educational and training opportunities.

Vocational training at all-white Kirkman High School encompasses a range of course. Here the white student may learn automotive mechanics, auto motors, commercial arts, cosmetology, drafting, electricity, industrial chemistry, industrial electricity, industrial instrumentation, machine drafting, basic and advanced machine shop procedures, printing, radio and television repair, refrigeration, air conditioning, sheet metal, welding, practical nursing, photography, pre-flight aeronautics, and assorted business subjects, including office machine operations, commercial arithmetic, and salesmanship. Of these courses, only automotive mechanics, automotive motors, commercial arts, cosmetology, practical nursing, and basic business courses are taught in the city's two Negro high schools. In addition, all-Negro Howard High offers tailoring, shoe repair, carpentry, commercial baking, and bricklaying, courses that are not available to white students.

The disparity here is palpably evident, as is the over-all pattern. Negro youth, observers say, are offered training only in fields currently open to them in the labor market. The lack of accessibility to an open job market negatively affects both students and teachers. Negro teachers are denied the knowledge that comes from direct participation in meaningful roles in industry as well as the opportunity for placing their students in the more highly skilled and better paid jobs. Coupled with these disadvantages is the inadequate and often outdated equipment provided in the Negro schools. Because of this, Negro leaders maintain that the quality of training at Howard High in courses seemingly comparable to those taught at Kirkman is inferior to that in courses offered white students. Furthermore, they state, vocational guidance programs are geared more toward disciplining of delinquent students than counseling toward vocational opportunities.

The majority of guidance personnel, in fact, is reportedly not even in contact with the job market.

Opportunities for Negro adults to gain additional training are limited to some of the previously mentioned courses offered in the two Negro high schools, plus classes in electronics, welding, sewing, rug making, and cake decorating. These courses are taught in the evenings, when the high school facilities may be used. No other vocational training is available to Negroes in the entire city.

All money supporting public school vocational training in the state of Tennessee for both white and Negro schools comes from the Federal Government.

CUSTOM-BUILT DISCRIMINATION IN PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT

In approaching the subject of Negro employment in the South one inevitably encounters almost a fixation among white employers against breaching "local custom." It is local custom that Negroes in white-owned industries work in menial roles. It is local custom that Negroes do not work on an equal basis with whites. It is local custom that Negroes, with few exceptions, do not supervise whites. Few will insist that the situation is morally justifiable or consistent with democratic and Christian ethics; some will admit privately, in fact, that it goes against their individual convictions. Rare, however, is the white employer who will take voluntary action to bring about change. In Chattanooga, such employers are so rare as to be practically nonexistent.

The results of several interviews illustrate the point.

- A furniture store employs a total of five Negroes. Three are truck drivers; one is a truck helper; one is an elevator operator. There is no written policy against upgrading Negroes, and an official states that "a Negro could become a salesman, but it would depend on the situation at the particular time." No Negroes, he says, have ever filed applications for jobs above the menial level.

- A department store which estimates its Negro trade at between 20% and 30% employs 87 Negroes, approximately 90% of whom are in "maintenance and service jobs." It has one Negro display assistant and six stock clerks, who are actually classified as porters. Some maids assist salesclerks. The president of this store at one time thought of hiring a Negro salesclerk, but feared adverse reaction from white customers. The store has no policy for upgrading Negroes.

● Recently a downtown grocery store employed one Negro in its meat market, promoted another from cleaner to stock room worker, and hired a third for stock room work. The transition — hardly a breakthrough of major proportions — is regarded as "successful" by the store manager.

● A large bank which does 15% of its business with Negroes employs no Negroes in any capacity whatever. An official says that its Negro customers pay their bills better than many whites, and in the past 13 years it has never foreclosed on a Negro home. Somewhat curiously, the reason given for not employing Negroes is the bank's policy of employee recruitment from people "known" to it. One might, it seems, inquire if its Negro customers do not fit into this category.

● Officials at another bank will not reveal the volume of its Negro business and state only that it employs eight Negroes, all as porters with no opportunity for training leading to higher level jobs.

● A third bank employs no Negroes directly but has Negro janitors and maids supplied through a janitorial service. A spokesman here maintains that he has "liberal views on racial matters," but feels bound by local custom in employing Negroes.

● A major department store employs 100 Negroes, all as maids, janitors, or porters. The highest job level obtained by a Negro here is head porter. The store has no immediate plans to promote Negroes to higher level jobs due to local custom and tradition. However, it concedes that "a gradual approach to upgrading might be feasible." A store official estimates that more than a quarter of its business is with Negroes.

● A spokesman for a utility firm refused to answer questions put to him which he deemed "controversial" or designed "to create tension." His company, he responded, hires "those compatible with others in a work group." Promotion of Negroes, he says, is governed by "traditions and customs of the community."

● Another utility company employs more than 40 Negroes, all of them in the category of laborers. Three, however, are truck drivers, and one assists a white machinist. There are no Negro supervisors.

● A major pipe company with a total of 682 persons on its payroll employs 250 Negroes. Eight of these hold jobs classified as molder finishers and utility men. But, according to a management spokesman, none is able to qualify for promotion. The remaining Negroes are classified as laborers.

● An intrastate bus line has 11 Negro and more than 200 white employees. Its Negro employees are all in maintenance service, but none has been advanced beyond the level of mechanic's helper.

● Local offices of two large insurance companies employ no Negroes above custodial rank. Fifty per cent of the life insurance business of one is with Negroes; yet all of its 200 agents are white.

● Of 600 employees at a hosiery mill, 10 are Negro, and all hold jobs as either janitors or maids.

● A variety chain store which reports "good experience" with Negro employees has one Negro who works as a general utility man. He installs and repairs air conditioners, does building cleaning, and supervises other janitors. His official classification is "porter." At one time the store had a Negro window decorator and currently has a Negro stock boy. Its one Negro maid "does other work" which was not specified.

● Another variety store — part of a nationwide chain — employs a Negro window decorator and a maid in its stock room. The management of this store "fears repercussions" if it upgrades Negroes to sales or supervisory roles.

● A major egg processor with more than two thirds of its total work staff Negro has no Negro supervisors, nor any Negroes working in a clerical or middle management capacity. Neither does it have any policy for Negroes of in-plant training leading to promotion. The work week here is six days, and the minimum wage is $1.03 per hour.

● A local pharmaceutical firm employing 16 Negroes out of a work force of 175 has one Negro who holds a semiskilled post as steam fitter and another who is supervisor of the remaining Negroes, all of whom work in menial capacities. A company official here says Negroes are not considered for advancement into jobs on a level with whites due to "personality conflicts."

● The Chattanooga plant of a national coffee processing company employs two Negroes who work as maintenance men, coffee roasters, and coffee blenders. A spokesman for the company says that, although qualified Negroes may be upgraded to foremen, none has yet been promoted to this position. Queried as to the likelihood of a Negro's being added to the sales force, the official says that the matter has never been considered, but it is not entirely out of the question. A Negro salesman working with Negro customers might, he feels, be quite effective.

Firms operating under Federal Government contracts were most reluctant to participate in the survey. Some refused to cooperate at all, and most were evasive in their responses. From information finally elicited their hesitancy is not difficult to understand, for it is manifest that few practice the nondiscriminatory ideal outlined in President Kennedy's executive order on employment policies in firms operating under Federal Government contracts.

Consider a few examples:

● A large iron foundry with nearly a thousand employees — half of whom are Negro — has no Negro foremen, even in a supervisory capacity over other Negro workers. The base pay for white employees is 25¢ an hour more than for Negroes. White employees start at a job and pay classification two steps above the Negro. There is a dual seniority system — one for employees of each race. Some Negro employees allege that union and management work together to keep the Negro level of employment low and also to bar Negroes from machine-shop apprenticeships. Whatever the reason, Negroes hold only menial and "heavy" jobs and have never been accepted as apprentice machinists.

● The situation is similar at another and larger foundry. Here, too, Negroes are relegated to menial work. Here, too, workers feel that union and management are working together to keep from upgrading Negroes to jobs with better pay and higher responsibility. The company once had an in-plant training program for Negro "blue caps," but those who participated were never upgraded. The program has since been abandoned. There is, similarly, a dual seniority list for white and Negro employees.

● The owner of a third large foundry refused to discuss the status of Negroes employed at his company. Interviews with individual employees indicate, however, that few, if any, measures have been taken to comply with President Kennedy's fair employment practices directive. Negroes for the most part hold menial positions. Specific jobs include iron pourers, truck drivers, loaders, cupola workers, blasters, and grinders. Negroes are barred from apprenticeship training. There are no Negro foremen, administrators, or clerical workers. There is a feeling here that the union, which is an AFL-CIO affiliate, does little to upgrade Negroes; in fact, some Negroes state that the union actually dictates a policy of discrimination despite a nondiscrimination clause in its contract. To substantiate their claim they cite the fact that all jobs are classified by race and that there is never any overlapping of a Negro into a "white" job or a white into a "Negro" job.

● A smaller foundry appears to be somewhat more lenient. Here, Negro molders are classified as skilled or semiskilled, according to their experience. The management is considering employing Negro welders and has an informal apprenticeship program of "crew training" for Negroes working in semiskilled roles. It has, however, no Negro supervisors, foremen, nor any Negroes working in an administrative or clerical status.

● The employment practices of the local division of one of the country's largest chemical companies are described as "most conservative" by both white and Negro employees. No Negroes have been hired in five years. Those who are already employed hold jobs as truck drivers, waste handlers, clean-up men, and cutting- and lifting-machine operators. There is no union, and Negroes are not allowed to participate in apprentice training programs.

● Conflicting pictures emerge from interviews with employees and management of the local division of a national producer of enameled iron and sanitary ware. A company official says that his firm, whose total work staff is 28% Negro, hires strictly on the basis of individual qualification. This official reports that employees have equal opportunity for promotion. Negroes, he says, are selected by qualification and seniority for training programs leading to promotion; however, as a rule, he insists, they do not "follow through" on the training given them. Upgrading of all employees, he reports, is made only with union agreement. Of interest is his statement that Negroes are not barred from supervisory roles, but that the company is reluctant to promote them "for obvious reasons." Negroes and whites do work side by side on many jobs, he states, and good relations exist between members of the two races. Negroes, the official adds, work at all type jobs in the company "except technical and engineering."

Employees present a different view. Training programs, it is alleged, are not open to Negroes, and an "unwritten law" bars Negroes from becoming machinists. An instance is cited of a Negro machinist trainee who was given a tryout and was transferred as being "too slow" after only six days on the job. White trainees in the same shop have been given as much as two years to acquire the speed and skill necessary to do the same job. Another case is told of a Negro who was about to qualify as a highly skilled enameler and at the last moment was transferred to another department in a menial role at far less pay and with no opportunity for advancement. Allegations are also made that the union blocks Negroes from moving into more skilled jobs.

Both informants agree that the highest level job held by a Negro at this company is brickmason.

● Negro employees at a textile chemical firm hold more than their share of jobs at the unskilled level — as appears to be the case with numerous firms holding Federal contracts in the Chattanooga area. The company employs no Negro clerical workers, chemists, laboratory technicians, or supervisors on any level. A Negro was once offered a supervisory role over other Negroes; but he declined, because the pay was not as much as he earned as a laborer.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT: THE GREAT ILLUSION

In the field of public employment Negro job opportunities in Chattanooga are somewhat brighter than in private industry, but there is still vast room for improvement.

Exclusive of the teaching profession Negroes employed by the city hold 16 jobs which may be considered above menial status. Ten of these are city policemen; one is a license inspector; three are juvenile court officers assigned to Negro cases only; and two are caseworkers in the Negro division of the Bureau of Relief.

The 10 Negro policemen actually do not have full status as they are assigned only to Negro neighborhoods and are prohibited from arresting white law violators within their jurisdiction. There are no Negro supervisors in the police department. Over the years a few white officers have been sent for further training; no Negro patrolmen have ever been chosen to attend police institutes or FBI schools.

In the Hamilton County courthouse, Negro employment for the most part is janitorial. One Negro holds a post as a semi-inventory clerk, and another is employed as a plumber's helper. A court official, denying any personal bias, reports that Negroes are not upgraded because of "local custom." Although this official appears to recognize that local custom is dictating an essentially immoral situation, he hesitates to take steps in opposition to prevailing white sentiment. At the close of the interview, however, he indicated that he would give consideration to placing qualified Negroes in jobs above their present level of employment.

The city administration says it would like to hire several engineers without regard to race and also would like to staff fire stations in the Negro community with Negro firemen. Queried as to his position on Negro employment in city government, the mayor of Chattanooga makes this comment: "I will cooperate with efforts in this city for its betterment by setting an example."

Basic educational requirement for employment by the city-owned Electric Power Board is a high school diploma. Vocational training of Negro high school graduates is considered by Power Board officials to be well below that of white high schools — not surprising in view of inadequate training facilities at the two Negro high schools. Job placement in theory is based on an applicant's qualifications. Yet when three young Negroes trained in commercial subjects recently sought to fill openings in secretarial and clerical work, their qualifications were judged "unimpressive," and the jobs went to white applicants. Of 34 Negroes employed by the Power Board, 16 are classified as janitors, four as hostlers, two as truck drivers, five as laborers, two as helpers, and five as elevator operators. An official of the board admits that, although all jobs supposedly are open to qualified members of both races, Negroes have no chance at all of becoming foremen. Local custom would forbid it.

The Chattanooga School Board employs no Negro carpenters, painters, electricians, mechanics, plumbers, plumber's helpers, or steam fitters, although there are Negroes in the city qualified to hold such jobs.

Of 50 school custodians 40 are Negro. Here Negroes appear to be losing out in a field they once dominated. Ten years ago all 50 were Negro, but as the Negroes have retired they have been replaced by whites, whose jobs are reclassified as "building managers," with higher pay than that received by their Negro predecessors.

The Chattanooga Housing Authority employs no Negroes at the policy making level, and, in its central offices, Negroes are working only as janitors. Elsewhere, the agency employs Negroes, for the most part, as laborers. However, three do hold semiskilled jobs — all classified as mechanics or supervisors but performing higher level tasks such as electricians, painters, and plumbers. All are nonunion men, because trade unions in the city bar Negroes from membership. These men are paid on a lower scale than called for by the skills they are performing.

Urban renewal projects are first let to the general contractor, who then subcontracts various phases of construction. The selection of subcontractors is the decision of the general contractor. An official admits that unless Negro contractors know in advance about a particular job they would have no chance to bid for it, as subcontracts are not advertised.

It is reported by some Negro laborers that while working for white contractors they frequently do skilled work but do not draw additional pay.

The Negro division of the State Employment Service is under the supervision of a white director. The reason for this, a spokesman says, is that no Negro can be found in the city of Chattanooga who has the proper qualifications, i.e., a college degree plus civil service supervisory experience. The agency feels no obligation to seek out jobs for Negroes; however, it reportedly does perform this service for whites. At the central offices jobs are not referred to the Negro division unless the employer specifically requests Negroes. Most such requests are for work in menial roles.

In contrast, interviewers noted some concern on the part of a Social Security official that no Negroes work in his office on any level. He was disturbed lest the national administration think the office practices racial discrimination. The truth is, the official insists, that few Negroes take Civil Service examinations in the city.

An interview with personnel administrators at the Tennessee Valley Authority revealed that 112 Negroes are employed out of a total work force of 600. Of the Negroes employed, 52 are janitors, nine are messengers, four are garage attendants, three are linemen, two are lineman apprentices, two are truck drivers, four are bindery workers, and two are building guards. There are 22 Negroes employed in various clerical roles, including 11 file clerks, two typists, seven mail clerks, and two store clerks. In addition, four Negroes are duplicating machine operators, one a computing machine operator, and one is a collating machine operator. Two Negroes hold jobs as engineers — one, a civil engineer; the other, electrical. There is one Negro electrical engineer trainee, one Negro draftsman, one photographer, and one Negro personnel administrator.

Officials of the agency feel that many Negroes seeking employment at TVA have inadequate vocational training.

At the Chattanooga post office no Negroes are employed as supervisors.

BARRIERS TO PROFESSIONAL PRIDE

Even on the professional level Negroes find discrimination. Negro doctors are barred from membership in the local medical association; they are denied admittance to practice in the city's two major hospitals and rarely have any contact with white colleagues, except on rare occasions when one calls upon the other for consultation.

Negro teachers are in the particularly frustrating position of having no local educational outlet and must travel at least 100 miles to Negro colleges to do advanced work in summer teacher seminars. The highest position held by a Negro in the city school system is that of principal.

The city's one Negro lawyer feels that he is handicapped in his practice by a general feeling within the Negro community that a white lawyer can more successfully handle their affairs in an all-white courtroom. Their thinking seems to be that the mere presence of an educated Negro lawyer would inflame white prejudices against them.

There are a few Negro registered nurses on the staffs of two city hospitals; Negro leaders feel, however, that the number is inadequate in view of the fact that the two segregated wings of an otherwise all-white hospital are manned almost entirely by semiprofessionals — practical nurses and nurses aides.

KNOCKING — BUT THEY CAN'T GET IN

Researchers discovered few instances of actual job breakthroughs for Negroes into all-white categories. Jobs considered "unusual" for Negroes appear to be isolated cases with no attempt made permanently to erase racial barriers in these roles. A few such examples, however, are noteworthy.

- A mail-order house employs a Negro mail-order clerk.

- A leading flower farm with a large southeastern clientele employs a Negro flower designer who works on equal status with her white colleagues.

- An automobile dealer has a Negro salesman on its staff. (It is perhaps pertinent to note here that all other dealers employ Negroes as clean-up and grease men, although many of these men, it is said, know enough about automobiles to hold mechanic's jobs.)

- The local outlet of a nationwide variety store has recently upgraded a maid with 15 years seniority to the level of clerk. This woman feels that she has been well accepted by both white customers and her fellow white clerks. Her salary is the same as that of other clerks with the same amount of seniority.

But as has been observed, instances such as these (insignificant really when one considers the vast waste of Negro labor potential in Chattanooga) are exceptions. Employment of Negroes at levels below their training, Negro leaders say, is most certainly the rule.

An index of the extent to which this is true may be gauged by a look at the responses of college-trained Negro substitute teachers, questioned as to the type of jobs they are able to find other than teaching.

One baby-sits. One operates a department store elevator. One carries baggage at the airport. One works as floor sweeper in a bakery. Another works as a household domestic. Many say they are unable to find other jobs at all.

SUMMARY

In almost any discussion with a segregationist a statement somewhat like this will occur: "I don't dislike Negroes personally, but they should seek to raise their economic level first before pressing for integration."

The conclusions of this survey make it obvious that there is more involved here than an effort of will on the part of Negroes. Discrimination begins long before a Negro youth files his first job application. He is denied equal training opportunities, and when he seeks skilled jobs he is rejected — ostensibly at least — because he is inadequately trained. If he does acquire trade skills, he is barred from most trade unions and apprentice programs. He is likewise barred from admission to the only college within 100 miles. Almost without exception, industries with Federal contracts fill their required Negro quotas at the lowest level of employment. Local custom works as a brake on the few white employers who might desire to upgrade their Negro employees to positions of greater responsibility.

Is there any wonder, then, that 65% of a local Negro high school graduating class seek opportunities outside Chattanooga? The wonder is that as many remain as do.

Governor Buford Ellington, campaigning for election in 1958, stated: "All of us are fighting youth migration. We need to be in the position to stretch our arms toward these youths who have left our state and say: 'Come home, come home. The opportunities are here.'

"And we need to expand the system of trade schools so that we can say to our youths remaining with us: 'Stay home, stay home. The opportunities will be here. You will be trained to take advantage of them.' "

Whether he intended to do so or not, the governor summed up the plight of the Negro youth in the city of Chattanooga. And this raises the most pertinent question of all.

How much longer can Chattanooga afford to sustain and support a policy that fosters youth migration and forces those who stay at home to accept a permanent rung at the bottom of the employment ladder? It is not too late — even in Chattanooga — to do something about it. But as Governor Ellington indicated four years ago — time is running short.
